GROUPS AND DIRECT ACTION

News and information about groups and organizations and their activities. In order to report better on their activities we would be grateful if national societies would send us their press releases and publications and if local groups would keep us informed of what they're up to. Any photos we can use would be greatly appreciated. If anyone sends reports of illegal

NOT JUST ANOTHER A.R. MAG

Hello and welcome to the first edition of Arkangel. Of course, there never can be too many animal rights magazines and we give our support and encouragement to all the others, but we like to think that Arkangel is an AR mag with a bit of a difference.

Positive Approach

Firstly, you'll find few, if any, reports of cruelty to animals in Arkangel and no gory photos of vivisection etc. We know it is vital that such things are exposed, but there are plenty of other very good animal rights publications that do just that. Instead we want to concentrate on the positive side of things, to report what is actually being done to combat animal persecution and on the successes that are being achieved. To that end we carry reports of national and local societies and campaigns and a "Road To Victory" section which mentions a few of the advances that have been made. Just because we report on a particular activity doesn't mean that we're necessarily 100% in agreement with it, but we don't believe in acting as censors - which brings us on to the second thing that Arkangel stands for, and that is freedom of expression.

No Censorship

Obviously we have our own views and these will be apparent in the magazine, but we positively encourage other AR campaigners to send in their opinions for publication, even if we are not in agreement with them. Too many animal rights publications censor opinions that are not in accordance with those of the editors and many don't even have a letters page where people can present an alternative viewpoint. We feel this approach is very narrow-minded and positively harmful as it is only through rational debate and exchange of views that the movement can find the right direction. Therefore if you disagree with anything printed in Arkangel or have comments to make on anything within the sphere of animal rights/liberation, don't hesitate to write in and we'll do our utmost to print your contribution.

United Movement

Thirdly, Arkangel stands for unity. We often feel we are part of a movement that is constantly tearing itself to pieces. Internal disputes continue to ravage the national societies. Local groups are torn asunder because of personal differences. Activists are insulted in the media by fellow campaigners. It often seems that animal protectionists hate each other far more than they hate the animal abusers. We want to do our best to change all that. It is important that there are differences of opinion. The movement could never make any progress if everybody always thought the same, but differences should be discussed rationally, within an atmosphere of mutual respect. We will try our utmost to help bring about that situation.

Fair Distribution

Fourthly, we are aware that many people in the movement are not particularly wealthy. We don't want any animal rights campaigner to be denied the opportunity to read the mag just because they're short of money. Therefore, we are sending copies of Arkangel free to all local animal rights groups for distribution to their members. All we ask for is a donation, if groups or individuals can afford it. Hopefully the wealthier members of the movement will be sufficiently generous to enable the mag to be seen by the less well off. It is also possible for people to take out individual subscriptions (form enclosed) and there is a cover price for sale of the mag at stalls and on demonstrations. We hope to publish Arkangel at least 4 times a year.

The Future

And finally, we don't intend the Arkangel project to be just a magazine. We have plenty of plans for the future, such as a press agency/news service, an information service for local animal rights groups and the publication of various booklets on animal rights related issues. The better the support for the magazine, the quicker we'll be able to realise these other ventures.

actions we hope they will be sensible regarding fingerprints, handwriting and their own security

COMMENT

This section is open to everyone in the movement to express their own views. Arkangel has a policy not to insult others who fight for animals but we also have a policy not to censor any opinions. We immediately have a conflict here if we receive articles which could be considered insulting. We can either (a) censor these articles (ie. leave them out) or we can (b) not censor anything but emphasise our own position in order to hopefully encourage articles which criticize without abuse. We have decided on the latter option. In this issue - Ronnie Lee on the "controversial actions" of some and the "hysterical reactions" of others - Barry Empage puts the case for those accused of being on a self-righteous vegan crusade - Barry Maycock puts the Bristol explosion into context - Brendan McNally on the movement's new found respectability - Gari Allen on the thankless but essential task of homing animals - Nancy Phipps and P.L. on the reactions to direct actions

ONE PEOPLE

The animal rights movement can so easily become a closed society and, when one is very active within it, it is so easy to forget about the nature of the outside world. Being forced to live, for several years, with people who by and large care about nothing except themselves, has made me appreciate, much more, other people within our movement, even if I don't happen to agree with them on every issue.

So often animal rights people, because of relatively minor differences of opinion or some small personal dispute, appear to hate each other more than they do apathetic outsiders or even the animal abusers themselves. Two people can be both committed vegans, both vehemently opposed to all animal exploitation, both have houses full of rescued cats and dogs and yet despise each other absolutely because of some minor disagreement. Surely this is nothing less than a crazy situation?

One of the reasons these internal feuds arise is because our movement has largely the wrong attitude towards the struggle for animal liberation. We would do far better to consider it as a war. In a war the people fighting on one side become united and are prepared to sink their differences for the common good. By "war" I am not necessarily advocating violence. A war can be defined as "a strong effort to combat evil" and so a person who spends their time giving out leaflets can consider themselves just as much a warrior as one who engages in direct action. It is an attitude of mind.

This unity for the war effort does not mean that all A/R campaigners must always have exactly the same opinions. Indeed the movement would soon stagnate if that were to be the case. What it does mean, though, is that those disagreements should be expressed within a climate of mutual respect. They should be discussed sensibly and rationally without insults or rhetoric and if the disagreement still persists we should agree to differ and carry on working together in those large areas where there is still accord. Vis-a-vis the animal abusers and other hostile elements of society we must always present a broad united front.

Our enemies really don't have to make much of an effort to destroy our movement when we're so very good at doing that ourselves. The whole history of our struggle just seems to be one of self-inflicted wounds. Words such as "infiltrators", "traitors", "maniacs", "terrorists" have been bandied about without any thought as to the deep hurt and divisions they may cause. There is probably not one of us who is not to blame.

It is not too late, however, to set forth on the road towards reconciliation. For societies, groups and individuals to put behind them the hurtful disputes of the past and to begin working together with care and respect for each other. It may give a strange satisfaction to insult somebody in the movement whom you feel has insulted you, but what good can that do for the cause of animal liberation?

In Arkangel we have done our utmost not to insult other campaigners with whom we have some disagreement. We may criticize their attitudes and some of the things they've said, but that is within the context of respect for them as fellow animal rights campaigners and appreciation of the considerable contribution they have all made towards the cause. It hurts and angers me to hear genuine, caring people described as "terrorists" and "loonies", but what possible good would it do to use insulting words against the campaigners who have made those remarks? All that would do is just exacerbate the divisions and ill-feeling within the movement. Somebody, somewhere, has to call a halt to the succession of mutually inflicted injuries.

The animal rights movement is a group of caring people in a still largely cruel and apathetic world. We are all of us very special, and it is important that we are all of us special to each other. One People united in One Struggle until the victory is ours.

A LESSON FROM ASHLEY

In March this year 3 thugs, thought perhaps to be local fishermen, broke into a seal sanctuary at Docking, Norfolk, with the intention of clubbing 11 ailing seals to death with pickaxe handles. Luckily RSPCA Inspector Ashley Hayland was on hand.

Ashley, a former amateur boxer and the holder of a brown belt in karate, battled with the intruders and, despite being punched, kicked and slashed across the chest, managed to save the lives of the seals. The thugs fled limping to a waiting car and drove off.

Ashley Hayland's determined and courageous action not only taught a lesson to the would-be slaughterers of seals, it should also teach all of us in the A/R movement a lesson. It is time we all learned properly to defend ourselves and others. Ashley single-handedly saw off 3 pickaxe-wielding scum, yet how many hunt saboteurs have fled in droves from a handful of heavies, leaving their colleagues to be beaten to pulp? How many campaigners have stood around while their pals are beaten up by circus thugs?

The movement has suffered terribly from its fatal addiction to non-violence, leaving our people ill-equipped, mentally or physically, to deal with such attacks from animal abusers.

It is high time to remedy the situation.

One does not have to be a karate expert or ex-boxer to be able to put up a spirited defence. Mostly it is a question of the right mental attitude coupled with a bit of training and anatomical knowledge. We feel this is an important issue. As the animal liberation movement pushes the animal abusers more and more against the wall an increasing number will hit out desperately with violence, not just against hunt sabs or anti-circus demonstrators but at animal rights protestors anywhere. We must all of us be prepared to deal with this eventuality.

We would like to see a country-wide self-defence network for animal rights campaigners, with every local group given adequate training. As more and more animal rightists become skilled in self-defence they can become trainers themselves. In the meantime groups may do well to take up the offer (Howl Winter '88) of a hunt saboteur, trained in several disciplines, who has said he will hold regional or national workshops on self-defence. Interested groups or individuals should send their names and addresses, and details of their requirements, to The Tactics Officer, HSA, PO Box 87, Exeter, EX4 3TX. Apart from travelling expenses, no charge will be made for tuition.

NATIONAL CAMPAIGNS

ANIMAL AID

GROWING INTEREST

Animal Aid has reported a growing interest in its campaign against all animal abuse. The society attracted more than 1,000 new members in the first 10 weeks of the New Year and its "Living Without Cruelty" campaign is receiving about 400 requests for information per week. Following ads in young peoples' magazines the Animal Aid Youth Group received over 2,000 requests for information.

The society continues to produce leaflets and information on many aspects of animal persecution as well as its own range of cruelty-free cosmetics. It has brought out a booklet "Why Animal Rights?" which has been mailed out to all secondary schools in the country with good results. The Animal Aid campaign against the cruel experiments on cats carried out by Oxford Professor, Colin Blakemore, continues and its "Living Without Cruelty" exhibition in London this year was once again a success.

NOT JUST A BY-PRODUCT

Leaflets issued by the newly-formed Campaign Against Leather and Fur claim that leather is not just a by-product of the meat industry. The group is campaigning against all use of animal skins including crocodile, kangaroo etc. as well as fur and leather.

ACC

SANCTUARY LIST

Animal Christian Concern is now providing a list of small animal sanctuaries for which it encourages support. The group has sent a "Letter to Christians" on the subject of animals and the church to church hierarchy, Evangelical groups etc. and held a vigil at Leeds University to mark World Day for Laboratory Animals. All ACC members have been urged to write to their MPs protesting about the factory-farming of deer. (46 St. Margaret's Rd., Horsforth, Leeds, LS18 5BG 0532 583517)

LATEST INFORMATION

Animaline (0898 444058) continues to give all the latest info on animal rights events, topics in the news, cruelty-free products etc.

SAVE SCOTLAND'S SEALS

A "Save Scotland's Seals Fund" to support seal sanctuaries has been set up by Animal Concern (Scotland).

The society has also been campaigning against the poisoning of gulls and uncovered the terrible conditions endured by elephants at the Glasgow Circus.

A reward of £1,500 has been put up by ACS for information leading to the conviction of dogfighters.

Animal Concern continues to urge local authorities to establish low cost spay/neutering facilities and has been raising objections to fish farm planning applications around the country. It has also had a fish-farmer charged with illegal shooting of seals.

The society is currently holding a competition for photos showing the horror of factory farming in Scotland and produced new leaflets on the Scottish fur industry, Boots and McDonalds.

FIRST EXHIBITION

The first "Living Without Cruelty" exhibition to be held in Northern Ireland took place earlier this year with much media coverage.

The organisers, Animal Rights Movement (Northern Ireland), are also involved in education, protests, political lobbying and the distribution of information. In March the Fermanagh/Tyrone branch held a 24 hour vigil in support of the Great British MeatOut.

VIOLENCE FREE SCIENCE

RIGHT TO REFUSE

"Animals in Education.....Your Right to Refuse" is a campaign launched by the National Union Of Students and backed by anti-vivisection organizations. Its aim is to inform students about dissection and vivisection in British Universities and of their right to refuse to take part. The NUS promises students full backing under its "Violence Free Science" charter and is offering advice in getting the charter adopted by students unions and on the setting up of student animal rights groups.

162,000 LEAFLETS

Animal rights publishers Arc Print produced 162,000 Primate Action Day leaflets for a total of 42 separate groups. In the past year they have printed leaflets, at a fraction of the commercial cost, for over 50 local animal rights groups and have added to the number of booklets they produce on AR issues.

CONFERENCES, VIDEOS, BOOKS

The Athene Trust is planning to hold annual international conferences as well as producing videos and books for all age groups. The trust encourages organic/veganic farming, conservation, respect for wildlife and the welfare of farm animals and already produces informative material for schools, including info packs and a video. It had a stand at the Festival of British Food and Farming to present a humane alternative in line with its policy of promoting "harmony between animals, the natural world and man".

ALF Supporters Group

SG BOUNCES BACK

After a difficult period of police repression when several of its organizers were jailed, the ALF Supporters Group is once again publishing its newsletter. For legal reasons this is now somewhat milder than previous issues, but still gives info on ALF prisoners as well as useful facts and figures on factory farming, vivisection and the fur industry. The group, which helps with the welfare and legal costs of imprisoned and fined ALF activists, has also produced factsheets on various forms of animal abuse for use in public education and has recently issued a new fund-raising leaflet.

ANTI-ANGLING VIDEO

The Campaign for the Abolition of Angling is hoping to produce a video soon. It now has contacts in 22 areas and is arranging to give talks to schools in addition to local animal rights groups. CAA organised yet another National Anti-Angling Day this year, this time with emphasis on the threats posed to wildlife by discarded tackle. It suggests various non-violent methods for disrupting angling and produces a range of leaflets, info sheets, posters and merchandise.

Artists for Animals

AFA ART DISPLAY

The first ever Artists for Animals art exhibition took place this June/July at Rochdale Art Gallery with the aim of acting as a catalyst for work in the arts on animal rights/liberation. A mural, produced on canvas at the exhibition, is to go to community centres and similar venues all around the country with the hope that talks on animal rights will coincide with its display. AFA, which aims to raise public awareness to all forms of animal abuse through music and art, has produced several records as well as organizing concerts. The groups latest LP and CD, entitled "The Liberator", includes tracks by Robert Wyatt, Captain Sensible and The Style Council.

120 AND RISING

The fact that about 120 local authorities have now banned circuses with performing animals from their land is in no small part due to the work of the Captive Animals Protection Society. The society, which also campaigns against the holding of dolphins in captivity, circulates local authorities asking them to refuse sites to animal circuses and its representatives attend and speak at council meetings.

CAPS is asking for legislation to prohibit the use of animals in circuses and gives support to local animal rights campaigns against shows with performing animals. The society is involved in the Eurogroup for Animal Welfare and campaigns against cruelty to animals in foreign circuses and fiestas. It also support various wildlife protection projects.

DIVERS FOR ANIMALS

Set up in 1988 to help seals suffering from infection, the British Divers Marine Life Rescue now covers all marine animals and is soon to acquire charitable status. It has been patrolling the Welsh sandbanks, taking sick seals to an RSPCA hospital to be treated and then releasing them when cured. So far over 10 have been returned to the sea. The rescue service also assisted the Daily Mail with publicity material for its "Save Our Seal" campaign.

The group is carrying out a Deliberate Warp around the Welsh and Cornish coasts and plans to start a Basking Shark Project next year. It is currently in the process of setting up several teams to care for oiled seabirds.

LAMBS NOT TO THE SLAUGHTER

The India Branch of Beauty Without Cruelty has persuaded the Indian Government to outlaw the killing of day-old karakul lambs for the fur trade. The branch has also purchased all the surviving karakul sheep so that the slaughter will never occur in that country again. Meanwhile the society's branch in Zimbabwe is concentrating on saving the rhino and raising money for efforts to combat poachers.

Nearer to home, BWC is campaigning in support of European Community legislation to ban the leghold trap and to prohibit exports of the fur of its victims. The society wants the proposals strengthened to include all sorts of cruel traps and snares.

Its London Branch is urging all London Boroughs to adopt an animals charter and to appoint Animal Welfare Officers.

BWC continues to produce leaflets, information and educational material as part of its campaign against the fur trade and cosmetics testing on animals.

NEW GREEN GROUP

The recently set up Ark Trust is encouraging people to change their own lives to protect the world, including eating less meat. The trust is forming local associations to improve the environment in their own areas and is launching a range of environment-friendly household products and fast and frozen foods made from "pure natural ingredients".

GREYHOUND SALES EXPOSED

An investigation by the British Union for the Abolition of Vivisection has confirmed that retired racing greyhounds are finding their way to vivisection laboratories. Representatives of the society posed as a lab animal supply co. and purchased 6 greyhounds which were being sold by a Welsh company for experimentation. The dogs were identified by tattoos as ex-racers and the BUAV have now submitted a detailed report to the Home Office regarding the use of ex-racing greyhounds.

The society is preparing to re-enter the political arena with a campaign to lobby parliament and MPs and is producing a new range of leaflets and posters.

A fund-raising "Walk for Laboratory Animals" was scheduled to take place in many towns and cities in September.

BUAV publishes factsheets on various issues relating to animal experiments and has a network of local contacts around Britain who organize events in support of national campaigns.

Care for the Wild

AID FOR ELEPHANT ORPHANAGE

Wildlife protection group Care for the Wild has assisted towards the building of accommodation for orphaned elephants in Africa and is starting an educational project on how to return elephants to the wild. It is currently trying to raise funds for this and also to help with medicines and milk substitutes for the orphans. The society this year sent money to the Aberdare Rhino Sanctuary to build a fence to safeguard the herd against poachers. Later this year Care for the Wild will bring over a representative from the Canadian Anti-Fur Alliance to lobby in the European Parliament to bring in labelling on furs and differentiate between the animals caught in leghold traps and those farmed.

The society aims to educate the public, particularly young people, in the care of wildlife and the environment and has started an "Ivory Out Campaign" where people pledge not to wear or buy ivory in any form.

NEW LEAFLET, NATIONAL PETITION

Chickens Lib has recently produced a new leaflet on battery hens and is starting a national petition against the broiler system, in addition to existing petitions against broiler units and to stop Marks and Spencer selling battery eggs. The group has produced a booklet on Intensive Egg and Chicken Production as well as videos, leaflets, booklets and posters. Lay welfare standards in chicken hatcheries are the subject of another of its campaigns, which aim for the abolition of the battery cage system and improved conditions for broiler chickens.

57 VARIETIES

A four week vegetarian menu planner with 57 varied recipes is to be sent to thousands of school caterers. Choice!, the campaign for the right to choose healthy vegetarian meals at school, has now succeeded in raising enough funds to ensure that every secondary school in the country receives a copy.

The campaign, jointly organised by Animal Aid, the Vegetarian Society and the Athene Trust was launched in November 1988 after the Vegetarian Society was deluged with complaints from pupils and parents about the total lack of provision for vegetarians in school canteens. About 1.4 million children under 16 are either vegetarians or avoid meat, and the number is increasing all the time.

CHOICE! sent out a questionnaire to 9,000 vegetarian secondary school students and to all Local Education Authority catering managers. Replies showed that a high proportion of school students were dissatisfied with the provision of vegetarian meals at school and only 13 LEAs have a policy of providing veg. meals every day. One catering manager stated that vegetarians now account for up to 25% of pupils in a typical comprehensive.

When decent veg. meals are provided in schools, meat eaters snap them up too. N. Yorks sold an extra 1.4 million vegetarian meals in 1985-86, with as many meat eaters as vegetarians eating them. In schools which provide a good choice of appetizing vegetarian meals a considerable number of students become vegetarian. Many celebrities have given support to CHOICE! and it even got an encouraging letter from Edwina Curry. The campaign has received coverage in several national papers, many locals and on radio and TV and has severely upset the meat industry, which has its own campaign to persuade schoolkids to eat more corpses. (Parkdale, Dunham Rd., Altrincham, Cheshire 061 928 0793)

CONCERNED

Concerned members of the BUAV has been set up for those concerned about the democracy within the society and who are worried that it has rejected its traditionally abolitionist stance to vivisection, together with implicit promotion of the dairy industry, attacks on local initiatives and persecution of trade union members - such as Darren Cruice, BUAV Merchandise Dispatch Clerk, who spoke out in support of trade unionised colleagues at a BUAV contacts meeting and was subsequently given the sack. Choose Cruelty-Free

CRUELTY-FREE VICTORIES

The BUAV's "Choose Cruelty-Free" campaign has played a significant part in persuading 2 major cosmetics companies, Benetton and Avon, to stop testing their products on animals - and, in addition, Tesco has agreed to stock Beauty Without Cruelty products in over 40 of its superstores. On the political front nearly 300 MPs from all parties have now given support to an Early Day Motion seeking a ban on animal cosmetics testing.

In connection with the campaign, launched 2½ years ago, the BUAV now produces its own cruelty-free products and publishes a guide to cosmetics and household products not tested on animals. There is a 24 hour hotline (01 700 4232) for those wanting information as well as a free magazine and a video, which can be purchased from the BUAV. The campaign, which has the support of many celebrities and companies, also holds public meetings and has a special bus, which toured Britain with over 1 million leaflets distributed and 100,000 copies of the first cruelty-free mag. The bus visited over 70 towns and cities and many shops and restaurants took leaflet dispensers.

At one time the campaign was receiving 5,000 enquiries a week and, to date, the total number is well over 150,000. There have been widespread regional and local events as well as intensive colour advertising in teenage and women's publications, articles in many mags and local papers and interviews on local radio stations.

Pressure is being brought to bear on major supermarkets, large consumers, such as local councils and student unions, and in the political spectrum. A questionnaire on products was sent to hundreds of companies, 97 of which are included in the campaign guide. In Autumn 1988 the Daily Mirror began to give the campaign its backing and the major successes with Benetton and Avon have resulted. Up to 2,000 requests for info are still being received each week. (BUAV, 16A Crane Grove, London N7 8LB 01 700 4888)

"SENTIENT ANIMALS"

The anti-factory farming organization Compassion in World Farming is currently campaigning for the upgrading of the status of animals under the Treaty of Rome. At the moment live animals are classed as "agricultural products" within the EEC, so CIWF is proposing a new classification of "sentient animals" together with 10 provisions for their better treatment. A petition is being prepared in all the major languages of the European Community and it is hoped to achieve one million signatures throughout the EEC.

Other CIWF campaigns are for strict limitations on live exports, against deer being slaughtered in abattoirs (and against deer farming in general), for a ban on the dairy hormone BST, against the sale of frogs' legs, for proper welfare of animals in markets, against mulesing (a form of mutilation) of Australian sheep, against bad conditions in feed lots and cattle holding pens, for an end to the false description of battery eggs as "farm fresh" and against cruel methods of slaughter. The society is urging people to boycott battery eggs and produces cruelty-free diet sheets.

The CIWF anti-battery farming advert "Welcome to the Battery" has been screened in over 50 cinemas (and was actually applauded by one London audience). The society also produces several videos and has a network of local groups, together with leaflets etc. to take the campaign to the public. It was involved in the Great British MeatOut in March and has published (together with LYNX) a report on the factory farming of mink for the fur trade. A CIWF ad depicting a defeathered battery hen won a Silver Award for Best Charities Advert given by the Campaign Press Advertising Awards. (20 Lavant St., Petersfield, Hants 0730 68863/64208)

AIDS HUMANE RESEARCH

The latest project to be funded by the Dr Hadwen Trust for Humane Research is for non-animal research into the way the AIDS virus can cause dementia.

The trust has given a £30,000 grant to the project which uses human brain cells grown in culture.

Another Hadwen Trust funded project has already revealed that lifetime vegans and vegetarians are likely to have greatly reduced risks of heart disease compared with flesh-eaters.

The trust gave £3,750 towards a 10 year study of the health consequences of vegetarianism, using human volunteers.

A grant of £11,000 was given to cancer research without animals at Cambridge University, where human cancer cells are used to study the effect of anti-cancer drugs.

The money has enabled a special machine to be bought to make the process quicker, more efficient and more effective.

Since the trust's formation in 1970 to develop humane, non-animal techniques in medical research, it has funded more than 40 different research projects including rheumatism, liver disease, tropical illness, diabetes, brain damage and drug side-effects. It is a policy that no animal should be made to suffer in its research programmes.

UNITY, CO-ORDINATION, INFORMATION

National days of action, such as against the poultry and fur trades, are being organized by Co-ordinating Animal Welfare. CAW aims to work for unity within the movement, support local groups, increase the flow of information and encourage open discussion on successful tactics and campaigns.

It has a wide range of videos for loan to local groups.

SCIENTIST SPEAKS OUT

An English edition of Prof. Pietro Croce's book "Vivisection or Science" is being prepared by CIVIS, the group which campaigns against animal experiments on the grounds of their unscientific and harmful nature. The latest CIVIS report reveals the wealthiest USA animal societies and the high wages of their top employees as well as "exposing" those it regards as infiltrators in the anti-vivisection movement. CIVIS gives its support to the International League of Doctors for the Abolition of Vivisection and has various publications available, including Hans Reusch's "Naked Empress" and "Slaughter of the Innocent".

IVORY TRADE INVESTIGATION

The Environmental Investigation Agency is currently investigating the trade in live wild animals and illegal ivory, and is supporting efforts by African nations to achieve a total international ban on the trade in ivory. Film and information supplied by the agency has exposed the illegal ivory trade and has persuaded governments to support a ban. The EIA also undertakes campaigns to protect other wildlife, such as the pilot whales in the Faeroes.

The Ethical Consumer

FOR INFORMED DECISIONS

A new bi-monthly mag which enables readers to make better-informed decisions about the products they buy, has made its appearance. The Ethical Consumer covers environment/pollution, animals etc. etc. and each issue deals with a number of everyday consumer products, together with articles reviewing the industries and markets concerned. £9.00 for one years subscription. REALLY FREE RANGE?

A recent information sheet issued by the Free Range Egg Association (FREGG) mentions how to tell if "free range" eggs in shops really are free-range. This is somewhat easier now because of new EEC regulations.

The association encourages the production of genuine free-range eggs and inspects farms where possible. It issues an annual list of approved farms and shops and invites local AR groups to make lists of genuine free-range producers in their area.

The FREGG newsletter gives encouraging reports on several battery farms that are going over to free-range production.

Friends of the Earth

NATIVE WOODLANDS

Friends of the Earth launched a campaign in July to save Scotland's native woodlands. Speaking in Edinburgh, FOE spokesman Mike Thornton said "Once lost, native woodlands will be gone forever. Nobody has any idea how to recreate such a complex community of plants and animals. We have a last opportunity to save them before they slip away - we must take it". He said that existing conservation areas, national nature reserves and sites of special scientific interest were clearly failing.

The campaign follows research which shows that the native woodland could all but disappear by the end of the century, mainly because of the misguided policy of converting the woodland into conifer plantations.

FOE is now running about 10 other major campaigns, including Countryside, Agriculture and Pesticides. It is also carrying out surveys in several counties into changes in wildlife habitat and urging greater habitat protection.

The society has organised a letter-writing campaign against the flooding of Brazilian rainforest by a hydroelectric scheme and held a Day of Action on rainforests in April. It has many local groups and its Youth Section, Earth Action, is in the process of setting up active groups all over the country.

SPECIAL NEWSLETTER

A special newsletter for schools and colleges is to be produced by the Fund for the Replacement of Animals in Medical Experiments. This will be in addition to the quarterly scientific journal and quarterly newsletter which it publishes already. Other FRAME plans for the future include the expansion of its work on alternatives in behavioural research and the establishment of training courses in non-animal techniques. It is already running a number of validation trials for replacement alternative methods and has established a data bank to provide scientists with up-to-date info on non-animal toxicity tests. The fund, which has local support and fundraising groups (Friends of Frame) in different parts of the country, develops, evaluates and promotes biomedical research and toxicity testing not involving animals. Its work is undertaken by research groups, mainly at universities, and many companies support its research programme. (Eastgate House, 34 Stoney St., Nottingham NG1 1NB 0602 584740)

The Great British

Meat Out

18 March

MEATOUT INTERNATIONAL

"One Day Everyone Should Give Up Meat", the Great British MeatOut Day, took place on March 18. However, this year saw the first International MeatOut with activities also taking place in Australia and the USA.

In this country the event was jointly organised by Animal Aid, Animaline, CIWF, the Vegan Society and the Vegetarian Society and consisted of both national and local activities. There was a day of stalls at London's Covent Garden and, the night before, a gala evening at the Café Royal. Groups up and down the country organised taste-ins, cookery demos, information points and fundraising and there was leafletting of town centres, letters to papers and interviews on local radio.

The day raised £5,500 with money still coming in. Half the proceeds are to go to funding educational materials in the UK and the other half to the Sarvodaya Leaf Protein Feeding Scheme in Sri Lanka. This will be used to buy equipment to extract juice from green leaves in order to make leaf protein to combat malnutrition.

ELEFRIENDS

ELEPHANT PROTECTION

Four wildlife groups have joined forces to form Elefriends in an effort to put an end to the massive and unnecessary slaughter of the world's largest land mammal (100,000 elephants are massacred each year to fuel the ivory trade). The group's aims are to initiate the following urgent action:

- * To urge the British Government to persuade all countries to adopt and enforce an immediate ivory ban, particularly Hong Kong, the world's ivory trade centre.
 - * To persuade all CITES signatories to give the African elephant Appendix I status.
 - * To launch a major national and international public awareness campaign to stop the consumer demand for ivory.
 - * To collect at least 100,000 signatures, one for every elephant slaughtered annually, for their IVORY OUT pledge to be presented at October's CITES meeting in Switzerland.
 - * To establish a nationwide network of shops, offices, factories and schools as registered ELEFRIENDLY ZONES.
 - * To promote elephant conservation and strengthen anti-poaching forces in Africa.
- Elefriends also produces posters, car stickers, badges, T-shirts and sweatshirts in support of its campaign.

Health Humanity

ONE MILLION SIGNATURES

A million signature petition calling for an end to cruelty to cats and dogs in South Korea has now been presented. The petition was the work of the International Fund for Animal Welfare who are campaigning against the slaughter of dogs and cats for food in that country. Other IFAW campaigns include elephants in Uganda, seals in Canada, whales in the Azores and Faeroe Islands and dogs in the Philippines, Portugal and Turkey.

CALL FOR IVORY BAN

The Ivory Trade Review Group has called for an immediate ban on the ivory trade and for pressure to be brought on the world's main ivory importers (Japan, China and Hong Kong) to observe a worldwide ban. The latest survey by the group, which is funded by the Worldwide Fund for Nature and Wildlife Conservation International, has revealed that the African elephant is dying out more rapidly than previously thought and could be extinct within 15 years.

CRUEL CHARITIES

The BUAV's Health With Humanity campaign is now focusing on medical research charities which use and fund animal experiments, and is providing local groups with specific materials for campaigning in their own areas. The campaign, which challenges the use of animals in medical research, began by targetting academic institutions. To this end, a campus tour, with 32 venues, started last September. This included the use of the campaign's bus together with its informative displays and attracted a considerable amount of TV and radio coverage. Talks were given and debates held against vivisection. Health With Humanity has sent a mailing to Health Education and Promotion Units in each Area Health Authority, giving details of the campaign's arguments and encouraging distribution of its material as part of local health promotion work. The HWH video won a Gold Award at the 1988 New York Film and TV Festival and its campaign booklet is nearing completion.

WORK ON DISEASE

Work on Alzheimer's Disease is the subject of the latest grant from the Humane Research Trust, which has also given money for research into arthritis, diabetes, kidney disease, cancer, Parkinson's disease, brain tumours etc. The Trust promotes research into alternatives to animal experiments and funds new non-animal methods. It produces literature and has launched a special education/information pack. One particularly useful leaflet details how people can give to cancer research not involving animals. HRT local groups exist in different parts of the country. These raise funds and have had stalls at various shows.

LYNX

WORLD LYNX

Lynx is extending its anti-fur message to cover the world and is carrying out a poster campaign in North America and several European countries as well as opening an office in the USA. A new poster and another anti-fur video have been produced by the society, which recently published a report ("Mink Factories") together with CIWF about the appalling conditions of mink on fur factory farms.

Lynx opened its first shop in London's Covent Garden in January and is currently campaigning for the EEC to ban the leghold trap and for the labelling of fur coats obtained from animals trapped in the wild.

6,000 SCHOOLS

6,000 secondary schools and sixth form colleges have been sent an info pack by the National Anti-Vivisection Society as part of its campaign for students at universities and colleges of further education to have the right to refuse to participate in procedures that involve animals. A similar pack, which details the humane alternatives available, has also been sent to 1,000 further education establishments.

NAVS organised the World Day for Laboratory Animals demo in Leeds this year, as well as an anti-vivisection concert and exhibition in the town, with specific emphasis on the cruel experiments carried out at the local university. It has also instigated a letter writing campaign to the Home Secretary protesting against the duplication of animal experiments.

A DOG IS FOR LIFE

KENNEL WORTH

The National Canine Defence League has recently opened new kennels at Shoreham with room for 100 dogs and raised £100,000 to rebuild 40 kennels at its premises at Kenilworth. Fund-raising efforts continue to raise money for even more accommodation for lost, abandoned and unwanted canines.

No healthy dog is ever destroyed by the NCDL, which has a dog sponsorship scheme where people can "adopt" a long-term resident of one of its rescue centres throughout the country.

SUSPICIOUS CIRCUMSTANCES

A petition for official checks to be made on the export of domestic animal skins to help prevent the disappearance of cats in "suspicious circumstances" has been launched by National Petwatch, the group which monitors the loss and theft of family pets. It is also building up a dossier of evidence to present to the Home Office and has published a special report on cat stealing.

Petwatch, which is now a charity, also has a national network of missing pets bureaux where lost and found animals may be matched. Its publicity caravan has visited a number of towns, usually those with a high pet-loss problem, and it has a long-standing reward for the conviction of cat thieves.

The organization, which has been monitoring missing pets since 1983, has appeared frequently in the media drawing attention to the pet theft problem.

FUR FACTORY INFORMATION

Operation Fur Factory is aiming to put together a comprehensive list of all fur factory farms in the country, which will be made available to every group/activist requiring it, so campaigns can be launched to close the places down. Anyone with information on such factory farms should send the following details: size of farm, address and location, name and 'phone number of owner, type and number of animals and age of farm, together with photos of farm and animals, if possible.

Louise McInermey and Denise Gardener helping the LACS launch 10,000 balloons to draw attention to the suffering caused by badger digging

BADGER CAMPAIGN

May Day bank holiday saw the launch of the latest League Against Cruel Sports campaign to give the badger proper protection. Letters were sent to the editors of 1,000 local newspapers, hundreds of thousands of leaflets distributed and adverts placed in various publications. The campaign pledges active support for the country's 50 badger patrols and has set up an undercover team to obtain evidence of badger digging, with private prosecutions being taken against ferrier men. LACS aims to expose the inadequacies of the 1973 Badgers Act in stemming the escalation of badger persecution and is calling on parliament to amend the law to give better protection to badger setts. It also wants the law to be given the power to disqualify anyone who diggers from custody of dogs. 150,000 people have already signed a LACS petition for better badger protection. The campaign's film advert, which illustrates the cruelty of the brutality of hunting, has been shown at a cinema all over the country and on TV, and over 100,000 have signed a letter congratulating LACS on its 10th birthday. 1,000 trespass are currently in the hands of police lawyers and LACS are now taking steps to enforce one of their 15 West Country sanctuaries where wildlife is protected and the sport banned.

At much personal risk the League's sanctuary manager has taken some revealing film of the cruelty of stag hunting and LACS undercover agents also took film of the horrors of hare coursing which was later shown at a press conference. The League has now persuaded many landlords to prohibit hunting on over 500,000 acres and more than 100 local authorities have banned the hunt from their land. LACS sponsored dive boots are being used by a marine life rescue group to save and protect seals and a League supported campaign to stop the killing of foxes on a forest bird sanctuary has succeeded after the LACS suggestion of a electric fence to protect the nesting birds was taken up instead. The Mr. Berkman's conservation managed to persuade the local council to stop hunting out because of the high ground season because the hare were shot out of the League. VIN the society's 10th Model was awarded to a member who worked to save the hole to protect an exhausted fox from the night.

In the parliament, Mr. LACS has introduced a Bill, introduced earlier this year, to outlaw hare coursing and had exhibitions at the 10th Spring Conference in May, as well as at the Labour Party Local Government Conference, (83)87 Union St., London SE1 1SG 01 407 6979)

OTHER GROUPS ENCOURAGED

The Nottingham-based Prevent Unwanted Pets, which assists people on low incomes with the cost of having animals neutered and spayed, is encouraging the formation of similar groups in other areas. Formed in December 1986, PUP has helped to pay for over 150 dogs and cats to be doctored. It would now be glad to hear of similar new or existing groups in other areas and is willing to put people in touch with them. To date, groups have started or are planned in Leicester, Northampton, Grantham, Loughborough, Newark, Lincoln, Mansfield and Derby. (8 Previn Gardens, Marmion Rd. Estate, Nottingham, NG3 2HR)

IMPROVED CONDITIONS

As a result of Primate Action vigils outside the Institute of Psychiatry in London, the living conditions of monkeys and baboons kept for experimentation there have seen some improvement. The group, which campaigns against the use of primates in laboratory experiments also organised a march to the Institute as part of Primate Action Day earlier this year. Activities also took place in many other towns and cities throughout the country. (PO Box 254, London E5 8TB)

CABLE CAMPAIGN

A group which provides care for injured swans, Swan Rescue Service Europe, has produced posters, stickers and badges in support of a campaign calling for the burying of all cables underground. The campaign was prompted by the many swan deaths and injuries caused by cables that the service has been confronted with over the years. (Shotesham St. Mary, Norwich, Norfolk, NR15 1XX 0508 42248)

BIRDS AND TREES

The Royal Society for the Protection of Birds is calling for the planting of more hardwood trees in this country and wants the area of broad-leaved woodland doubled by the year 2000. According to the society, trees such as oaks and beech could be planted on surplus farmland and would help to conserve rainforests by supplying hardwood timber. Only 7 out of every 100 trees planted by the Forestry Commission since 1985 have been native broadleaves.

The RSPB is also asking for a ban on sand eel fishing in Shetland waters to enable seabirds' foodstocks to recover and it continues to press for new laws and policies to protect birds and their habitats.

The society has established over 100 nature reserves and has saved many birds from extinction in Britain with its special protection schemes. (The Lodge, Sandy, Beds, SG19 2DL)

WATCHDOG WINNERS

Three supporters of RSPCA Watchdog, Beryl Spence, Celia Hammond and Robin Webb were voted on to the RSPCA Council at this year's elections, after being recommended by the group, which is campaigning for the RSPCA to adopt a proper radical approach to the subject of animal welfare and for a true democratic structure within its ranks.

Amongst its proposals Watchdog wants the RSPCA to set up cheap spaying and neutering clinics and to take action against puppy farms. The RSPCA's response to the campaign has been to expel several Watchdog members.

20,000 ENQUIRIES

The growing interest in veganism is evidenced by the 20,000 enquiries currently being received by the Vegan Society each year. The society, which can well claim to be the originator of the cruelty-free ethic, advocates dispensing with all animal products and publishes leaflets, brochures, books and guides to that end. It plans to launch the "Cruelty-Free Data Base" to serve as the world's first comprehensive rapid access computerized info system on cruelty-free products and services.

Because of financial difficulties the society has had to cancel a number of publishing projects, so it could do with a few donations. Its newly published "Prison Information Pack" is part of the fine work it has done in recent years for vegans in prison.

BAD BLOOD

The horrific method used in Mexico to obtain blood from newborn calves for serum production has become the subject of a campaign by the World Society for the Protection of Animals. The society has persuaded the US Government to refuse import licences unless establishments concerned comply with the Humane Slaughter Act. WSPA has offices in several countries and recently launched a worldwide anti-fur campaign. It has helped to alleviate the suffering of animals in drought stricken parts of the world and other disaster areas and carried out an investigation into cruelty to bulls in Brazil and a campaign against bull-running there. It prevented suffering to horses in endurance competitions in Central America and is campaigning for the abolition of bullfighting and other cruel public spectacles. The society is also asking for the reimposition of the export ban on frogs legs in Bangladesh and recently gave practical and financial help to animal protection societies in Poland.

WILDLIFE HOSPITAL

The first Wildlife Teaching Hospital in Europe is being built at Aylesbury, Bucks. The director is to be Les Stocker, who runs a hospital for injured wild animals in the back garden of his home on the outskirts of the town. A local property developer has donated an 8 acre site for the £1 million hospital and the building costs have been raised from business sponsors and public donations. The hospital, which should be completed by Spring 1990, is desperately needed in order to treat and rehabilitate more injured animals and to provide education for vets and the public.

Membership of the Vegetarian Society is now 15,000, an increase of about 7,000 in the past 2 years, and its junior membership has increased from 400 to 2,000. After May 1990 the society is planning to publish its mag "The Vegetarian" monthly instead of bi-monthly and to have it distributed nationally through newsagents to increase availability to the public. Interest is also increasing in the Vegetarian Society Cookery School, which is now to operate full-time. The society sends free literature to enquirers, which now number about 500 per week and its youth dept. has sent out 200,000 info packs in the past 18 months. Money is now being raised to produce a new video for display in schools. A course for campaigners was held at the society's headquarters in April and the following month it had a much publicized stand at the Hyde Park Festival of British Food and Farming. • LOCAL GROUPS

Action for Animals

ACTION FOR ANIMALS (Brentwood and Havering)

Had Xmas campaign against meat-eating with street leafletting etc. and took part in World Day demo against a local vivisection lab. Are organizing a Living Without Cruelty exhibition and some members have started a rescue service for injured pigeons.

ANIMAL ACTION

(PO Box 236, Leighton Buzzard, Beds, LU7 8EW)

Had an exhibition stand in Milton Keynes and are campaigning against safety testing on animals.

ANIMAL RIGHTS CAMBRIDGE

Publish local newsletter and have now started youth group. Campaigning to keep Cambridge a fur-free zone. Took part in inspection of battery hen unit just outside Cambridge and discovered awful conditions. Gathered evidence through photos and videos to show where laws were being broken there. Has now been forwarded to Ministry of Agriculture. Collected over £200 for West Norfolk Seal Rescue (sanctuary for sick and injured seals). Also collecting for Digit Fund to help finance gorilla sanctuary in Virunga Mountains (Africa). Held exhibition on Primate Action Day in city centre and an anti-factory farming demo in August. Have had very good response from local school-children constantly asking for material for projects.

ANIMAL RIGHTS EDUCATION NETWORK

(312, 198 Dumbarton Rd., Partick, Glasgow, G11 6UN)

Hold 3 stalls a week in city centre. Produce several leaflets, including one on where to shop cruelty-free in Glasgow area. Planning to start a Scottish branch of Petwatch.

ANIMALS INFORMATION CENTRE

(Grover Walk, Corringham Town Centre, Essex)

Open 6 days a week, 10am to 5pm. Has info and literature on all areas of animal abuse.

BASILDON ANIMAL RIGHTS

Held World Day demo against Beechams Laboratories at Stock. Have produced leaflet in connection with new campaign against the place.

BEXHILL ANIMAL RIGHTS

(PO Box 5, Bexhill-on-Sea, E. Sussex)

Held all day Living Without Cruelty exhibition in July with veg. food, videos, street theatre and music.

BIRMINGHAM ANIMAL AID

Have produced new "Meat is Suicide" leaflet pointing out health risks of flesh-eating. Organized a pledge campaign against fur-sales at local Rackhams store (where the closure of the fur dept. has now been announced). Hold regular meetings with speakers from various groups.

BIRMINGHAM POLYTECHNIC ANIMAL RIGHTS GROUP

Organized demos at furshops and circuses.

BOGNOR AND CHICHESTER ANIMAL RIGHTS GROUP

Hoping to set up a charity shop. Had anti-hunting stall at local fayre. Campaigning to stop wildfowling shooting on local nature reserve. Got 5,300 signatures on petition. This was rejected but the shooting lease was shortened. Campaign is now continuing.

BRADFORD ANIMAL RIGHTS GROUP

Got publicity for Great British MeatOut. Set up food stall and invited passers-by to sample vegetarian food.

BROMSGROVE ANIMAL AID

Has monthly open meetings with lectures, videos and informed discussions.

BROXBOURNE ANIMAL RIGHTS GROUP

(PO Box 66, Broxbourne, Herts)

Held demos outside Gerry Cottle's circus (performing animals) and got extensive local press coverage. Number of people decided not to enter circus after talking to demonstrators. During one picket a member witnessed an elephant being struck over the head by a trainer. Ringmaster described protestors as "urban terrorists". Have also raised £175 for feeding and spaying of feral cats.

CAMBRIDGE ANTI-BLOODSPORTS SOCIETY

(Box CABS, Free Press, 25 Gwydir St., Cambridge, CB1 2LG)

Campaigning against Cambridgeshire Foxhounds and local illegal bloodsports. Publish a newsletter and hold stalls on Saturdays with leaflets and a petition. Also leaflet rural areas. Aiming to give talks at schools and organize activities for children and young people. Hold quarterly meetings with speakers or videos.

CHESTER ANIMAL RIGHTS

Held demo outside local college where cruel experiments on mice, rabbits and rats take place.

COVENTRY ANIMAL ALLIANCE

Had stall in city for 6 days, attracted a lot of interest and collected nearly £100. Campaigned against sale of furs at Rackhams in Birmingham. One of their members has started making vegan toiletries on £40 a week government scheme.

DEVON AND SOMERSET RESIDENTS ASSOCIATION FOR DEER PROTECTION

Aim to outlaw staghunting through debate. Have produced a booklet available from LACS.

DUDLEY ANIMAL RESCUE

(PO Box 8, Tividale, Warley, W. Midlands, B69 1QJ)

Pays for veterinary treatment for sick and injured animals. Feeds and fosters abandoned and stray animals until permanent homes can be found. Currently raising money to pay for more rescue work and to rent land for a rescue centre.

EAST LONDON ANIMAL RIGHTS

(PO Box 216, Leyton, London E15 4NT)

Have picketed local circuses with performing animals. Petitioning in support of campaign for council ban - much support from councillors. Sit-ins by group contributed to closing down of an Ilford furshop. Leaflet in shopping centres and door-to-door. Hold street stalls and pub collections. Organise meetings and give talks to schools and clubs.

Enfield Animal Alliance

Protesters outside Cottles' circus.

ENFIELD ANIMAL ALLIANCE

Demonstrated outside Cottle's circus.

HACKNEY & ISLINGTON ANIMAL RIGHTS CAMPAIGN

(Box 17, 198 Blackstock Rd., London N5)

Started campaign against local furshop and regular pickets with leaflets, banners etc. Also picketed local McDonalds and gave out leaflets. Campaigned against proposed Hudson Bay fur warehouse in Hackney and regular pickets of Boots protesting at company's tests on animals.

A LION, a lion-tamer and a ringmaster were in centre stage of Ilford's shopping centre on Saturday.

They were part of the East London Animal Rights Campaign against keeping animals in circus captivity.

Members dressed as circus animals and trainers petitioned and handed out leaflets to curious crowds.

HASTINGS ANIMAL RIGHTS GROUP

(PO Box 71, Hastings, E. Sussex, TN34 3JW)

Demos helped close Eastbourne's only fur shop. Held debate with a furrier which attracted 80 people. (Furrier claimed that the Lynx video was fabricated, that leafletting was terrorism and that he sometimes cried himself to sleep because of the ALF!)

HOUNDS OFF THE NEW FOREST

Amalgamation of local anti-bloodsports groups. Organised 100 mile walk from Lyndhurst to Min. of Ag. offices in London to present 31,000 name petition for hunting to be banned in the New Forest.

HULL & DISTRICT ANIMAL RIGHTS

Supporting moves by Humberside County Council to adopt an Animals' Charter.

LAKE LAND ANIMAL AID

Had successful campaign against local dept. store that stocked fur coats and hats. Handed leaflets out outside. Store has now stopped selling fur.

LEICESTER ANIMAL AID

Organised local Living Without Cruelty evening. 175 people attended and there was good local press coverage. Also leafletted 5,000 homes and had a library display on factory farming and vegetarianism.

LEICESTER ANIMAL CONCERN

(c/o 70 High St., Leicester)

Lobbying council for ban on animal circuses. When Gandey's circus visited city, group held alternative circus with juggling, fire-eating, unicycling, tight-rope walking etc. to show how good time could be had without imprisoning and persecuting animals. Plenty of publicity and a positive image. Took down circus fly-posters and persuaded shop owners to take down circus ads. Held pickets. Bad publicity for circus when one of the protesters was attacked. Circuses with animals have now been banned from that particular park following complaints from local residents about smell, noise and rubbish.

Continuing biohazard campaign against Leicester University, which is increasing labs and number of animals. Also anti-McDonalds protests. Published new leaflet "What's your poison?" about alarming state of nation's health due to vivisection, meat-eating etc. Held an Alternative Health Evening with speakers, videos and vegan food, where discussed problems caused by wrong diet, modern medicine, environmental pollution.

LIVERPOOL UNIVERSITY ANIMAL ACTION

(c/o Students Union, Bedford St. North, Liverpool)

Held a vigil and laid wreath outside University Dept. of Veterinary Research in protest against cruel experiments performed there. Wide local press coverage.

Anthony Lee

LONDON GREENPEACE

Organised Anti-McDonalds Fayre in London in October with stalls etc. Co-ordinated World Day of Action against McDonalds.

LOWESTOFT ANIMAL AID

World Day for Lab Animals - held protest outside gates of Life Science Research at Occold against cruel experiments there to test drugs and household and industrial products.

MANCHESTER ANIMAL PROTECTION GROUP

(75 Piccadilly, Manchester, M1 2BU)

Fur shop they picketed for 3 years, finally closed down. Organised week of action against cruel experiments, at Manchester University Medical School.

N.E. LONDON ANIMAL AID

(PO Box 254, London E5 8TB)

Produced leaflet on Living Without Cruelty with addresses of local cruelty-free outlets.

NORWICH ANIMALS CHARTER

(PO Box 30, Norwich, NR1 4DT)

Leafletting house-to-house and in city centre. Organised vegan vegetarian tasting day with stalls. Held exhibition at a library on "Cruelty-Free Living". Publish very good mag "The Extending Circle" every 2 months. Give talks to schools and appeared on local TV programme. Campaigning against cruel experiments at University of East Anglia. Letters and a visit from NAC persuaded a stall holder in Norwich market to stop selling real fur toys.

Campaigning (with Norwich & Norfolk Anti Bloodsports Group) for hunting ban on land controlled by county council. Already have over 10,000 signatures on petition and have taken campaign to various Norfolk towns. Have Youth Section and have written to schools to get support for this.

PORTSMOUTH ANIMAL RIGHTS GROUP

(Box D, Time for Change, 167 Fawcell Rd., Southsea, Hants, PO1 0DH)

Had great success with campaign to make some local lakes safer for wildlife. 20 bags of discarded tackle etc. was collected and all but one of the lakes are now "no fishing" areas. Regular clean-up of final one has been organised. A snow goose, whose leg had been tangled in fishing line for several weeks, was caught and its leg saved.

ROSS ANIMAL RIGHTS

Sponsored walk raised over £600 for fund to save the black rhino in Africa. Planning a similar event for IFAW and also jumble sale to raise funds for Brook Hospital for Horses and Donkeys in Cairo. Involved in local animal rescue and rehoming work. Organizing film show with Animals Film, Hidden Crimes etc.

SCOTTISH RESCUED ANIMAL SANCTUARY FUND

(312, 198 Dumbarton Rd., Partick, Glasgow, G11 6UN)

Attempting to raise enough money to build and sustain sanctuary on land made available to the Fund. Asking for a commitment from people for donations and help.

SOUTH DEVON ANIMAL RIGHTS

PO Box 20, Paignton, Devon, TQ3 1XZ)

Leafletted outside Gerry Cottle's circus at Newton Abbot racecourse. Offered £1,000 reward (together with Teignbridge Green Party) for info leading to successful prosecution of circus owners or trainers for cruelty.

SOUTHEND ANIMAL AID

(PO Box 21, Southend-on-Sea, Essex)

Organised a local Living Without Cruelty concert.

SOUTH HUMBERSIDE ANIMAL RIGHTS CAMPAIGN

(PO Box 6, Scunthorpe, DN17 1HW)

Produces newsletter. Has stalls in Scunthorpe town centre and at local festivals. Holds public meetings and is organising another Cruelty-Free Festival. Protested against animal circus which took place at local football club (such circuses are already banned from council land). Had interview on local radio and picketed each performance. Succeeded in request to county council to make circus remove fly-posters and got large number of shops to remove circus ads. Fairly confident football club won't allow circus again.

Campaigning against building of local chicken factory farms by Unigate and spoke out at public inquiry about this. Have leafletted against McDonalds and Boots and members regularly sabotage local hunt. Got local publicity for Great British MeatOut and plan to start campaign against dissection in local schools.

SOUTH LONDON ANIMAL AID

(PO Box 594, London SW9 8QG)

Held a march for Primate Action Day, which attracted about 500 people. Do street stalls and leafletting.

STEVENAGE ANIMAL RIGHTS GROUP

Have had up to 70 people at meetings. Hold stalls in town centre. Campaigning against Glaxo's proposed new labs in the town. Big 2 year campaign planned including delivery of information pack on animal rights and biohazards to every local household.

SUNDERLAND ANIMAL RIGHTS

Have done door-to-door leafletting and produced local guide to shops selling free-range eggs. Hold regular stall in town centre and organized a cruelty-free evening with videos, stalls etc.

SURREY & HAMPSHIRE ANIMAL RIGHTS COUNCIL

For more than 2 years have monitored Guildford market with a view to improving conditions for animals. Demonstrated, wrote letters etc. Succeeded in finally getting water supplied for the animals.

SWANSEA ANIMAL RIGHTS

(PO Box 53, Swansea, SA1 1BW)

Hold stalls, including one at local "Country Fayre" where they took £90. Have already got parade of foxhounds banned from event and are going to campaign to get bloodsports stalls removed in future. Almost 1,000 people signed their Euro-campaign petition against leg-hold traps. Have a display window in Swansea and put on a different display every week (vegan/anti-fur/alternative medicine etc.) Leaflet in city centre and publish newsletter. Held exhibition at local environmental forum and have regular meetings with films etc. Petitioning local council to ban circuses with performing animals. Gave £200 donation to an animal sanctuary. Supported World Day for Laboratory Animals with anti-vivisection leafletting.

VEGAN ACTION GROUP

(136 Ingram St., Glasgow, G1 1EJ)

Local branch of Lewis closed fur dept. after leafletting and petitions. Had demo at fur and leather sale. Petitioning to get council to ban animal circuses. Produce leaflets on McDonalds, pets etc. and a very good magazine.

WESTERN ANIMAL RIGHTS ALLIANCE

(Box 174, 37 Stokes Croft, Bristol, BS2 3PY)

Have produced leaflet on Living Without Cruelty in Bristol, giving details of local shops that sell vegetarian/vegan foodstuffs and non-animal tested cosmetics and toiletries.

WEST KENT BADGER GROUP

Recently formed to protect badgers in West Kent area.

WEST WALES ANIMAL AID

(PO Box 2, Llandysal, Dyfed, SA41 4EB)

Have brought out leaflets on factory farming and vivisection in Welsh and English. Also leading campaign to close down local mink farm which has been operating without permission.

WIRRAL ANIMAL RIGHTS

Donated copies of the book "Some People Don't Eat Meat" to all local primary schools.

WORCESTER ANIMAL RIGHTS

One young member organised a petition at school against killing and plucking of chickens in lessons by Rural Science teacher. 250 pupils signed. Hoping the slaughter will now be stopped.

• DIRECT ACTION

HUNT SABOTEURS

"Howl" - Cambridge sab calls hounds from the hunt

The Hunt Saboteurs Association exists to take non-violent direct action against all bloodsports, including hunting, shooting and angling. Most action takes place against hunting with hounds, but grouse shoots and fishing competitions get sabotaged too. The association supplies information about tactics and its tactics officer has now given over 90 talks to different groups. The HSA has now opened its own offices in Exeter and has a group for children called "Foxcubs" which publishes its own magazine. Hunt saboteur groups are active in many parts of the country. The following summary covering the beginning of the last hunting season has been taken from the association's publication "HOWL".

IRELAND

Activity is growing with groups in Belfast, Coleraine and Mid-Antrim. On November 19th two hunts were sabotaged (successfully) on the same day for the first time ever in Northern Ireland. One abandoned their meet after only 90 minutes hunting. On Boxing Day saboteurs caused a hunt to pack up after only 50 minutes. Most hunts within striking distance of Belfast ceased advertising their meets within a matter of weeks.

NORTH-WEST

Active HSA groups in Merseyside, Wigan, Manchester, Rochdale, Preston, Blackburn, Bury, Carlisle, Kendal, Leicester and West Cumbria. Merseyside HSA were particularly busy with many visits to at least 10 different hunts. Many of the groups in the area concentrated on the Holcombe Harriers, who have been sabotaged often they are now losing both support and riders. During a hit on the opening day, the Cumberland Farmers Foxhounds hunt supporters turned over the saboteurs van injuring one of the occupants. Police issued charges against some members of the hunt.

SCOTLAND

Several members of the Linlithgow and Stirlingshire hunt have been fined for attacks on hunt saboteurs, with fines totalling several hundred pounds. The hunt are in financial difficulties, which may get worse after hunt sales obtained video evidence of them trespassing on a privately owned farm where hunting is banned. The video is very effective and there is growing public opposition to the hunt.

NORTH-EAST

Groups in Newcastle, Durham, Sunderland and Morpeth. Northumberland Beagling Festival was successfully sabotaged and cut from 5 weeks to just one. In December a saboteur was injured by a rider while trying to prevent a fox from being dug out.

YORKS

Groups in Bradford and Huddersfield. A better start to the season than the previous year with less than a dozen arrests compared with over 80. Early in September the Pennine Foxhounds were sabotaged for the first time ever when saboteurs successfully gained control of the pack. A hunt supporter was struck by a rock and injured after throwing stones at a car.

WALES

Groups in Aberystwyth and Bangor. In November saboteurs arrived in the nick of time to stop Monmouthshire foxhunt terriermen digging a fox out of its earth.

MIDLANDS

West Midlands saboteurs prevented the slaughter of young foxes when they were effective in calling hounds out of a covert during a cubhunt. Nottingham HSA was very active with visits to 4 different hunts.

GREATER LONDON

Saboteurs from South London and the Surrey Hunt Action Group were very active against the Surrey Union Foxhounds.

EAST ANGLIA AREA

Groups in Norwich, Great Yarmouth, Peterborough, Ipswich, Cambridge, Sudbury, Stevenage, Luton, Colchester and Halstead. A sabotage of the West Norfolk Foxhounds caused them to pack up for the day. At the opening meet of the hunt, saboteurs laid false trails in woods, which hounds followed, but 3 sabs were injured by hunt supporters, one of whom was arrested and charged with criminal damage and assault. In early November saboteurs stopped a dig-out by sitting on the earth. Also in November the Puckeridge & Thurlow foxhunt was prevented from killing when false trails were laid and earths unblocked.

COTSWOLD AREA

The Lesdon Vale Bassets (a hare-hunt) was successfully sabotaged but at the end of the hunt a hunt supporter rammed the saboteurs' van with his tractor and ran over a saboteur. The hunt thug was later charged by the police.

"Howl" - Southern sabs bring hunt to a halt. Huntsman pleads with police to stop them.

KENT & EAST SUSSEX

Groups in Tunbridge Wells, Hastings, Herne Bay and Sidcup. Saboteurs had good success against the Southdown & Eridge Foxhounds and the East Sussex & Romney Marsh Foxhounds with very few kills when they were present. A saboteur was seriously beaten by thugs from the Old Surrey & Burstow Foxhounds and ended up with his leg in plaster.

W. SUSSEX, HANTS, BERKS ETC.

Groups in Basingstoke, E. Berkshire, Farnham, Southampton and Portsmouth. Successful sabotages against several fox and hare hunts. One pack of beagles packed up after only an hour. Charges appeared likely against a hunt thug who attempted to run down 2 saboteurs in front of a policeman. Hunt sabotage began regularly on the Isle of Wight.

OXFORD AND AVON

Groups in Oxford area, Bristol and Bath. Several hunts "visited". Old Berkshire Foxhounds stopped advertising their meets because of action by saboteurs.

ANIMAL LIBERATION FRONT

The Animal Liberation Front carries out direct action against animal abuse in the form of rescuing animals and causing financial loss to animal abusers, usually through the damage and destruction of property. Their short term aim is to save as many animals as possible and directly disrupt the practice of animal abuse - their long term aim is to end all animal suffering by forcing animal abuse companies and individuals out of business. It is a non-violent campaign, activists taking precautions not to harm any person or animal. Because ALF actions are against the law activists work anonymously, either in groups or individually, and do not have a central contact address or any centralised organization or co-ordination. The following is a summary of some actions over the past year.

AVON AND SOMERSET

£5,000 damage was caused to Santus circus which uses animals - paint was sprayed on the big top, caravans and the booking office and 6 lorries and 6 cars were paintstripped. The circus owner said afterwards "I don't think we'll come again".

A fence was ripped up to free pheasants from pens and "ALF" was painted on pen walls.

BERKS

A packing shed was set alight at Bell Farm poulterers in Wexham.

BUCKS

The Pyke Biggs meat factory in Milton Keynes was destroyed by fire - more than £10 million damage. Windows of butchers shops were smashed. A hoax sparked off a major bomb alert at Amersham International's animal laboratories in Little Chalfont and there was an incendiary device attack at McDonalds in Milton Keynes.

CAMBRIDGESHIRE

An incendiary device was sent to Professor Ian Glynn, head of physiology at Cambridge University.

CHESHIRE

Damage estimated at over £1,000 was caused when butchers windows were bricked in Chester in May.

DEVON

An incendiary device planted in Dingles last December in Plymouth devastated the store. Dingles directors have decided not to have a fur department when the store re-opens. A dog, gerbils, hamsters and budgerigars were taken in a raid on Bicton College of Agriculture in August. Equipment was smashed. In the same month 2 ill-treated dogs were rescued from a farm in Axminster. In June there was an arson attempt on the science block of Polytechnic South West in Plymouth.

ESSEX

£50,000 damage was caused to Portakabin Building Systems who were hiring out offices to Glaxo who carry out animal experiments. 5 incendiary devices destroyed 2 portacabins and severely damaged 2 others.

HAMPSHIRE

In Southampton activists have been rescuing lizards and snakes being caught in a scientists collection traps. Damage was caused at a deer farm.

HERTS

4 meat trade vans were paintstripped. "Remove the poster or we'll remove the window" letters sent to over 200 shops advertising Gerry Cottles circus which uses animals.

HUMBERSIDE

Chickens were rescued from a Unigate breeding farm and the company's new plant in Scunthorpe received a hoax bomb call resulting in production being halted for several hours. In Hull a hole was cut in an animal compound, freeing 2 chickens.

KENT

The Institute of Psychiatry animal research lab at Bethlem Hospital in Beckenham has been closed down following a concerted ALF campaign. During a raid in which damage was done, documents were taken giving names and addresses of lab connections and further actions followed. Research workers had homes painted and cars paintstrippered. Damage was caused to Farrington school in Chislehurst and to 2 of its minibuses because they bought animals for dissection from the Institute.

In February at Hemsell Mead Farm in Edenbridge raiders rescued 33 chickens and damaged farm vehicles. Last year 20 chickens had been taken. In May in Tonbridge windows of fishing tackle shops were damaged with etching fluid. One had previously had its windows broken on several occasions. Bromley High School had windows and doors covered with etching fluid and slogans daubed because of animals being used for dissection.

In February £4,000 damage was caused when a truck was set alight and hundreds of eggs were smashed at a poultry farm in Deal. More than £1,300 damage was caused at the home of Wellcome labs vet John Scarnell. His home was paintbombed and cars were paintstrippered and had tyres slashed. Though retired, Scarnell continues to receive a pension from Wellcome. A greyhound racing stadium was evacuated after a hoax incendiary device call.

Beckenham & Penge Advertiser

LIVERPOOL

Many thousands of pounds damage resulted from brickings and etching ~~flax~~ actions at McDonalds and Kentucky Fried Chicken outlets. Damage at one alone was estimated at £5,000. An incendiary device was planted in Lewises department store which has a fur dept. A fire caused damage at Liverpool's Small Animal Centre.

LONDON

In June there were threats to burn down the Hudsons Bay fur trading company if the firm moved their premises to Hackney. An attempted raid on Guys hospital animal house was aborted when activists were spotted by a security guard. There were claims that eggs in supermarkets had been poisoned. An incendiary device was sent to the London office of the Fur Review publishing company. Incendiary devices were planted in 3 stores - Harrods, Selfridges and House of Fraser in Oxford Street. The latter has since closed its fur dept. As part of the campaign against Bethlem Hospital animal labs the home of the vet in charge of looking after the lab rats was painted and a medical supply premises in Streatham was attacked. Butchers and fur shop windows were smashed and meat vans were paintstrippered. The homes and cars of vivisection workers at St. Georges Hospital, Tooting, where animals are experimented on, were attacked.

"I GIVE UP" ... Colin Hart at his wrecked poultry farm.

The Kearsley battery farm that was closed down after the ALF actions
Manchester Evening News

MANCHESTER

Paintstripper was poured over 7 vans at Manchester Abattoir, Bradford. Damage was estimated at several thousand pounds. A Kearsley farmer gave up his battery chicken business when 3 empty sheds were destroyed by fire and 52 chickens were rescued from another. The farmer said "If I catch these people I will kill them". Paint was daubed on butchers, fur and leather shops and thousands of pounds damage caused to burger bars.

MIDLANDS

Last December an incendiary device was planted at Rackhams in Birmingham because the store houses a fur dept. The offices of the Fur Review printers received an incendiary device marked with a warning and a few months later there was a hoax scare at the firm. Warnings that meat had been poisoned in 2 Sainsburys stores resulted in all fresh meat being cleared from shelves and shoppers were urged to return the meat they had bought. Butchers shops were damaged - one has since closed down. A Coventry butchers van was damaged.

SHROPSHIRE

McDonalds in Shrewsbury was set on fire using incendiary devices.

SURREY

In June an explosive device was found at the North East Surrey College of Technology where animal experiments are carried out. The Normandy home of Dr. Frederick Brown was daubed and his car paintstripped. Brown works at the Wellcome labs and has conducted research at the Institute for Animal Health in Pirbright. During attacks at the homes of Beechams lab workers, in Redhill, paint was splattered over cars and houses.

Kent & Sussex Courier

HUNT LEADER Mr Mike Errey of Cowbeech with the vans which were damaged in a fire bomb attack by animal rights activists

In June a van was gutted by fire and an incendiary device was found under another vehicle at the Cowbeech home of Michael Errey, Joint Master of Kent and Sussex Mink Hounds. It's the second such incident in 12 months - in August '88 another vehicle at Errey's home was damaged and incendiary devices were found under 3 others.

In March red paint was showered over the home of Michael Fleming, a microbiologist involved with Shamrock Farms, Vetlab Services and Wellcome. In June a gun shop and 4 butchers in Heathfield, Bexhill and Hastings had "ALF" slogans written in etching fluid on the windows. £15,000 damage was caused to the gun shop alone. A lorry belonging to a meat packing company was damaged in Hastings.

The chief vet at Bethlem Hospital animal labs resigned after his home in East Grinstead was attacked in one of the many actions which ultimately closed the labs. Rabbit hutches at East Grinsteads Queen Victoria Hospital were sprayed with slogans.

YORKSHIRE

Actions were taken against butchers and fur shops. A meat factory was covered with paint and sugar was put in the petrol tanks of lorries and locks were glued.

WALES

Boots the Chemist in Newport was sprayed with "Boots mutilate beagles" and "ALF". In February 20 rabbits were rescued from barbaric conditions at a rabbit farm in the Blaenpennal area. An incendiary device action at House of Fraser's Howells store in Cardiff, which has a fur dept., caused thousands of pounds worth of smoke damage last December. 40 chickens were rescued from a Caerphilly battery farm. In June, in Cwmbran town centre "Meat is Murder" and "ALF" slogans were daubed on 2 shops selling meat.

SCOTLAND

In March extensive fire damage was caused to the Macaulay Land Use Research Institute (which is involved in research on deer, cows, sheep and goats) and the Poultry Research Centre, both near Edinburgh. Documents representing years of research work were destroyed. Windows were broken at butchers shops, fur shops and Boots the Chemist and warnings were given that meat in a Glasgow supermarket was contaminated.

IRELAND

£2,000 damage was caused when 2 miles of fencing was cut down at the Ballymena Coursing Club ground at Crebilly in July. Slogans were daubed on the grandstand wall. The same action was carried out last year. In March the Organiser of Ulster's Game and Country Fair, Albert Titterington, claimed he was forced to move home and go ex-directory after his home and car had been attacked a number of times. He said there had been over 300 separate incidents of actions against him. Butchers shops were damaged by fire and broken windows.

AUSTRALIA

In Tasmania a black-faced cormorant was rescued from a university animal house and is being rehabilitated back into the wild.

CANADA

In April in Vancouver a poultry market and a meat market were both destroyed by fire in the same night. One of the owners said it would take at least a month before he could open again. Other meat premises were sprayed with slogans. Locks were glued, paint sprayed and "ALF" daubed earlier this year over several fur shops and a fur auction premises. Locks were glued at a taxidermy shop and windows shot with sling-shots. One of the fur shops was paint-bombed twice again in the following 2 months. A banner declaring "Liberate the animals - ALF" was placed across an overpass.

FRANCE

In the Northern Oise region a private drug-testing lab was raided - 42 dogs were rescued, lab equipment was smashed and all the scientists notes were destroyed. Fur shops were drenched with red paint.

GERMANY

In January a fur farm at Grunemoor, near Vechta, was raided and a building comprising offices, drying and machinery rooms and a warehouse for pelts were set on fire. Other buildings were sprayed with "Murderers". More than 20,000 pelts were destroyed, valued at more than DM2 million (£600,000). The building damage was about DM700,000 (£250,000). 600 mink were released from a breeding farm.

ITALY

In the district of Trieste hundreds of pigeons were liberated from a veterinary lab where they are used in medical tests. 4,000 mink were liberated from a farm in Pordenone. A bomb hoax disrupted a fur show at a theatre in Modena. Several butchers shops were sprayed with slogans. In May the Maggioni pharmaceutical firm in Milan was set on fire by means of small gas cylinders. The Italian Special Branch commented that this latter action constituted a considerable leap in sophistication for the ALF. Over a thousand mice, rabbits and rats were rescued and over £40,000 damage was caused to equipment at the Experimental Surgery Centre in Padova.

JAPAN

29 wild monkeys trapped for vivisection were released back into the wild, the cage was destroyed and "ALF" slogans were sprayed.

POLAND

"Your body is a grave of animals" graffiti sprayed and slogans on a hunting shop included "Hunting - killing for pleasure" and "Death sold here".

USA

1,231 animals (950 mice, 50 rats, 16 rabbits, 14 guinea pigs, 10 frogs) were rescued from the University of Arizona, Tucson, in April. The buildings were set on fire, causing $200,000 damage.

The vice president for research said research projects were possibly set back months. A raid at Loma Linda University Medical Centre saved 5 puppies, scheduled for use in heart transplant research, 2 adult dogs used for breeding and 2 of the 100 goats kept there as a breeding colony of organ research "donors". Raiders took documents and sprayed the lab with red paint. Damage was estimated at between $6,000 and $10,000.

In January 3 dogs were rescued from the Veterans Administration Medical Centre in Tucson, Arizona. Fire damage was caused to a Monterey meat packing firm and "ALF" and "Meat is Murder" sprayed on the walls. 40 rabbits were rescued in March during a raid on a rabbit breeding and testing lab in California. The lab property was damaged with paint and paintstripper.

Red paint was splashed on 4 Philadelphia fur stores. A fake bomb was planted at Stanford University animal labs, still under construction.

In August a highway sign giving directions to a rodeo in Tennessee was spray painted and others uprooted and discarded (the previous year nails were scattered in the car park, discouraging people from entering).

Also in August an Interstate Dept. of Transportation sign advertising an Exxon Gasoline Station in Tennessee was spray painted.

This action was taken in support of the Exxon boycott following its Valdez, Alaska, oil spill which continues to kill wildlife.

SWEDEN

In Malmo 8 fur shops had locks glued, windows painted and leaflets about the cruelty of fur farming stuck on them. In September 5 hunting towers were pulled down in the Lund area and destroyed with a saw, and in Perstorp 8 hunting towers were pulled down and similarly destroyed. A trap for catching crows was destroyed. 25 chinchillas were rescued from a fur farm and 7 hens were rescued from a battery farm. In March 14 cats were rescued from a lab animal supplier - mostly female and at least one was pregnant. 13 mink were liberated from a mink farm near Helsingborg, in the South, and around 80 mink were painted with a non-poisonous colour. The following night 15 mink were liberated from another mink farm in North West Scania. A dog was rescued from a dark garage where it was tied up. In April 24 puppies were rescued from terrible conditions at a puppy farm - it was the third raid on the farm and 83 dogs have been rescued in all. On the same night 21 hens were rescued from a battery farm. 8 cats were rescued from a Lund University laboratory.

2 boys, aged 5 and 6, freed 1882 mink from a fur farm in North Jutland. It came to light when the parents insurance company and that of the breeder (who lost 163,000 marks) argued in court as to whether the children could foresee the results of their actions. The boys stated they thought the mink were cats and opened the enclosures to play with them. The mink apparently didn't hang around to play. The boys kept opening cages till a mink bit one of them. The court ruled that the children were responsible.

FRANCE

In May about 100 dogs, cats, rabbits, monkeys, rats and ferrets were rescued from a lab in Lyons. A lab official said the theft of the animals represented 5 years of work completely lost in some areas of research.

EVA BATT

Eva, who died on February 25th, was a mainstay of the Vegan Society for almost 30 years. She was a tireless worker for the cause of veganism and compassion towards animals and was active well into her eighties. She travelled widely promoting the cause, was the author of several excellent books on vegan cooking and was responsible for the commodities pages in The Vegan for over 20 years. She wrote hundreds of letters to manufacturers and the variety of vegan foods available today is in no small part due to her work. The world is a better place for her having lived in it and the finest memorial we all can give her is to redouble our efforts in the promotion of veganism and animal liberation.

ZETTEE TODD

Zettee, of Shipley, Bradford, died in hospital on Xmas Day after contracting pneumonia. She dedicated her life to the cause of anti-vivisection and was one of the BUAV's longest standing campaigners, being secretary of the society's Bradford Branch for over 50 years. She organised demonstrations, ran an anti-vivisection shop and arranged countless street stalls in the Bradford area. Her enthusiasm, courage and dedication will be sorely missed.

GARY ROWSON

A fine and dedicated campaigner, Gary was involved in many different ways in the struggle for animal liberation. He took part in demonstrations and local animal rights group activity, but his major contribution was in the field of direct action. As a committed ALF activist he helped rescue many animals from suffering as well as inflicting considerable financial loss on their abusers.

When he moved from his Scunthorpe home to live in Australia, Gary continued his activities with the Action for Animals group, once again rescuing animals and being part of a team which caused $1 million to the property of animal exploiters. Despite several arrests his spirit remained unbroken and it was because of sad personal circumstances that he decided to end his life after returning to England last year.

Gary was only in his early twenties, yet hundreds of animals owe their lives and freedom to him. He will be remembered by fellow activists with deep and lasting affection.

CONTROVERSIAL ACTIONS - HYSTERICAL REACTIONS

by Ronnie Lee

Over the past year several actions by animal liberationists have caused controversy, and what I would describe as an hysterical reaction, within the movement because they have involved a danger to life. The following articles constitute a discussion of various aspects of this situation.

BEYOND NONVIOLENCE

More and more often we hear animal rights representatives condemning the actions of the ALF etc. on the grounds that they are "violent". But is the dividing line between violence and non-violence (wherever that may be) really the dividing line between right and wrong?

First it might help to define "violence". According to my dictionary it is something which involves "great force or strength or intensity" and thus it can cover a great many situations. In animal rights terms, however, "violence" is normally used to refer to actions where property is damaged or where the lives of others are harmed or threatened.

This inevitably leads to some confusion because, in moral terms, actions which only damage property are surely different to those which harm or threaten life. It is, therefore, really not helpful for people in the movement to describe them both as "violence". "Property damage" would be a far better term to describe the first kind.

Moral arguments concerning damage to property are really rather straightforward. If such damage directly saves animals from death or suffering, or if it does so indirectly by helping to drive animal abusers out of business, it would seem very difficult to raise convincing arguments against it. After all, life must be held to be more valuable than mere inanimate objects.

The real difficulty comes when the "violence" harms or threatens life. In the next section "Endangering Lives", I intend to deal with situations where life is unintentionally, or perhaps recklessly, endangered. Here I will deal with actions that are deliberately intended to cause injury or death.

Firstly, though, I'd like to expose some of the hypocrisy which surrounds the condemnation of "violence". Many animal rights campaigners purport to be non-violent and vociferously criticize the "violent" actions of others in the movement. But if one is to stake claim to non-violence one must be consistently opposed to violence, and with many "non-violent" campaigners this seems not at all to be the case.

To begin with, what is the position of such people regarding violence used for human liberation? Would they have opposed the use of force by the slaves who fought in the West Indies for their own emancipation or the use of weapons and explosives by the French Resistance? Today, would they oppose the violence of the ANC or that used by the people of Nicaragua to defend themselves against the contras? If the answer to any of them is "no", then there is speciesism afoot, for it surely must be speciesist to oppose violence for animal liberation, but not to oppose it when used for the liberation of humans.

Secondly, how many of these lovers of non-violence campaign for strong legislation to outlaw particular forms of animal persecution? Most of them, I'd bet, and there's nothing wrong with that, except that those who do so cannot claim to be non-violent. If such legislation is passed, what will happen in the final analysis to the abusers of animals? Well, the answer is - they will be put in prison. And isn't imprisonment just another form of violence? I certainly know what I'd choose between a prison sentence and a punch on the nose!

John Bryant of the LACS rejoiced (quite rightly) over the jailing of a couple of fox-torturers and then talks about his "abhorrence of violence". His abhorrence apparently does not cover the violence of the state and concerns itself only with the violence of animal rights campaigners. Like that of many others, his is a hypocritical position. Whether carried out by the state or by the individual, violence is violence is violence.

Therefore it would seem wrong to condemn actions merely because they are "violent". After all, there are some violent actions, such as the jailing of animal abusers, which almost all of us would support. Thus it makes no sense to use "violence" as the dividing line between right and wrong.

But what of the deliberate killing or injuring of others by animal liberation campaigners or attempts to do such things? Nobody ever has been killed or seriously injured and such attempts are few and far between, but this is still an important question for discussion.

It is a very strong tenet of the animal rights movement that the end doesn't justify the means. Thus we hold it wrong to carry out painful experiments on animals no matter what would be the benefit to humankind (if indeed there be a benefit, and many would argue that there isn't). By the same token it must be wrong to deliberately kill or injure an innocent human (or other animal) as part of a campaign for animal liberation.

A problem arises, however, when we are not dealing with innocent victims. Let's take the following imaginary situation:-

We live in a society where the torturing of babies is perfectly legal. I discover the location of a baby torture chamber. I could campaign for baby-torture to be outlawed, but that will do nothing to save babies from being tortured today or tomorrow or for many months, even years, in the future. I could smash up the torture chamber, but I know the torturer is determined and will soon set up another one. I do not have the facilities to imprison the torturer. Therefore I kill him. Is my action to be condemned?

If not, then it is very hard to condemn the Animal Rights Militia for making attempts on the lives of vivisectors without being guilty of gross speciesism. One can criticize them for not taking sufficient care not to endanger innocent life (if ordinary people are put at risk), but how can one find fault with the main intention of the act? If vivisectors are not to be disposed of then neither is the imaginary baby-torturer.

I am not advocating here the execution of animal abusers, for in that imaginary society it may also be wrong to kill the torturers of babies. What I am trying to point out is that things are not really as clear-cut as they may first of all seem. Should people in that imaginary society show understanding and compassion for those whose concern for the helpless and the innocent leads them to kill the baby-torturers, or should they condemn them with the same vitriol that many in our movement have used against the ARM?

Firemen fighting a blaze which severely damaged Dingles department store in Plymouth

ENDANGERING LIVES

(A philosophical discussion concerning certain actions)

December 1988

Small incendiary devices, timed to go off in the middle of the night, are placed in department stores (that sell furs) by the ARM. Some are defused, some cause minor damage. At much of Dingles store in Plymouth is destroyed.

The initial idea behind this ARM incendiary campaign was to start a small fire which would activate the sprinkler system and thus cause mainly water damage to the store. It has become obvious, however, that the sprinkler systems in some stores are either inadequate or do not function properly and several major fires have resulted. These obviously pose a danger to life, either to security guards or to men (and some would argue to animals) that may be living in or on the building. The question is, is this risk to life acceptable and is the campaign itself acceptable in view of the risk?

Many would, perhaps, immediately say that it is wrong to risk innocent lives in any circumstances, but they should think again. What if an ambulance speeding to the scene of an accident or police cars hurtling along the road to try to intercept a fleeing rapist? Both of these pose a risk to innocent motorists and pedestrians, but all of us, I'm sure, would find them to be acceptable. A number of people have in fact been killed by speeding police cars and ambulances in that sort of situation, but we would nevertheless consider it to be an acceptable risk.

Is this similar to a vivisector's and, if so, is the means type argument? The answer is obviously "no" because there is only a small risk of the innocent being injured rather than a certainty. If every time an ambulance speeding along a road killed or injured a person, a cat or dog or bird, it would be a very different means, but such tragedies only occur on a small number of occasions and only when they are planned in advance.

Most of us in the A/R movement support the hunt saboteurs. But a not inconsiderable number of wild animals (birds, hedgehogs, rabbits etc.) have been killed by hunt sabs' vehicles as they drive around country lanes in pursuit of the hunt. So is hunt sabotage unacceptable? Very few of us would say it was, because it is aimed at saving life and preventing suffering and the number of road casualties is comparatively small. If every other time the sabs went out a wild creature was run over, then obviously the risk would be unacceptable. If it was one in five or one in ten then it would probably be unacceptable too. But what if it's one in 50, or one in 100 or more? There obviously comes a level when the risk can be accepted.

So where does this leave the ALF incendiary campaign? Once again this is aimed at preventing suffering and saving life and it seems to have done so, judging by the number of fur depts. that have closed as a result. But what is the level of risk? Out of over 100 incendiary attacks (Scotland Yard figures) there have been 3 or 4 major fires. No human has been killed or seriously injured in any of these and it is debatable whether any animal has died. But in a future fire it is of course possible that a tragedy could happen. Is this an acceptable level of risk? Is it greater than the risk to life caused by an ambulance speeding through a town or a sab van driving through the country? If so, is the risk sufficiently high so as to render it unacceptable? These are the questions we have to try to answer in order to come to a decision on the morality of the incendiary campaign. The mere fact that it causes some risk to life is not enough. Even if one feels that the level of risk cannot be accepted, is it right to condemn the ALF activists as "terrorists" or "loonies" merely because they have a different opinion?

Even if we find the risk acceptable, there is, however, another consideration. If someone was to be killed or seriously injured in an ALF incendiary attack there would certainly be a very adverse media reaction and certainly some members of the public would be turned against our movement. In fact there have already been adverse media reactions to ALF incendiary attacks.

The question then arises, if an action is not morally wrong in itself, should the animal rights movement condemn it because of media opinion?

If the answer is "yes", should veganism be condemned because some tabloids have called vegans "cranks" or "loonies"? Should we cease to oppose the testing of drugs and medicines on animals because some newspapers have described this as a "nutty" or "extreme" position? Should the movement go along with the media and the "public opinion" manufactured by it or should we attempt to explain to the public the arguments behind veganism, anti-vivisection - or the ALF attacks?

Also any damage done by media reaction must be weighed against any good done by the ALF campaign. The number of people possibly alienated from the movement must be balanced against the damaging effect on the fur trade of the ALF devices. Does the ALF campaign really alienate potential supporters or does it just make people who'll never care properly about the animals shout even louder? Once again we have to try to answer these questions.

To round off, it may be interesting to note the comment of an ALF activist in Sky magazine following the Dingles blaze:- "We did them a favour. We started a small fire: the whole place went up because their sprinkler system wasn't working. That place was a danger to the public". So to what extent are ALF incendiaries improving the fire-safety of stores in the daytime by exposing flaws when they go off during the night?

Incendiary devices in letters are sent to a Cambridge scientist and some fur-trade businesses, purportedly by the ALF. They are all defused without harm.

An immediate problem with this is that it is in breach of the ALF's policy of "nonviolence". Some might argue that other ALF actions also breach that policy, but this one quite definitely does. An incendiary letter sent to someone cannot have any other intention except to injure.

Apart from the above comment, is the use of such letter incendiaries wrong? One problem with such devices is that they may go off en route and injure an innocent person such as a postman. They may also not be opened by the intended target, but by an innocent secretary or clerk. If one wishes to injure animal abusers (and if that be morally acceptable) there are surely more accurate methods than the sending of dangerous devices through the post.

2 boxes of eggs in a West Midlands superstore were found to have been tampered with. An egg in each box was marked with a large red cross and had a pinprick in it. A warning not to eat the eggs, signed by the ALF, was written inside the box. Later examination showed that nothing had been put in them.

Of course, many eggs contain salmonella, so this may have been a true warning! Because of the warning and the fact that nothing was actually put in the eggs, no danger to the public was caused and the battery industry probably lost money as a result of the event. If the eggs had actually been poisoned by the ALF it might have been a different story, especially if no adequate warning had been given. This would probably have subjected the public to an unacceptable risk.

Part of the Senate House, damaged in the explosion at Bristol University

A device explodes at midnight in the Senate House of Bristol University causing considerable damage. Animal rights activists claim responsibility.

Is it wrong, of itself, to damage property by means of an explosion? If so, then demolition contractors would be doing something that is morally reprehensible. Can it be worse to blast a building connected with the admin. of a university where cruel experiments take place?

Once more we are faced with the problem of danger to innocent life. Can an explosion be carried out with a minimum of such danger? Possibly yes, if the building is thoroughly searched and remote control is used.

But according to police reports, a timing device set off the Bristol explosion. If this is the case, then those who caused it took a gamble that no person or animal would wander in or near the building. Many would consider this to be an unacceptable risk. A small incendiary going off gives the chance of escape, whereas an explosion doesn't.

There is no evidence that, in other respects, those responsible for the explosion didn't take care that nobody would be injured. Even if we don't agree with what they did, or how they did it, should we call them "terrorists"?

Once again the damage to the university and the deterrent effect on vivisection may have to be weighed against adverse media reaction, but another factor is that some local animal rights organizations suffered considerable disruption when the police arrested their members and took their files. Should the explosion therefore be condemned because of this. Is an action always wrong if it causes disruption to other A/R organizations?

A few years ago the South East Animal Liberation League raided the Royal College of Surgeons labs in Kent and obtained valuable information. Sometime after the raid the police searched the offices of the BUAV and those of the ALF Supporters Group looking for "stolen" documents. They failed to find these, but took away many others and certainly the ALF SG was caused a great deal of disruption. Did this, however, mean that the SEALL raid on the RCS was wrong?

Two laboratories in Scotland were set on fire by the ALF. Gas canisters in one building exploded and one fireman suffered chemical burns. Another two were slightly injured by flying glass.

I've dealt with the general risk of arson to firemen and others at an earlier stage. It must be at least the case, though, that those who go to set fire to a building should take steps to minimise any danger. In this incident this may well not have happened. It could well be argued that the activists should have removed things like gas canisters and even chemicals from the building before setting fire to it, if they were to do that at all.

3 men, seemingly animal rights campaigners, enter a furshop in London, threaten the proprietors with a gun and let off smoke bombs, causing thousands of pounds worth of damage.

Well, is it wrong to threaten furshop proprietors with guns? It could lead to a big prison sentence and put the campaigners responsible pretty well out of action for several years, but is it wrong of itself? To come to a conclusion on this perhaps one could do well to consider the cruelty and slaughter involved in the fur trade and refer back to "Beyond Nonviolence".

What about damaging furs with smokebombs? Does this create a demand for the furs to be replaced, meaning more animals are slaughtered, or is this outweighed by the fear and financial loss caused to the fur-trade?

The Animal Rights Militia place small incendiary devices in 2 McDonalds burger bars in Birmingham. Police are given a warning, but one goes off in a rubbish sack before they arrive and is quickly put out by staff. The other goes off near a policeman while he is looking for it.

These devices were obviously timed to go off in the daytime when customers were in the burger bars. The chances of causing serious injury or damage seem slight and the intention appears to be to make McDonalds lose money by frightening their customers. To deliberately cause fear to ordinary people, including children, surely cannot be an acceptable method of campaigning.

BRISTOL RAVERS

"We are sick and tired of a tiny bunch of half-witted pseudo-terrorists undermining the work done by Animal Aid..... We condemn whole-heartedly this cowardly, stupid and dangerous act."
(Animal Aid statement quoted to TV and newspapers)

"We will suffer incalculable damage from those who planted the Bristol device. Terrorist actions are negative and destroy the image of a positive campaign."
(Steve McIvor, BUAV, quoted in The Times)

"We have more in common with the meat eating public than we have with the proponents of animal rights terror".

(Arc News, May '89)

Very few people in the movement will be unaware of the explosion that damaged the Senate House at Bristol University earlier this year. According to the media, the attack was first of all claimed by a previously unknown group called The Animal Abused Society. Later a man purporting to represent the ALF telephoned the press with a claim of responsibility, but the police had doubts about its authenticity because of inaccuracies that it contained. Animal rights campaigners have been protesting against cruel experiments carried out at Bristol University for many years. The above quotes are utterances which came from certain sections of the animal rights movement following the incident and the first two, at least, are typical of several statements that were made.

I don't intend here to discuss the pros and cons of the Bristol explosion. Another article which covers that appears earlier. What I do intend to do is to discuss the statements. For it is my contention that they are inaccurate, unjust and actually compound any harm to the movement that the Bristol explosion may have done.

You will note, first of all, that I use the word "explosion" rather than "bomb" or "bombing" to describe the incident. The latter terms are highly emotive and I believe get in the way of any rational discussion. When demolition workers blow up a condemned building, that is an explosion. When quarry workers blast out rock, that too is an explosion. Yet when pro-animal campaigners damage a building at a cruel university, that is referred to as a "bombing". Our terminology is somewhat strange.

Before turning to the quotes it would be a good idea to consider the question of whether those responsible for the Bristol explosion were genuine animal-rights campaigners or people from the other side, bent on discrediting the movement, as has been suggested or claimed in some quarters. The simple truth of the matter is that there is no evidence that they weren't "genuine" people, so unless any such evidence comes to light, we have to assume that they were. It seems to have become something of a habit within the animal rights movement to claim that other campaigners, whose ideas or actions one disagrees with, are somehow "infiltrators" or secret members of the opposition. This is yet another attitude that hinders sensible debate.

So were the people who caused the explosion really "terrorists"? Was their attack on Bristol University an act of "terror"? The French Resistance, for instance, quite frequently used explosives in their campaign against Nazi oppression. Sometimes their actions endangered, even killed, innocent life. But, even if we weren't totally happy about everything they did, would we call them "terrorists"? If not, is it really correct to apply that term to people who, rightly or wrongly, use explosives in the fight against the holocaust of animal persecution (especially where there is no evidence of an intention to injure anyone)? Do different standards apply to the use of explosives for human freedom and their use for animal liberation? If so, what is that other than another manifestation of speciesism?

Secondly, is it fair to call the Bristol action "cowardly"? One must remember that if those responsible ever get caught they are likely to face many years in prison for an act intended to further the cause of animal liberation. Is such an act (whether it be right or wrong) really, therefore, the action of a coward? Possibly the aspect of imprisonment doesn't occur to those who sit behind desks and make press statements.

But, perhaps, the most incredible statement is the one from the Arc News editors. Those who carried out the Bristol explosion, and those in the movement who might support them, are highly likely to be vegans, or at least vegetarians, and people who try to avoid cruelly produced products. The explosion may well have caused some danger to life, but those behind it are, with little doubt, responsible for far less suffering than those members of the public who give their financial support to the meat trade. If the editors of Arc News really have more in common with meat-eaters this does seem to throw serious doubt on the level of their commitment.

Are quotes like those above going to have any effect in changing the attitudes and actions of the people responsible for the explosion? The answer is obviously no. They will only serve to put their backs up and make them unreceptive to any sensible argument that those quoted may wish to come up with. Opponents of such incidents as the Bristol action would serve their own cause better by putting forward calm and rational arguments in animal rights publications, rather than by diatribes in the public media.

Finally, is it really true that the Bristol explosion undermined "the work done by Animal Aid", caused "incalculable damage" to the BUAV or destroyed "the image of a positive campaign"? Well, people in the movement will have varying opinions. But the one thing that does seem to be the case is that quotes like those from Animal Aid and Steve McIvor serve only to add to any damage that may have been done. If the gutter press has led the public to think of animal rights campaigners as "terrorists" the further use of the word can only serve to reinforce that opinion.

And if the public are really unable to distinguish between Animal Aid, the BUAV and those responsible for the Bristol explosion, then the use of the word "terrorists", is only going to further encourage the application of the term to all of them. Extreme language like "terrorists", "cowardly" and "stupid" inevitably becomes the focus of media attention and this often leaves no room for the facts about animal abuse to be pointed out. Far better to explain calmly how the horrors of animal persecution can sometimes drive people to take what some might consider to be "extreme" actions, and then go on to outline what those horrors are and what ordinary people can do to end them.

If people are going to appear in the media as representatives of the movement, we must be able to expect something better from them than unconstructive raving.

THE TWO JOHNNYS

"The scum who perpetrate such actions are just as much enemies of our cause as those who exploit animals".

"I am convinced it is only a matter of time before someone dies and when that happens our cause dies with it".

"I appeal for information about the arsonists. Anyone who is afraid to contact the police should get in touch with me. I will make sure the information is passed on to the authorities".

(John Robins, Organising Secretary, Animal Concern Scotland)

"The use of violence for a humanitarian cause is inexcusable. No-one should have any qualms about turning them in".

"The ALF are the scum of the earth and the sooner the police lock them up the better for all of us...Thanks to them we have virtually no chance of obtaining any legislation outlawing vivisection..."

(John Bryant, Chairman, Animal Aid, and Wildlife Officer, LACS)

Both John Robins and John Bryant have a long and continuing history of excellent work for animal protection. It is a great shame, therefore, that they should blot their copybooks with such wild and unjustifiable statements. Whether or not the use of arson is acceptable, we once again have examples of a totally counterproductive, even outrageous, response.

To describe ALF activists as "scum" and comparable to "those who exploit animals" is unjust in the extreme and displays a deep ignorance about the type of people who are active in the ALF. If we look at the ALF campaigners who have been convicted by the courts (and usually sent to prison) for arson, we see, without exception, people who are vegetarians (most, in fact, are vegan) with a long history of involvement in many different aspects of the struggle for animal rights. "Scum" who give out leaflets (including Animal Aid ones!) take part in demonstrations and find homes for unwanted cats and dogs! Yet Messrs Robins and Bryant can seemingly find no words strong enough with which to insult them.

But not only are such caring people "scum", they should also be grassed up to the authorities, turned in and locked up in prison, at least according to the two Johns. Quite obviously the commitment of the latter to nonviolence has its limitations, or perhaps they don't consider it "violent" to throw someone into prison.

Once again I shall use the example of the French Resistance. Was theirs not also "violence for a humanitarian cause". I take it therefore that Messrs R & B would not have supported them, would have called for their imprisonment and urged the people of France to turn them in. And did the cause of the French Resistance die when they (sometimes inexcusably) killed someone during their campaign? *Great causes (like ours and theirs) surely don't perish so easily.

John Bryant's statement that the ALF has ruined the chances of anti-vivisection legislation pays no attention to history. What were the chances of such legislation before the advent of the ALF? Not very great it seems, seeing as none of it was passed. And it is interesting to note that the UK official yearly figure for the number of experiments on animals has fallen by 3 million since ALF actions began.

Whether or not the movement can do without arson, it can do without wild and hysterical media statements. Should we put a gag on everyone whose name is John? (John Curtin excepted)

DISHONEST ARGUMENTS

"I think they are potentially shooting themselves in the foot again as they did with the fire-bombs (at stores selling furs)".

(Steve McIvor, BUAV, The Independent 16/1/89)

"The House of Fraser already admits to a 'decline in consumer demand for fur' in its stores, but now cannot be seen to yield to terrorism. So the nonsensical situation may arise whereby the selling of furs may be prolonged beyond the point where on commercial grounds it would have ceased".

If people in the movement are ever going to decide whether tactics like the ALF's incendiary campaign are a good idea, it doesn't help for their vision to be blurred by dishonest arguments. Whether or not the use of incendiary devices is a good thing in the long run, or when seen from a broad perspective, it is really little short of deception to try to make out that they are ineffective.

As far back as 1986 Allders of Croydon stopped selling furs following ALF incendiary attacks against them and there has been a steady stream of fur departments closing since. One only has to look at the "Road to Victory" section of this magazine to see how many fur trade businesses have closed, on their own admission, because of the ALF threat.

Lynx has also tried to make out that the ALF campaign has not reduced the actual sale of furs, but merely shifted the demand to places that continue to stock them. This argument ignores the effect of availability on demand. There may be some people, of course, who would go to the ends of the Earth to buy a fur coat, but surely not many. The closing of fur depts. in big stores, in particular, has caused furs to be much less easily obtainable, and this is bound to have had an effect on overall sales, especially when it comes to casual buying of cheaper garments.

Therefore if the ALF campaign is to be criticized, it cannot be on the grounds that it is ineffective, and it would be of benefit to the movement as a whole if the campaign's opponents ceased confusing the issue.

A VOICE OF REASON

"The people within the animal rights movement who label such activists as criminal do not understand the depths of feeling and commitment in them. Mr. Robins should shut up and stop causing ill-feeling within the movement".

(Animal Rights Education Network, Glasgow Herald 31/3/89)

It is a relief to note that not all representatives of the movement reacted with hysteria following controversial actions. In the quote above AREN have not expressed support for the arson attack on which they were asked to comment, but clearly understand the nature of ALF activists far better than does John Robins.

Ill-feeling is caused within the movement when words such as "scum", "terrorists" and "maniacs" are used by one section against another. And sensible discussion about the pros and cons of particular types of action becomes extremely difficult in an atmosphere of such ill-feeling. If John Robins has sensible arguments to put forward against the use of arson, he will have only closed the eyes and ears of the incendiaries to him by hurling such insults against them.

CRAZY COUNTER-REACTION

"You'd better tell John Robins to stop slagging the ALF or your office will be the next thing to go up in smoke".

According to the Scottish press, such was the telephone message received by Animal Concern's Office Manager, Brian Scott, following some of John Robins' hysterical statements. If the reports are correct, this event is extremely unfortunate and disturbing.

One can understand how aggrieved ALF activists (and their supporters) feel following Mr. Robins' hurtful insults against them, but there is no justification for such a threat against the ACS office. Animal Concern is involved in a great deal of important activity for animal protection in Scotland. It would be craziness in the extreme to hamper it with such a thoughtless action. The ACS Organising Secretary has made some inappropriate media comments, but they do not negate the good work of the organization.

The incident only served to encourage another JR media fulmination about "head-bangers who purport to care for animal rights" and thus to further increase the movement's internal alienation. One of the main reasons why John Robins is so over the top in his response to direct-action is without doubt because he has received threats in the past following his criticism of certain actions.

No matter how unfair or insulting such criticism is, it achieves nothing for those attacked to respond in such a fashion. If ever there is to be reason and respect within the movement, somebody has to call a halt to the slagging and counter-slagging. ALF activists have no reason to suppose that it shouldn't be them.

THE ROOTS OF HYSTERIA

There is no doubt that over the past 12 months the number of what might be said to be "controversial" actions by animal liberation campaigners has risen and that, of itself, has almost certainly provoked some of the hysterical reaction. But the roots of this hysteria really go deeper than that. To understand why it has arisen one needs to trace it back to its beginnings.

First of all, it is important to recognise that the hysteria is just an extreme manifestation of a general opposition to direct-action on the part of a number of prominent pro-animal campaigners. Thus they hate the incendiary campaign, for instance, not just because of the controversial nature of that particular type of action, but also because of the concept of economic sabotage which lies behind it. How does this dislike of direct-action, particularly property damage, come into being?

To some extent it has been engendered by the supporters of direct-action themselves. In the early to mid-eighties many supporters of groups such as the ALF became increasingly critical of parliamentary campaigning and launched written and verbal attacks on such things as "Putting Animals into Politics" and the "Mobilization for Laboratory Animals" campaign. They strongly criticized the whole modus operandi of the national societies and gave support to the idea of such groups as The Federation. Perhaps these attacks went too far in their incisiveness, for the direct-action movement is now paying the price for them.

At that time most of the major societies had put much of their resources into parliamentary campaigning and the criticism must have struck a raw nerve, particularly with their critics being proved largely right when the parliamentary campaigns were seen to have failed. Representatives of the nationals no doubt also felt personally threatened by calls for their abolition. At that time their bitterness towards the supporters of direct-action could find little expression, but, with the weakening of the strong propaganda influence of the ALF Supporters Group by police action, they have seized their opportunity for revenge.

Then there is the success of the "Living Without Cruelty" and "Choose Cruelty-Free" campaigns. Parliamentary campaigning has been largely a failure, but these new campaigns, aimed at educating the public to bring about change themselves, have not. At long last the national societies have hit upon something that actually works and they are to be warmly congratulated for this. Animal persecution has no doubt been reduced as more members of the public have become vegetarians or vegans and have started to boycott products created through cruel tests.

But to some extent the nationals, and others, have been mesmerized by this success and have failed to see its limitations. A view has arisen that animal abuse can be ended almost entirely through public education. Because some members of the public have been converted, it is felt that it won't be very long before all the rest can be won over by the movement. Thus direct-action, particularly property-damage, becomes (a) unnecessary and (b) counter-productive, because it may make some of the public less receptive to the education process.

This attitude fails to understand the true nature of society. It fails to recognise that those who have been won over are people who had within themselves the potential to care properly about the animals and that with a good many people this capacity, sadly to say, does not exist. Thus early success with the potentially good has blinded the "cruelty-free" campaigners to the existence of the apathetic and the evil who are around in sufficient numbers to continue financing animal abuse as consumers for a very long time, unless there is also another method of knocking out the industries of animal persecution. It is hard to visualize what that method could be apart from economic sabotage through direct-action. But because the representatives of many societies do not see this, they continue to vent their spleen against such damage to property.

Thirdly, there is personal psychology. What does it feel like to be sitting comfortably in an office while others are going to prison for the cause of animal liberation? A bit uneasy on the conscience, perhaps. So how can the salaried animal rights officials justify their positions? One method is to create the belief in themselves, and others, that those who risk imprisonment are somehow "terrorists" or "lunatics" carrying out a "mindless" campaign.

There may well be truth in the argument that animal persecution would be quickly destroyed if all animal rights campaigners were prepared to go just once to prison. But for many the comforts of a cosy situation (a house, a car, a salary, a wife or husband) or the fear of a bleak cell in Armley, Holloway or Wormwood Scrubs may, in the final analysis, outweigh the necessity to swiftly end the suffering of animals. This must, however, stay a deep dark secret. Far easier to slag the ALF.

— YOUR TURN —

This has been a lengthy analysis, but it is nevertheless intended to be only the beginning of an ongoing discussion. If you disagree with anything I've written (or even if you agree) please don't hesitate to write in with your opinion. We have specifically sent a copy of this magazine to all those who have been criticized or mentioned, so they may have a chance to respond. We very much hope they will do so.

These articles have touched on something I would call the "philosophy of tactics". The movement has its great philosophers, Peter Singer, Tom Regan etc., who have explained excellently the moral necessity for animal liberation but who seem to falter somewhat (to my mind at least) when it comes to discussing the rights and wrongs of particular tactics. This is an area of philosophical discussion where everyone in the movement can become involved. It is wrong to set up people like Peter and Tom as gurus who have the sole right to speak on philosophical questions, and I'm quite sure they wouldn't want that situation either.

So think for yourself, and let us know the results of that thinking!

CRUELTY-FREE OR COMPROMISE

by Barry Emptage

It's difficult to write this perched up here in my ivory tower wearing blinkers and a holier than thou smile, but I'll try (that's knackered half the leaders of A.R. societies so now to try and get some truth out).

Is it just that people in positions of trust and leadership in the A.R. movement don't understand or don't want to understand what is meant by cruelty-free? Is it at least misleading or at worst a massive lie or cover up and con job? Not many of us are lucky enough to be born and brought up on a truly cruelty-free diet. I was born Vegan but my mother cocked it up a day later by giving me cows milk and thinking she was doing the best for me. She had an excuse - apart from being stupid she was ill informed. So why today, with all the knowledge and easily obtained information, do we get misled by groups and conned into accepting second best and compromising when there is no need? A "lie-free" cruelty-free alternative exists for nearly everything now and if it doesn't we probably can live without it. A great disservice is being done to new people coming into the movement by saying various goods are cruelty-free when it is known that they contain lanolin, beeswax, cows or goats milk and other animal derivatives. Worse, though, is lying to the animals - we're all they've got and they are being sold short. Obviously people take time to progress and stepping stones are made from meat-eater to Vegan, but what are those people going to think, or who will they trust, when they find that what they thought was cruelty-free was not? Are they told, "We didn't think you'd mind, or you probably wouldn't understand it, or you're so thick we didn't bother to point out the truth"?

A lot of firms producing so-called cruelty-free products have ridden in on the backs of caring people and made a nice profit. Sadly they've been aided by people in positions of trust, the "guardians" of animal rights. We are told not to be churlish or picky and let's not stir too much, or we are looking for an ideal world and doing nothing in the process. The trouble is these statements are made by people who neither know us or would care to find out what truth lies behind what we say. I'm not hoping for an ideal world because all the time we have people on this planet some poor animal will be exploited. The trouble is they are helped by people in the A.R. movement not telling the whole truth and being too ready to compromise. Every time it's the animals that are coming off worse. If you are prepared to let one animal derivative in why not let it all slide? You know where you are with a butcher (like my father was) who says "I'll kill it myself and I know what goes on". Equally so a vivisector, hunter or any other animal abuser, but how can you really trust or know where you are with these people who accept selected cruelties, because that is the truth of what they are doing. Lanolin, beeswax, cow or goats milk, animal derivatives - none of it's nice, it's all got blood on it somewhere along the line.

We'll get the usual fobbing off by the clever letter writers in charge of the national A.R. groups but in time they will be seen to be what they are. Indeed, in time will they still be there, spouting their so called cruelty-free message? I believe we have moved away from basics and we're being conned by both sides leading us to believe we need more and more involved arguments, but we don't. If it's cruel or exploitation it's wrong. If a product contains an animal derivative it's not cruelty-free. I'm not that bright but I can see it. Animals are supposed to be even less bright but they'll see through these hypocrites running the A.R. movement.

What are they afraid of when they attack us so vehemently? Are we mirroring their true faults, is the simplicity of the argument too much to take in or what? It is such a simple message - "All animal abuse or exploitation is wrong. Don't lie to us or yourself, but most of all don't lie to the animals". We can all help animals, it's so simple, just stop using any product that contains bits of them. Firms are only too eager to listen now, make sure they hear the right message and don't cloud it with deep discussion and accusations against genuine cruelty-free people. Not everyone can go on a demo, write letters, take part in direct action and liberate an animal, but we can all free them from death and exploitation, all we have to do is seek the truth. Examine closely the lies and blurred statements put out about cruelty-free goods. Once you've freed yourself from the shackles of the misleading statements put out by people who should know better, the animals' chains will follow. Try it, it's so simple you won't believe it (or will you?).

THE BRISTOL BOMB REVISITED

by Barry Maycock

Now that the furore over the Bristol University explosion has long died down it should be possible to step back and look more dispassionately at the implications of that puzzling event. Many animal rights campaigners were surprised by it, mainly because it didn't fit in with certain known patterns of recent direct action campaigns - for example, the one which has targeted the big department stores selling furs. In addition, the group which is supposed to have claimed responsibility - the "Animal Abused Society" - was surely named for the one occasion, and no statement was issued to shed light on its existence. Much more predictable were the reactions, not only of the politicians and their media lackeys, but also of the usual self-appointed few who claim to represent the animal rights movement in all its ragged diversity. The inelegant haste by which they rushed to distance themselves, not just from this event, but from direct action as a whole, suggested that there was more at stake here than initially appeared.

For example, if there is one thing our experience has taught us it is the necessity for caution, so as not to prejudge an issue before the facts are fully known. But at recent events (eg. the Dingles fire at Plymouth) animal rights "leaders" were accusing the ALF before the police themselves had stated any conclusions. Wild utterances also followed the Bristol bomb: hardly had the dust settled before Animal Aid announced that the explosion had ruined "years of peaceful work" - implying an achievement so fragile that one event had blown it away! This sort of nonsense is a positive inducement for a lunatic with a grudge to plant a bomb, or (a more likely scenario) for a Special Branch "dirty tricks" squad to arrange such an "incident" to discredit the movement, or to frame particular individuals. The police have done this sort of thing in the past, and will do so again - to the extent of committing murder if necessary.

Consistent in all these reactions has been the kind of language used: in a Guardian letter, one Animal Aid member attacked "the handful of idiots who prefer bombs to rational argument" - while disposing of "rational argument" in favour of mere abuse ("lunatic extremists", "idiots", "nutcases"). Similar phrases were used in AA's April "Outrage" ("half-witted pseudo-terrorists") and in a recent CAW statement ("stupid and mindless act of terrorism"). But when certain words ("violence", "terrorism") are simply flung around like this, "rational argument" becomes impossible, and the key problem here - the vexed question of campaigning tactics - is never discussed. The CAW reaction is more understandable, as this Bristol group became the target of police "investigation", ie. the usual harassment. But all these groups, particularly the national societies, could actually approach the matter in a different way: they could dissociate themselves from direct action (if that is their policy) while using the publicity to turn the spotlight onto the horrors of animal abuse. As it is, the various statements suggest, not just the usual political ineptitude, but a deeply felt, very personal anger.

What are we to make of this? One obvious explanation is that direct action (of any kind) runs counter to the kind of policies that the national societies are pursuing, and the kind of movement they wish to create. In this respect the campaigns of autonomous groups, indeed their very "autonomy", create a problem, because they remain outside the control of the big societies, a possible source of future conflict. But the real danger is this: that the national societies simply end up performing the function within society of a "loyal opposition", cultivated by the state in order to control and contain protest, absorb genuine unrest, and isolate "extremists" - thus monopolising the framework within which dissent is articulated. Events like the Bristol bomb become opportunities, not to expose animal abuse, but to proclaim the "respectability" of certain organisations, and gain credibility with those who shape public opinion.

This policy is often justified in terms of the growing "maturation" of the animal rights movement. The reasoning is as follows: that as the movement matures politically it needs to move away from "direct action", which may have been necessary in an earlier phase, but which has now become an impediment to progress. This viewpoint is a convenient one, for it enables groups to praise earlier actions, and make use of them in various ways, while condemning present activity. But it also forgets history: that direct action was taken up as a response to the FAILURE of earlier campaigning, which had few real results to show for over a century of "peaceful persuasion". To go "beyond" direct action could well mean a return to the unhappy situation that existed before, repeating the same old mistakes. It is this predictable trajectory that has, over the past few years, been conveniently forgotten.

Certainly the current policies of the nationals give little indication of growing "maturity". There is far too much emphasis on consumer campaigns, on "cruelty-free living", even though the limitations of "lifestyle politics" have been exposed so often; and campaigns that concentrate on "soft" issues (eg. cosmetics testing) are too cautious to have much impact. They will enjoy a small measure of success because they go with the grain of public opinion; but the very publicity they generate is itself a trap, distracting attention from the one real demand that the movement should always be making - the immediate abolition of ALL animal experimentation. The debate on this issue has still not been won - indeed it is as if we are even encouraged to put our energies into a peripheral skirmish, while the real battle lies elsewhere. These tiny victories (with respect to cosmetics testing) do not necessarily save any lives, or prevent any suffering - the animals simply get shifted, as it were, to another part of the laboratory, according to one of the Iron Laws of Animal Abuse (which states that animal experiments - and animal products - will continue to expand to use up the growing supply of animals available).

"...it is as if we are even encouraged to put our energies into a peripheral skirmish, while the real battle lies elsewhere."

WRECKAGE: Scene of devastation after the university blast stance which colludes with the policies of the state, with its attempt to isolate the ALF and deprive it of the "oxygen of publicity" by suppressing the Supporters Group - so that ALF actions appear to make very little sense, to spring out of desperation and blind fanaticism rather than careful thought and intelligent planning. The gulf that separates the national societies and so many passionate activists will continue to provoke the very actions that are so disliked, as long as the latter are denied support and legitimacy, and deprived of any real voice - except the one provided by direct action.

The political "maturation" process consists of reaching out to them, of communication not rejection. It means building up the movement in a solid and lasting way - beginning perhaps with the public meeting at which the local group is formed, with leafletting and canvassing, with an intelligent and continuing input into the political life of the community. It means raising the profile of the whole issue, especially on a local level, with campaigns against specific targets closer to home, in order to touch people's lives directly. Within such campaigns direct action will have an honourable place - it doesn't have to be synonymous with bombs! It can mean pickets and occupations, blockades, distasteful acts of every kind. The momentum of such a movement, however, is actually impeded by the arrival of the BUAV bus, or by an obligation to take part in these ever-increasing "national days of action" throughout the year.

The movement needs a really big push, because so far there has been no breakthrough politically on the issue of animal rights - there are too many vested interests, too much power and money involved. But there is also a deeper reason for this: animal abuse is like the guilty secret haunting the edges of our daily lives, the knowledge of which is unbearable to us because it exposes the hypocrisy deep within a "compassionate" society, the cruelty at its very core. (A few other issues are taboo in a similar way - eg. child abuse.) It is worth noting that throughout the media reports of the Bristol explosion, animal liberationists were portrayed either as misanthropic sentimentalists, or misty-eyed fantasists dreaming of a vegan future, or looking back to a non-existent "golden age". But the exact opposite is true: animal liberationists are realists in the truest sense, they have uncovered an animal "holocaust" at the heart of our society, and have been so touched by it that they cannot forget, nor can they turn away, nor can they ever rest until they have acted, in however small a way, to lessen the weight of that terrible suffering. No wonder there is so much frustration: a whole range of related (so-called "Green") issues are being taken up by politicians, and on so many of them (eg. on the plight of the rainforests, acid rain) it is no longer necessary to shout so loudly - indeed the noise from the media is almost deafening! But there is no such voice yet for animal rights, nothing yet has really moved; until it does it remains a sad fact of life that it often takes a bomb to seize public attention, to wake people up.

"animal abuse is like the guilty secret haunting the edges of our daily lives,...."

These campaigns depend for their justification on so many unsupported assumptions and bland assertions, relying on the illusion that the so-called "free-market" really does bring "freedom of choice", and that the consumer does possess the necessary power to effect change: this is a view that needs to be argued (though it rarely is), not simply assumed. In actual fact, of course (and how many times does this have to be stated and re-stated?) the "market" is rigged and the "choices" are trivial and utterly bogus, like the choice between ten brands of soap powder or ten brands of margarine, all basically the same and produced by the same vast conglomerate (ie. Unilever). "Lifestyle politics" is the kind that capitalism positively encourages, not only shifting us away from activism to "lifestyle", but actually prompting us to consume and extend the range of choices available. A lifestyle can be bought like any other commodity, and usually at somebody's expense; the more some of us can "live without cruelty", the more others will have to live with it; "cruelty", like other unwanted products, can be dumped on the world's poor. To me the movement from "animal liberation" to "living without cruelty" is a backward step - away from the bars of the cage, as it were, and into the nice local wholefood shop. All this is risk-free and painless, and "alternatives" and "substitutes" are continually being manufactured in order to ensure that it will be.

Even those much proclaimed signs of progress (eg. the spread of vegetarianism) need only indicate certain changing consumption patterns within a narrow band of the "aware" middle class, mainly in the U.S. and Europe: in any case vegetarianism can continue to grow alongside increased animal consumption, indeed that is exactly what is happening (eg. there can be more vegetarians along with people eating more and more meat-based foods). Furthermore, vegetarianism can spread throughout the West while new markets for animal products can be opened up in the rest of the world, into areas that have been, for varied reasons, primarily "vegetarian" in the past. The national societies, in their apparent belief in "consumerism", are merely proclaiming a liberalism that does not speak its name - and thus leave little room for radical Greens, anarchists, socialists, etc., who do not share that particular political perspective.

The weaknesses of all these campaigns stem therefore from this narrowness of perspective, made even narrower by the rejection of direct action and the groups (often the most energetic and committed) from which it springs. It is a

by Brendan McNally

Along with the Green movement, animal liberation has, it seems, now ceased to be seen as a cranky side issue and, to use the current phrase, gained "respectability". The number of vegans and veggies continues to grow and certain forms of animal abuse are becoming socially unacceptable, such as the wearing of fur and cosmetic testing. No one should pretend that these are anything but small steps, but they are indications that years of struggle and sacrifice are paying off and that, despite the difficulties, the movement is in the right direction.

Sadly, the logical price of this new-found "respectability" is a sudden crop of "respectable" groups and individuals, falling over each other to try to distance themselves from the activists, who they now slag off as "lunatics" and "criminals" who discredit the "legitimate" campaigners. Who are they kidding?

Twelve years ago the majority of the population never gave a thought for the plight of animals in laboratories or factory farms. Most people were simply ignorant, or refused to believe the horror stories told by the small, scattered bands of animal lib "fanatics" out leafletting town centres on Saturday afternoons. It was only when a large amount of groups of activists began to take direct action that the public and the media began to take notice. Establishments were raided, animals were rescued, documentary evidence of horrifying goings-on was obtained and economic war was waged against the perpetrators.

Gradually, using the evidence and publicity, the hitherto largely dormant national animal rights groups began to attract more and more members and support.

Since then the use of direct action has snowballed, and the fortunes of the national groups have likewise improved. They have never been shy of using "illegally" gained photographs and documents, or benefitting from publicity to increase their membership. The Pennsylvania Primates video is just one of many examples.

How two-faced of these groups then, to now condemn the very activists who have risked everything and without whom such evidence would never have been obtained. Can they really believe that the evil fur trade is on the retreat because of peaceful negotiations? It is a result of a relentless campaign of economic warfare by groups of activists, as was admitted by a leading police officer in a recent Guardian article.

What a bloody cheek for these groups and their spokespeople to cynically use the capitalist media to protect their status quo and their jobs, by distancing themselves from genuine activists, who are still continuing the real struggle. (The recent literature of some of these groups resembles something from Saatchi & Saatchi, rather than animal liberation literature.)

The history of struggle can perhaps teach us a lesson here. Time and time again the pressure for change in society has come from groups taking direct action. Possibly the most famous example is the "suffragette" movement, whose tactics were, if anything, more radical than those of the ALF, and included arson, criminal damage and sometimes violent assault. Yet popular history now attributes their eventual victory to the role played by women in the First World War. The point is that the powers that be will never admit that change can be achieved through illegal means, when the truth is that most significant changes have only come about because of illegal, and sometimes violent, actions.

Despite the rhetoric of the "respectable" representatives of the national groups, the real struggle for animal liberation is continuing. This struggle involves education and publicity as well as direct action. There is a role for everyone in the struggle - direct action would be wasted were it not accompanied by education and enlightenment. Similarly, without direct action the movement would still be stuck in the 1970s. It is a shame that the very people who owe their "respectable", sometimes well-paid, comfortable positions can't understand this. Or is it a case of "there are none so blind as those who don't want to see"?

Hypocrisy

by Nancy Phipps

The Animal Rights movement seems to be riddled with hypocrisy. Whenever the ALF win a battle, as with the smoke bombs at Xmas or, more recently, the bomb at Bristol University, one sees the animal abusers in the form of the establishment, crawling out of the woodwork, wringing their hands and bleating. The scientists at Bristol University cry that they do not hurt the animals in their hellholes. We all know this to be hogwash. However, one must expect such comments from people who make rich profits from the abuse of animals.

What one doesn't expect, however, is for people in the A.R. movement, such as Mark Gold and Steve McIvor (to name just two) to appear on the media, and condemn these same actions. No-one has ever been hurt by these devices. If once that happened then I too would condemn. But in the meantime I congratulate them, and anyone who really cares about the suffering and degradation that goes on should applaud them likewise.

So let these people who have safe and well-paid jobs in the A.R. movement have the decency to keep their opinions to themselves and stop running down the actions of others. Remember these people risk a heavy prison sentence for their activities. At least it brought Bristol University into public focus. For that I'm sure the animals suffering inside will be grateful.

Furthermore, do all these holier than thou do gooders ever really achieve anything? Does the general public really care enough to do anything? I doubt it. After the so-called poisoning of the Mars bars a few years back hands were also raised up in horror, but the action achieved its ends. Mars ceased to stuff their revolting product down the throats of monkeys. And what about Dingles - didn't I read the other day that they would no longer sell fur coats? If you hit the abusers where it hurts most, their pockets, then you have achieved a major victory. Animal abuse is everywhere and the fight for their rights is a serious and major issue. Was it not Gandhi who said "The greatness of a nation and its moral progress can be judged by the way its animals are treated"?

So let us get on with the work in hand and support each other. We all have our jobs to do, whether it is leafletting, fundraising, or non-violent direct action. Remember the animals are depending on us.

I do hope that local Animal Rights groups get the actions of the ALF into a correct perspective and are not deterred by media hype. On National Anti-Fur Day our local group arranged with the local Birmingham group to have a demo at Rackhams. So our small group turned out in full force - all nine of us. To our dismay only three people turned up from Birmingham and they, I must add, are totally devoted to the cause of A.R. To be fair, one other person turned up to wish us luck. Unfortunately she had to go to work. So, all in all, in our second largest city, three people were committed enough to join with us in a demo. It seems that all the others were afraid. Afraid of what for Gods sake!!!!

The demo went much the same as all sit-ins. Not once was the subject of smoke bombs etc. mentioned either by the bullying security men or the general public. In fact we found the police both sympathetic and fair.

If law abiding A.R. groups are going to be put off by media reaction (after all, what do you expect?) then we might as well say goodbye to the movement. There's so much paranoia going about it's incredible. We have recently had a stall in the centre of Coventry and the public response has been the best ever.

So let's stop being wimps. If you care for animals then bloody well fight for them and get on with it.

Give A Home

by Gari Allen

It disgusts me to hear of abandoned animals being put down week in, week out and of rescue centres being over-run with unwanted and ill-treated animals. Once upon a time animal rights people only wanted to home a "liberated" animal, yet even that has gone out of fashion, now that direct action has gone out of "fashion" within the movement.

There's a lot of genuine people who do good work in this field, but sadly there is a hell of a lot who can't be bothered. Maybe it's because the welfare side of it is considered "wet" and untrendy. It is a hard, unending and thankless task, but one which a truly caring person should never ignore. It is certainly never the soft option that it's made out to be.

So, next time you are asked if you can take in an abandoned, "rescued" or ill-treated animal, or if you can provide a home, don't make a feeble excuse - make the effort and say "yes" ("OK yar" if you're rich!) That little word can literally save a life.

Having worked at a rescue centre myself, I know that many domestic animals lead very miserable lives and sometimes suffer just as much as a laboratory animal at the hands of their uncaring or sadistic owners. It is just not a job for the RSPCA, who in fact do very little. It is a job for every person who cares. It also does wonders for our image (which is far from desirable at the moment), making us seem more human and caring. I'm not saying that it should act as a diversion from the struggle of animal liberation, but the two go hand in hand and are inseparable.

Condemnation

Many people in the animal rights movement realise that direct action is valuable and essential. Yet time and time again we hear the national societies publicly condemning activists who break the law, labelling them as "terrorists" and "enemies" with more hatred and disgust than they ever condemn the true terrorists - those who torture and murder innocent animals. It seems unbelievable when they ignore this excellent and rare opportunity to put forward a case for the animals to millions of uneducated people. Perhaps they condemn them because they, like the animal abusers, are afraid - afraid that their whiter-than-white public image may be tainted, and consequently their popularity might suffer and so might their cushy jobs and large salaries.

Everyone is entitled to their opinions but if that means criticizing each other in the media it is a sad state of affairs. How can we expect anyone to take us seriously when the movement appears totally divided, confused and negative? We are, after all, supposed to be fighting for the same cause, but there is no doubt some do feel more strongly about it than others. It isn't easy to try to comprehend the true scale and intensity of the suffering, pain and degradation of animals and many people seem to lack the understanding, or maybe it is difficult to think about it. But this is no excuse to criticize and condemn those who are really making an effort to change things. Maybe that makes them feel righteous and eases their guilt, but it does little else.

Of course, it would be different if the animals were being tortured and slaughtered on the streets every day, in front of our very eyes. Then we would all be forced to face the holocaust and all it's horrors, and I'm sure the majority of people would be shocked into doing something drastic about it as effectively and quickly as possible! But, unfortunately, it doesn't - it is hidden safely behind closed doors unseen and unheard, so people can bury their heads in the sand and pretend it doesn't happen, or distance themselves so much that it doesn't seem so terrible. Well, we are lucky to have that privilege - the animals don't.

PRISONERS & DEFENCE FUNDS

Some activities carried out in the struggle for animal rights are illegal. Whether or not we or you agree with the particular actions, it is important to remember the fact that those who carry them out are putting themselves at personal risk in order to help animals. Sometimes they get caught, and when they do they deserve the help and support of everyone in the movement.

GEOFF SHEPPARD

Geoff Sheppard was sentenced to 4 years and 4 months in prison at the Old Bailey in June 1988. He was found guilty of conspiracy to cause damage by arson to Debenhams department stores in Luton, Romford and Harrow, which sold furs. Over £9 million damage was caused in the incendiary device actions and the stores have since stopped selling furs. He was additionally found guilty of possessing equipment for making incendiary devices and was also in breach of a 4 month suspended sentence for breaking a butchers shop window. Geoff's parole has been refused.

Letters of support can be sent to: Geoff Sheppard, V50730, HM Prison, Wayland, Griston, Thetford, Norfolk, IP25 6RL.

SEAN CRABTREE

In November 1988 at Leeds Crown Court Sean Crabtree was found guilty of conspiracy to damage property, arson and attempted arson, following a year of ALF activities during which many thousands of pounds worth of damage was caused to various animal abuse premises. Sean was jailed for 4 years and recently had parole refused.

Letters of support can be sent to: Sean Crabtree, DB1671, HM Prison, The Castle, Lancaster, Lancs, LA1 1YL.

RONNIE LEE

Ronnie Lee has been in prison since March 1986 when he was arrested and charged with conspiring to cause arson, conspiring to cause damage and conspiring to incite others to cause damage. This was in connection with him being National Press Officer for the ALF and being involved with running the ALF Supporters Group. In February 1987, after nearly a year on remand Ronnie was found guilty of all charges at Sheffield Crown Court. A further charge of conspiring to handle 'stolen' animals was shelved. Ronnie was sentenced to 10 years imprisonment and his parole was recently refused.

Letters of support can be sent to: Ronnie Lee, VO2682, LB2 Clyde, HM Prison, Channings Wood, Denbury, Newton Abbot, Devon, TQ12 6DW.

ROGER YATES

Roger Yates was arrested in early 1986 - he had been the Northern Press Officer for the ALF. He appeared as a co-defendant in the Sheffield Crown Court trial in January/February 1987, but before the end of the trial he absconded. In his absence he was sentenced to 4 years imprisonment, having been found guilty of conspiring to commit criminal damage and conspiring to incite others to commit criminal damage. In March this year Roger was re-arrested and sent to prison to do his sentence. Letters of support can be written to: Roger Yates, R96097, HM Prison, Wymott, Moss Lane, Leyland, Lancs, PR5 3LW.

FRAN TRUTT

(United States)

In November 1988 Fran Trutt was arrested carrying a remote control for explosives which had been placed next to the United States Surgical Corporation building. The USSC has been a target for protests because of live dogs being used there to demonstrate a surgical stapling technique. More explosives and 2 weapons were found in Fran's New York apartment. She was charged with attempted murder (the explosives were planted near the parking place of the USSC Chairman) and possession of explosives. Fran was set up by 2 infiltrators who posed as friends and activists but who in fact were working for a security consulting firm, hired by the USSC to infiltrate the animal rights movement. They gave Fran the money, means and encouragement to plant the explosives. Fran has pleaded guilty to possession of the explosives and faces 3 charges in connection with planting explosives. Letters of support and donations towards legal costs can be sent to: Fran Trutt Legal Defence Fund, 266-B Main St., Suite 120, Munroe, CT, 06468, USA.

(United States)

Patty Halleran has pleaded not guilty to charges of breaking a window and defacing doors and windows of various animal abuse premises. Damage was estimated at $1,100. Donations towards legal costs can be sent to Bust Fund, c/o SCUT, PO Box 14, Selden, NY, 11784, USA.

NOAH'S ARK

(France)

Following the 'Noah's Ark' action in May, during which monkeys were rescued from a vivisection lab, the liberators were betrayed by an accomplice. Police took the animals to a zoo and court proceedings are to begin against the accused.

Donations and messages of support sent c/o ALF SG, BCM 1160, London, WC1N 3XX will be forwarded to the accused.

TRIESTE ALF

(Italy)

Two people from Trieste were arrested in connection with direct action. Loredana Jerman was identified as the woman who appeared anonymously on the "I confess" TV programme, claiming responsibility for ALF actions. Roberto Duria was caught putting sugar in the tank of an excavator at a pharmaceutical company.

APPEAL DISMISSED

Thirteen people convicted for disorderly conduct at a Dorset hunt had their appeals against conviction dismissed in March. They had been given conditional discharges. They were each ordered to pay £50 towards the prosecutions costs.

Sentenced to ten years in prison, Ronnie Lee (and Rory) during a recent "home-leave" from jail

A Statement by the Publishers FUR REVIEW – THE FINAL EDITION

This is the final issue of Fur Review. After more than a quarter of a century serving the Fur Trade, the magazine is closing down.

As publishers of Fur Review for the last 15 years, we thought long and hard before taking the decision finally to cease publication. That decision had nothing to do with its success or its profitability. In spite of its now trimmed down appearance compared with the heady days of ten years or more ago, Fur Review has continued to be a success in its own field and to contribute to the overall well-being of our publishing group.

Our decision resulted wholly from our own experiences of the actions of those extremists who planted a fire bomb on our premises before Christmas and have made other threats since.

FUR REVIEW May 1989

Fur trade magazine "Fur Review" has ceased publication. The director of the Stourbridge firm which had published it for the past 15 years announced in March that the mag would close following the May issue. He gave fear of direct action as the reason. (Wolverhampton Express & Star 20/3/89)

North London contract testing lab Biorex announced an end to the animal experiments there. The lab has been the subject of frequent animal rights activities over the past few years, including sit-ins, leafletting and protests by the Islington Animal Rights Group and direct action by the ALF.

The manager of Dingles, the Plymouth store severely damaged by an ALF incendiary attack last December, announced that the store would no longer sell furs when it reopened. (Western Evening Herald 2/3/89)

The principality of Liechtenstein (between Austria and Switzerland) has banned animal experimentation as part of a far-reaching animal protection law. The area is one of the key industrial manufacturers of chemicals and pharmaceuticals. The Italian Province of South Tyrol has imposed a similar ban. (ACC News Summer '89)

The number of dairy cows in the EEC has dropped by 3 million (13%) since 1983 with the UK herd being reduced by 6% in recent years. Since 1980 egg consumption is down 22%, milk and cream down 11%, beef and veal down 17%, mutton and lamb down 41%, pork down 23% and butter down 47%. (The Vegan)

Figures from the Dept. of Trade & Industry show that fur sales have plummeted in recent years – £80 million in 1984, £47m in 1987, £22m in the first 9 months of 1988.

Editorial note:-

Prison regulations have forced Ronnie Lee to temporarily resign as co-editor of Arkangel, but he will be taking up the position again on his eventual release from prison. He has also had to reduce the number of items he can contribute to the magazine, but will still be writing articles from time to time. Ronnie is sad at having to limit his involvement in Arkangel, but delighted that it has received so much moral support, and urges readers who can afford it to be generous with their financial contributions in order to enable the mag to continue.

Arkangel intends to promote unity, respect and co-operation within the movement for animal welfare/protection/rights/liberation. It intends to encourage a positive and optimistic approach towards the struggle against animal persecution. And it intends to act as a forum for uncensored debate within the movement.

The Editor does not necessarily agree with everything in this magazine - does not necessarily agree with all the activities of the groups and organizations publicised, nor necessarily agrees with opinions expressed by individuals in the 'comment' section of the magazine. Arkangel has a policy not to censor any activities carried out to help animals, nor to censor any points of view, and they will therefore be included without the interference of the editors personal views. The content of the magazine is, however, restricted by a) available space (and at present we can't afford to produce a bigger mag to accommodate more) and b) the law (the Editor cannot, for example, include articles which intend to encourage illegal actions).

Many thanks for the overwhelming encouragement that Arkangel has received. Thank you too, to all who've sent news, reports, press cuttings, information, photos, donations, letter and articles.

THOUGHT-POLICE FOR ANIMALS?

It is always good to hear about the formation of a new local animal rights group, and when that group quickly becomes involved in positive campaigning, that is even more encouraging. Such has been the case with Action for Animals (London Area) - and therefore it was particularly disappointing to learn that repressive clauses are included amongst the "Principles" in the group's Founding Statement.

One of these clauses seems to exclude from the group "those who advocate a campaign of violence against the animal abuse industries". Of course, it would not be good tactics for Action for Animals (London) or any other local AR group to engage in "violence" (whatever that may mean) or indeed any illegal activity, as this would prejudice the lawful campaigns of such groups. It smacks very much of the thought-police, however, to seek to exclude from the group anyone who may happen to agree with "violence".

Does this mean that all sympathizers of the ALF would be barred from AFA (London) - even if they have never been ALF activists? A fairly recent opinion poll showed that at least 20% of young people agree with ALF tactics. It can safely be presumed that amongst those who believe in animal rights the figure is very much higher. The AFA (London) policy certainly means, therefore, that a large number of good AR campaigners cannot be members of their group. How in the world can such a policy possibly be of benefit to the animals?

Further on in the AFA (London) Principles one reads that "sympathizers who do not necessarily agree, understand or adhere to all aspects of animal rights theory" can be members of the group. Nothing wrong with that at all, but then later one learns that "advocates or active sympathizers of the National Front (or its various splinter groups)" are excluded. No matter what one feels about racism (and I personally think it is appalling), can it be right, say, that a vegetarian supporter of the NF, should be prevented from joining an AR group, when membership is open to, for example, a meat-eating member of the Conservative Party or a socialist angler?

If someone who genuinely cares about the animals happens also to be racist, it is surely the task of compassionate people to calmly point out to that individual the inconsistency of his or her position. How on Earth can this be done if the person in question is excluded from membership of AR groups?

A very important function of local animal rights groups should be to unite people who care about the animals, rather than to divide them. It is sad that AFA (London) did not consider this vital point when drafting their Founding Statement. It is to be hoped that members of the group will initiate the necessary changes and that in future other new AR groups will not make the same mistakes.

BUAV DISPUTE SETTLED

It is indeed welcome news that the dispute between the BUAV and its staff trade union ACTS is now at an end. The confrontation caused considerable disruption to the BUAV's work and a great deal of ill-feeling among its committee, staff and members, with the main losers, as always, being the animals. In the end, as has to be the way, the problem was resolved through negotiation. One wonders why it was that for so long the BUAV committee refused to negotiate with the union. Such problems can only ever be solved by discussion.

The BUAV has achieved considerable success in recent years in its battle against vivisection. But the history of those years has also been one of frequent internal disputes and disruption. This problem can be traced back to the "radicalization" of the society in the early eighties, when a successful campaign was staged to replace the BUAV "old guard" with others of a more progressive and dynamic opinion. On the whole this proved to be a positive step for animal protection, but it was rather sullied by the fact that the "radicals" had used lies and dirty tricks in order to discredit the opposition. As well as being unethical, this was quite unnecessary, as the progressives would have won hands down anyway, and it meant that several BUAV officials, who had devoted a large part of their lives to the cause of anti-vivisection, were insulted, falsely accused of misappropriation of funds etc. and ended their days in sadness and isolation. Those who gain power by fighting dirty will always seek to hold on to it by the same methods and this has continued, to this day, to be at the root of the BUAV's problems. It is yet another lesson for us all that disputes between animal protectionists must always be carried out in an atmosphere of honesty, mutual respect and consideration.

THE BOND OF SUFFERING

"Animal liberationists are realists in the truest sense, they have uncovered an animal 'holocaust' at the heart of our society, and have been so touched by it that they cannot forget, nor can they turn away, nor can they ever rest until they have acted, in however small a way, to lessen the weight of that terrible suffering". What truth there is in that extract from Barry Maycock's article in Arkangel No. 1! Indeed perhaps the main thing that all animal liberationists share together is the "weight of that terrible suffering". The horror of waking every morning to a world of animal torture. It is this sense of suffering which should unify us, should bind us together. And yet so many animal liberationists insist on adding to the suffering of their fellow campaigners with cruel words, personal insults, even downright hatred because of differences of opinion over some relatively minor matter. For most matters are relatively minor compared with the immense suffering of the animals, compared with the pain we all feel inside because of it.

It is about time that all of us extended the compassion we feel for the animals to include all other animal rights campaigners. Time we learnt to discuss our differences calmly, respectfully and without rancour and to do our utmost possible to work together. Time we learnt to reserve our hatred for the real enemy, the animal abusers. Time we helped to heal each other's wounds instead of rubbing salt into them. Time to be more gentle with each other.

OBITUARIES

NORA FLETCHER died on 10th February 1990. She was a regular driver for Sheffield hunt saboteurs and Sheffield activists during the early eighties. She was a stalwart demonstrator against animal abuse and will be remembered by fellow activists with respect and affection. She was truly kind and good.

GRACE DODDS of Portsmouth died last July at the age of 78. She was tireless in every means of campaigning - in recent years she was particularly active in the local campaign to close Wickham labs. Most recently she had managed to get an animal ambulance for Havant near Portsmouth and was also loaning it out to local hunt saboteurs. Grace was very spirited and even at the age of 70 was sitting on fox earths at hunts to try and stop them digging down to the fox. She told a fellow campaigner how she would rescue animals and go to prison if necessary, but for her arthritis. At the grave-side at Grace's funeral a small lurcher dog was there to pay tribute - Grace had only 2 days before saved it from a 'death sentence'.

GEORGE ADAMSON was gunned down on August 20th 1989 in a confrontation with armed bandits on his compound in the Kora Game Reserve in Kenya. He was always surrounded by the violent devastation of ever-increasing poaching in Kenya but his devotion to conservation and wildlife pulled him beyond concerns for his own safety. He and his wife Joy rescued and cared for young lions, then released them back into the wild. The Adamsons' work broke new ground in wildlife rehabilitation. George was one of the few people in the world willing to brave the ever-present threat of death by poachers, for a cause he seemed to know he would die for. The quiet strength of George Adamson will be missed by people all over the world who believed in him and his work, but most of all he will be missed by those he sacrificed his life for, the lions.

George Adamson

KATHLEEN MITCHELL, founder member, Vice-President and former Honorary Press Secretary of the Captive Animals Protection Society died on June 6th. She had been associated with CAPS for 30 years and wrote countless letters to the press, radio and TV, spreading a message of compassion and justice for all animals. Her talent and experience have been sadly missed and she is remembered with affection by all who knew her.

EILEEN RYAN of Dulwich, London, died of cancer on 27th April 1989. She was a fearless opponent of animal abuse and acted as Parliamentary Officer for Animal Aid until stricken with illness. She dedicated her time to leafletting and demos and was a powerful and eloquent writer for the cause of animal rights. She took into her care some stray cats and will be remembered as a very caring, compassionate person both to animals and people. She is missed sadly by all who knew her.

LUCY NEWMAN died last October at the age of 92, 4 days after attending a march in Scunthorpe against the Unigate chicken plants in the area. She had formed, and become Secretary and National Organiser of, the National Society Against Factory Farming, the first ever society in the world to fight factory farming. She gave talks throughout the country and led protest marches to the Ministry of Agriculture and rallies in Trafalgar Square long before such protest methods for animals were popular. She brought prosecutions in the courts against factory farmers and even multi-national organizations where cruel practices existed. May Lucy Newman's indomitable spirit and deep compassion remain for ever to inspire others to continue to fight all abuses perpetrated against the long-suffering animal kingdom.

JOAN GILBERT died on December 8th 1989 aged 74. She was proud of her mother, a suffragette, who broke a Home Office window then waited to be arrested. Joan often wished she was young enough to fight in the same way for animal liberation. She was an ALF supporter from its beginning. She helped start Bournemouth and Poole Animal Aid and was one of the first onto the streets when Animal Aid began its leafletting campaign. Having only one lung didn't stop Joan taking part in long marches and she once pretended to be a customer so that protesters could gain access for a fur shop sit-in. We will miss her greatly and can only hope that she has found peace at last.

NATIONAL CAMPAIGNS

by Ronnie Lee

SCOTTISH OFFICES

Animal Concern (Scotland) has now moved into new offices with a shop front for displays. This has proved to be expensive and only a £9,000 legacy saved the society from closing down. Funds are still urgently needed.

ACS is stepping up its anti-bloodsports campaign and is organising a boycott of Devon and Somerset as holiday designations because of the continuation there of deer hunting with hounds (which is illegal in Scotland). The society continues to campaign for all shooting of seals in Scotland to be made illegal and in August it was successful in bringing about the first prosecution of a fish farmer for illegal shooting of seals (because he used a shotgun). Although he was only fined £200 the trial got massive publicity and led to new reports of seal shootings, which are being investigated.

ACS is also demanding a ban on the payment of bounty money by salmon farmers to seal-shooters and is putting pressure on the Nature Conservancy Council to get rid of one of their wardens who shoots seals. Violinist Fiona Middleton has recorded an album 'Today The Seals' in aid of the society's Save Scotlands Seals Fund. Fiona and her brother, international concert pianist Willy Cuthbertson, played a duet to the seals in a sanctuary on Islay, which attracted widespread TV and newspaper publicity for the protection campaign. ACS is continuing to campaign against salmon farming and in November the society's Organising Secretary addressed meetings of local animal rights groups in London and Manchester about the horrors of this particular activity. It was agreed that the campaign should be carried south of the border with the picketing of salmon sales outlets and Animal Concern has donated an initial 110,000 leaflets to various groups for this purpose. The society itself has been involved in leafletting outside such outlets in Scotland.

ACS has produced new anti-fur farming and anti-factory farming leaflets, has picketed fur shops in Scotland and is trying to get a campaign going against fur farming north of the border. The society is also preparing a new anti-vivisection project and picketed notorious animal torturer Colin Blakemore when he visited Edinburgh in the summer. Circuses with performing animals are another target for ACS and several have been leafleted. Animal Concern has also been campaigning against stores that sell ivory items and picketed Glasgow Airport to inform holiday makers about the cruelty involved in bull-fighting and the use of animals by beach photographers. Members were asked to write to the Argyll and Bute District Council protesting against an exhibition where sheep are kept in cruel conditions. The society also produced a special Xmas leaflet and held campaign stalls leading up to Xmas Day.

ACS is in the process of producing a range of posters on different subjects and provides free literature and a small annual grant to local Scottish animal rights groups. Through the Scottish Animal Rights Network it hosts regular meetings open to all animal rights/welfare organizations. Monthly ACS working party groups are held in Glasgow to discuss campaigns and arrange leaflettings and events and speakers are often invited and videos shown on special issues. The society now has a range of sales goods including cruelty-free cosmetics and toiletries.

ADVERTS FOR ANIMALS

There have been many staff changes at Animal Aid recently, but it is still vigorously continuing its campaign against all animal persecution. The society instituted a London Underground Advertising Appeal and were able to put many posters on the underground system. It has also had adverts in the national press, especially after the deaths of the ferry beagles, when members of the public were urged to write to the Ministry of Agriculture asking for a ban on the export of laboratory animals.

Animal Aid held a conference weekend in September and in October was involved in Fur Amnesty Week as a joint effort with Lynx. In connection with this, demos were held all over the country with Animal Aid groups being involved in many of them. Animal Aid members were asked to write to the Chairman of L'Oreal (UK) demanding an end to the company's experiments on animals and the society itself wrote to the various examining boards as part of its campaign against dissection in schools. The boards were asked to issue guide lines instructing teachers to provide alternatives and to properly inform and guide pupils.

The society's campaign against the LD50 continued and members were urged to write to the Home Secretary and the Chairman of the Home Office Animal Procedures Committee to ask that the test be prohibited. A very informative Xmas campaign was launched, including a Xmas Without Cruelty leaflet, and a new gift catalogue brought in much needed funds. These were also swelled by £20,000 raised in the society's 1989 raffle.

The successful Animal Aid Youth Group continues and a Young Writers Competition was held, with winning entries being published in the society's magazine "Outrage!".

SG TO SUE?

The ALF Supporters Group is looking into the possibility of taking court proceedings against the author and publishers of the book 'Animal Warfare' because of the untruths and distortions about the ALF and the ALF SG that it contains. The SG Newsletter continues to provide information about activists arrested for animal liberation activities in various countries. (BCM 1160, London, WC1N 3XX)

ALBUMS FOR ANIMALS

Distribution deals for the Artists for Animals album 'The Liberator' have now been set up in Europe, the USA and Japan and October saw the release of the AFA folk album 'The Sporting Life'. In December the group organized a gig at Huddersfield Poly with half the funds raised going to North West Hunt Saboteurs. (PO Box 18, South PDO, Manchester, M14 5HB) cruelly tested. Details of the opinion poll results were released at a major press briefing early in September with many journalists present, and there were interviews on a number of radio programmes and several articles in national papers. The BUAV announced that it was to use the results of the poll to press the Home Secretary to ban such tests in the next Parliamentary session. Also at the press conference the society announced that L'Oreal, the world's biggest cosmetics company, was to be the next target in the anti-cruel tests campaign in conjunction with anti-vivisection organizations in many other countries. The campaign was launched with a major photocall outside L'Oreal's UK headquarters in Kensington, where top models and BUAV staff dumped L'Oreal products in a dustbin and called on their customers to follow suit, with a giant version of the BUAV campaign leaflet hammering home the protest theme. The BUAV also asked its members to boycott L'Oreal products and to encourage others to do the same and the society distributed protest postcards to be sent to the company's UK Chairman informing him that the sender would boycott L'Oreal until the cruel tests were ended. The announcement that a nationwide campaign was being mounted by the BUAV to picket L'Oreal hairdressing contests prompted the company's Vice-Chairman to meet the society in an effort to obtain a truce. Plans were discussed to phase out tests on animals and the Vice-Chairman offered to fly in a top L'Oreal scientist from France for talks.

A BUAV investigation into the trade in retired greyhounds to vivisection labs (during which 6 of the dogs were rescued) created a storm of protest and Denisu Ltd., the firm involved in supplying the labs with greyhounds, has now closed down. The society is now increasing pressure on the Home Office to stop this sort of trade and the National Greyhound Club reacted positively, implementing a new rule to tighten procedures for the rehoming of retired greyhounds. Following the deaths of the Swedish ferry beagles, the BUAV began a campaign for the supplying Co. (Alpha Sirius Ltd.) to be refused a future licence to breed and supply lab animals and for a ban on the import and export of animals for experimentation.

On the political front over 300 MPs signed an Early Day Motion calling on the Home Secretary to cease granting licences to test cosmetics and their ingredients on animals. The BUAV urged its supporters and the general public to ask their MPs to support the Motion, making it one of the best supported EDMs since the war. The society was present at the 3 major party conferences in the autumn, highlighting its campaign against cosmetics tests on animals, with exhibitions at the Labour and SLD conferences and meetings, with various speakers, at all three. Every MP is now sent copies of the BUAV's new Parliamentary Bulletin, which contains regular news of the society's activities and is supplemented with specialist briefings to provide more detailed examination of important issues. The BUAV intends to hold stalls and fringe meetings at the Green Party conference in the spring and at those of the other 3 parties, once again, in the autumn. The society is about to begin a new and more rapid period of growth and plans to increase existing staff by about 50%. In September nearly 2,000 people helped raise funds in 8 major walks, which formed part of the Walk for Laboratory Animals '89 and many smaller local walks also took place. Various street collections are being organised this year.

The BUAV's new Health With Humanity booklet, which shows how animal experiments are pointless, irrelevant and potentially dangerous is now available and it is good to hear that, after negotiations, the society's dispute with its staff trade union, the ACTS, is now at an end.

HUNTINGDON HORRORS EXPOSED

A British Union for the Abolition of Vivisection investigator, Sarah Kite, worked under cover as a cleaner for 8 months at the Huntingdon Research Laboratory and by means of her photographs and notes was able to reveal the horror of animal experiments taking place there. This was featured for several days running in the Today newspaper in November and massive national and local publicity was obtained. The BUAV office was deluged with mail and phone calls offering help and support and 3 public meetings were held at Huntingdon, Cambridge and Peterborough with over 100 local residents turning up at the Huntingdon one. Demonstrations were organised outside the research centre and postcards produced for members to send to the Home Secretary demanding action against the lab. The society has also sent its own full and detailed dossier about HRC to the Home Office.

Bradford University became the centre of local controversy after a BUAV investigation into cruel experiments being carried out there and in December the society staged a demonstration outside the North humberside company Bantin and Kingman, who supply animals for vivisection. The BUAV has given support to the Stevenage Animal Rights group against the building of a Glaxo vivisection lab in the town and a very good article about the campaign (useful for other local A/R groups) appeared in the winter edition of the BUAV mag 'Liberator'.

The BUAV "Choose Cruelty-Free" campaign continues to gather momentum and pressure from the society and other groups has resulted in Avon, Revlon and Benetton announcing an end to the testing of their cosmetics products on animals. Tesco agreed to launch a new "cruelty-free" range of toiletries produced in consultation with the BUAV and Sainsburys, Marks and Spencer, the Co-op, Boots and Gateways were among those in discussion with the society over their own plans to introduce "cruelty-free" products. A national referendum launched by the BUAV in May resulted in overwhelming support for the society's opposition to cosmetics tests on animals from every town visited. This was held in connection with the BUAV exhibition bus tour of towns and cities which went on until the end of August. The L'Arome "cruelty-free" products company gave £60,000 to keep the bus on the road in return for using its colours and displaying its products. The bus tour schedule covered 40 towns and thousands of people visited the vehicle.

Public demand for the BUAV's "Approved Product Guide" listing "cruelty-free" companies and products has been "phenomenal" and it has been reprinted 3 times. In the 2 years or so since the campaign's inception about 250,000 guides have been requested. A new, fully updated guide was released in September, containing about 160 companies, a 50% increase on the previous edition. As well as not testing on animals, many of the firms listed only use raw ingredients suitable for vegetarians and vegans. The society has also launched a nationwide cinema advert in support of the campaign. A 60 second commercial "Ugly Pain" highlights the cruelty of cosmetics tests on animals and has been accompanied by the distribution of special leaflets outside cinemas. As well as appearing at cinemas throughout the UK the ad has received widespread media coverage and it is intended to screen it again this Spring.

A Mori poll commissioned by the BUAV in August showed that 85% of people oppose the use of animals for cosmetics and toiletries testing (a 10% increase from 1984). The majority of these would also be prepared to stop buying their favourite products if they discovered they were

ALARM APPEAL

High-tech alarms with sophisticated sensors are now being used to provide 24 hour protection for badgers from baiters and diggers and with a national appeal the Badger Trust hopes to provide a further 500. People are being asked to sponsor a badger sett for £25 a year and the Trust hopes to raise £125,000 to pay for the alarms. Once concealed in the sett, the sensor is expected to work for more than 10 years and when someone disturbs the earth it transmits a radio signal up to 15 miles to badger group members who can then inform the police. Already many schools have been sent information about the appeal, so that youngsters can come up with various projects to raise funds.

DOGS SAVED

Beauty Without Cruelty's India Branch has once again been successful, this time in stopping a local plan to ship surplus dogs from Calcutta to South Korean meat markets. Nearer to home the society has been pressing for proper European legislation against the fur trade and has instigated a letter writing campaign in support of this. BWC has the support of 12 British MEPs on this issue and much news coverage has been obtained. 7,000 signatures were collected in support of an indefinite EEC sealskin ban, which has now been implemented, and the society held a "Fur Farewell to Hudson's Bay and Annings" demo in London in September, in which they delivered a giant "No Return" ticket to the company staff. A press conference then followed.

BWC has appealed to the International Olympic Committee asking that the 1992 Games not be held in Barcelona because of the continuation of bull-fighting and cruel fiestas in Spain and a petition to the IOC was launched by the society at the Living Without Cruelty Exhibition. Members were also asked to write to CITES asking them to upgrade the African elephant to Appendix 1 status.

On the Isle of Man the local BWC group fought a campaign against Gandey's circus (performing animals). A lot of radio and press coverage was obtained and the circus said it would not return to the island. The society's Leeds group continues to run the BWC "cruelty-free" shop and has been petitioning for support for a total ban on cosmetics tests on animals. In London local members organised street stalls to promote the anti-fur campaign and collected signatures for the seal petition.

FERAL FRIENDS

The Cat Action Trust has been working so efficiently that noticeably fewer kittens are needing homes in areas where the society has active groups. CAT helps with the problem of feral cats, trapping, neutering and rehoming wherever possible, but some cats are returned to their original site in the safe knowledge that they can no longer breed.

ANTI-ANGLING EXPANSION

With a total of at least 30 contacts in 25 areas and a new youth group, the Campaign for the Abolition of Angling seems to be gradually expanding in its battle against Britain's most widespread bloodsport. The society has also produced new Commercial Fishing and Fish Farming info sheets to add to the now considerable number of factsheets, leaflets, posters etc. that it has available.

On the CAA organised National Anti-Angling Day last year, local groups leafletted in town centres and several radio interviews were obtained. Much publicity also resulted from a joint CAA/Hunt Saboteurs Association letter sent to all local newspapers. The society held stalls at various Living Without Cruelty exhibitions and is in the process of making a video.

SANCTUARY SUPPORT

Support from Care for the Wild has now enabled the Aberdare Rhino Sanctuary in Kenya to be completely fenced in and it has now become fully operational.

The society has also provided funds to supply walkie-talkies for staff patrolling the sanctuary, which gives protection to the black rhino against poachers. Also in Kenya, Care for the Wild continues to aid an elephant orphanage and has helped with funds to build new stables for the elephants and to provide them with medical treatment. In October the society launched a scheme which offers the opportunity to foster a young elephant at the orphanage. The elephants are helped with funds for food and medical supplies while the 'foster parent' gets a feeling of involvement towards the orphan of their choice and receives a pack including a video tape of the orphans, a large colour photo of their elephant and a certificate. There are currently 7 young elephants at the orphanage and fostering costs £15. Care for the Wild has also helped the desert elephant in Namibia by providing funds to buy radio collars and tracking equipment in an effort to protect them from poachers. The society aims to produce an educational pack on elephants for schools and gathered 70,000 signatures to help obtain a ban on the ivory trade at the CITES meeting, where Care for the Wild experts gave advice to delegates.

Turtles are another creature which receive a great deal of help from Care for the Wild, with the society having sea turtle projects in Greece, Bangladesh, Sri Lanka and the USA. Care for the Wild's fieldworker in Bangladesh did a report on the trade there in turtles and the results will be used to try to achieve a tightening up of regulations concerning the trade. The society also sent a team of biologists to study loggerhead turtles as part of protection efforts in Greece, where one function of the project is to educate holiday makers about the turtles. In the southern USA Care for the Wild is funding a scientist to investigate the activities of shrimp fishermen as many turtles are drowned there as a result of being caught in shrimpers nets. The society has a 30 acre turtle sanctuary in Sri Lanka, where in 1988-89 over 10,000 eggs were relocated, of which 8,000 hatched, with the baby turtles being returned to the sea. Without these efforts there would have been a grave danger of the eggs being stolen and patrols regularly visit the beach to relocate eggs in order to guard them from poachers. T-shirts have been distributed to local children bearing the caption "I Love Turtles, Protect Them" in Sinhalese and a biologist has been sent to investigate the status of the turtles and prepare a report.

In Australia Care for the Wild has contributed to equipping a Koala hospital and research centre, which also treats other sick and injured wildlife as well as investigating diseases that are threatening koalas. Happily the most serious of these diseases can now be successfully treated at the centre.

Care for the Wild has published a report as part of its investigation into the killing of dolphins by the tuna industry in the Pacific and hopes to persuade the European Parliament to call for a ban on yellowfin tuna in order to protect the dolphins. The society is also campaigning for restrictions on fur imports into the European Community and is working in close co-operation with LYNX.

Nearer to home Care for the Wild is giving aid to badger protection groups around the country, with particular emphasis on helping them to purchase equipment to guard setts. The society is pressing for tighter laws against badger diggers and aims to set up angled reflectors at known badger crossings to keep badgers off the road and so reduce mortalities. In Scotland a Care for the Wild field-worker is studying the behaviour of otters to try to discover why the animal has not made a come-back in England.

Work in schools is another priority for the society and this is now expanding. The Care for the Wild book is being distributed to every secondary school in the country to provide reference material for pupils and teachers should they encounter any sick or injured wildlife. To exert pressure on Parliament the society has set up the Care for the Wild Defence Fund to undertake lobbying, which charities are not permitted to do.

On the fund raising front, Care for the Wild has produced its own credit card in conjunction with Mastercard. This is administered by the Bank of Credit and Commerce International, which donates money to Care for the Wild every time a card is issued or used. A charity concert 'Rock for the Wild' was held in August in Dorset, where 12 bands played to raise money for the society.

The latest Care for the Wild project is in aid of the sick and injured seals and sea birds found around the Norfolk coast and funds are being raised to help two sanctuaries in the area.

EUROPEAN NETWORK

The British Trust for Conservation Volunteers, which has set up hundreds of projects in the USA, is now helping to establish a network to involve people across Europe in schemes such as preserving loggerhead turtles and protecting the territory of the griffin vulture.

HEDGEROW PROTECTION

In a new booklet entitled 'Hedges' the Council for the Protection of Rural England shows concerned people how to go about saving hedgerows by contacting the media and MPs and sending photos of hedgerow destruction to the CPRE so that the society can compile a visual dossier. The booklet, which is the first in a series called 'Countryside Concerns' is available by sending an SAE to CPRE's Hedge Campaign. The society, which has 40,000 members, is hoping to persuade the Government to protect hedges in its autumn environmental protection White Paper and to introduce landscape conservation orders to prevent hedge destruction. In the booklet CPRE also calls upon people to conduct a survey of hedges and document the number of species to be found.

TURKEY'S LIB

Chicken's Lib is now also researching into the condition of turkeys and is asking for information on the turkey industry and photos of the birds. A turkey factsheet has been produced by the society as part of its range of informative documents.

Supporters of Chicken's Lib have been urged to write to the Minister of Agriculture to protest against cruelty to chickens, and the society's petition, which hopes to persuade Marks and Spencer not to sell battery eggs, is still continuing.

Chicken's Lib helped with material for the Month of Poultry Action (Sept/Oct) and co-founder Clare Druce has written a book 'Chicken and Egg - who pays the price?', covering the whole spectrum of egg-layers, broilers and breeding flocks.

GAINING MOMENTUM

Despite being in a bit of financial difficulty and needing a few donations, the Campaign Against Leather and Fur is gaining momentum. The group held a day of action in London in October and have produced leaflets, a factsheet, a 'Shed Dead Skin' badge and 5 different stickers. It aims to issue another leaflet, with photos, and to encourage other animals rights groups to take up the issue of leather.

ANTI-BATTERY DEMO

On November 11th the Campaign Against Farm Animal Abuse held a National Anti-Battery Farming Demo at Becketts Poultry near Birmingham. The event went well with a large number of demonstrators and speakers from various organizations. Hundreds of leaflets were given out to the public during a march held around Birmingham city centre prior to the demo and there was plenty of media coverage.

MONTH OF ACTION

Co-ordinating Animal Welfare held a display of poultry crates and photos in Bristol in September to mark the beginning of the National Month of Action Against the Poultry Industry. CAW also co-ordinated a day of action against the fur trade in November and holds meetings in various parts of the country.

SUCCESSFUL YEAR

In its Annual Report for 1989 the Captive Animals Protection Society tells of a successful year with an increase in membership and links being strengthened with similar organizations abroad. More press and media coverage was given to the unacceptable conditions for animals in circuses and numerous letters and phone calls were received by the society every day, including many from young people doing projects at school. CAPS visited various circuses to obtain information and were instrumental in getting even more local authorities to ban circuses with performing animals from their land. The society is campaigning against the sponsorship by Lever Bros of the Moscow State Circus and representatives attended the Unilever AGM to air their views. CAPS is also aiming to draw international attention to the suffering caused to animals in the Moscow State Circus and has offered funds to the Moscow Animal Protection Society to help with its campaign against the keeping of animals in circuses. On the international front the society has also given help and support to a newly formed animal protection group in Poland, is supporting the Care for the Wild campaign against the slaughter of elephants for ivory and has contributed towards the elephant orphanage in Kenya. Two dolphins rescued from a Cairo hotel swimming pool have been helped by contributions from CAPS, which is also campaigning for the closure of all dolphinariums. The society has contributed info to public displays at libraries, has held literature displays at several events and sends leaflets to many local A/R groups for anti animal-circus campaigns.

CHRISTIAN PETITION

The Christian Consultative Council for the Welfare of Animals has organised a national petition urging the Church Commissioners and other owners of church land to ban hunting and factory farming from their land and to put it to humane use, such as conservation, organic farming, re-afforestation or wildlife sanctuaries. The Council urged all Christians to press their synod representatives to support a Private Members Motion before the General Synod asking the Church Commissioners to "critically review" both hunting and intensive farming.

CIVIS INTERNATIONAL

The CIVIS booklet "Vivisection is Scientific Fraud" has now been translated into Japanese and published in Japan and in France. CIVIS founder Hans Reusch appeared before an estimated 20 million viewers on Brigitte Bardot's SOS Animals programme to put forward arguments for the abolition of vivisection. CIVIS has recently published "1,000 Doctors (And Many More) Against Vivisection" and plans to bring out a video in the near future.

COMPASSION'S CAMPAIGNS

Compassion in World Farming's petition for the European Parliament to grant "sentient animal" status to farm animals etc. is now being circulated in other EC countries and there is the prospect of an interview on the subject with a major TV environment programme. CIWF is also campaigning for better European Council regulations on the treatment of pigs and calves kept in intensive farming systems and is supporting a campaign by the Greek Animal Welfare Fund to get the Greek Government to implement laws to reduce cruelty in the country's abattoirs. The society is demanding that the British Government honours the European Convention on the welfare of farm animals and bans the battery cage, as well as urging that a ban be placed on the transport of deer to abattoirs. One member collected 17,000 signatures calling for the European Parliament to ban BST as part of the CIWF campaign against the genetically engineered dairy hormone on the grounds of danger to human health and animal welfare, and the society also opposes the patenting of animals, claiming that this will lead to a massive increase in genetic engineering experiments to achieve transgenic animals. CIWF is urging its members to write to the Australian Prime Minister asking him to phase out live sheep exports because of the suffering involved and if the sheep trade continues it intends to call for a total boycott of Australian food. The society is also campaigning for an end to live exports within Europe, against the serving of halal meat in schools, for the abolition of fur farms, against feed lots, where cattle are kept in bad conditions while being fattened up for slaughter, and against TV commercials involving suffering to cows. CIWF regularly contacts restaurants selling frogs legs to tell them of the cruelty involved and ask them to stop and it has written to the major supermarket chains asking for all meat to be labelled with the methods of production and slaughter. The society is appealing for volunteers to monitor ports for incidents of suffering to animals being shipped abroad and has also urged local groups to monitor cattle markets in order to improve conditions for the animals. Copies of the relevant market legislation have been provided to help with this. In India CIWF is working with WSPA to improve transport and slaughter conditions for animals.

On October 2nd, World Farm Animals Day, CIWF presented the awards for its British Farm Animal Photo Competition, which helped reveal the true face of factory farming and it is willing to hire an exhibition of the photos for local displays. CIWF members distributed over 15,000 leaflets at Crufts, where 48 new members were gained and the society had a successful stand at the ASDA Festival of Food in Hyde Park.

In Parliament an Early Day Motion, supported by CIWF, calling for an immediate ban on BST in the UK, attracted 116 signatures and, at the behest of the society, MP Chris Mullins put down a Motion calling for an improvement in the supervision of animal welfare in slaughterhouses, to which 40 MPs had added their names within days of it appearing.

CIWF has recently started a youth wing for under 16s called Farm Animal Rangers, together with an informative youth magazine, badge, stickers and sales goods, and the society's project suggestion "The Place of Animals in the Farm" has been put into 30,000 schools.

KINDNESS-V-CANCER

A new leaflet has been produced by the Dr Hadwen Trust for Humane Research which discussed the scientific and moral arguments against cancer research on animals and promotes humane techniques. The trust is currently funding a study of 11,000 human volunteers to establish the effects of different aspects of diet on cancer (and heart disease) and is also paying for research where human cells from cancer patients are tested in the lab for effects of anti-cancer drugs.

A grant of £26,602 has been given for research into whether vitamin C can prevent stomach cancer, using human cells. Since 1970 the Trust, which no longer offers grants for research using animal cells or tissues of any sort, has spent £390,000 on more than 40 humane research projects (cancer, diabetes, brain damage etc.) and is now also funding research into AIDS at the Royal Postgraduate Medical School in London, where it has given a new grant of £32,337 over 3 years for cell culture work on the disease.

CHARITIES LIST

A list of charities which don't fund vivisection is available from Disabled Against Animal Research and Exploitation, which has also produced T-shirts, badges, posters and a leaflet. The DAARE newsletter is now also available on cassette and the organization, whose membership has grown to over 300 worldwide, now has a Supporters Group for those who aren't disabled but wish to help.

JUMBO PETITION

At the 7th CITES conference in October Elefriends used a huge jumbo-shaped balloon as part of its campaign calling on delegates to save the elephant and a petition with over a million signatures was handed over to the CITES Chairman. Worldwide publicity was obtained and the conference voted in favour of measures to protect the African elephant.

Since its foundation in May, Elefriends has gained the support of more than 160,000 people and recently produced a new poster, which has been displayed widely.

FUND ANNIVERSARY

September 1990 will be the 21st anniversary of the Fund for the Replacement of Animals in Medical Experiments and to mark the event the charity plans to increase the scale of its activities. In September last year an Anniversary Appeal was launched with the aim of raising £1 million by the end of 1990 and over £100,000 had already been received at the time of the launch.

FRAME also has a new logo, which it hopes will appeal more to the public, and an additional publication "Friends of Frame", which gives news and info for supporters and helpers.

Other planned fundraising events include an auction in London, a fashion show, a concert and a fun run, and the Fund is sending a team to cycle 1700 miles across Australia to raise money and spread word of FRAME. Tesco is donating 1p to the Fund for each product sold from a new natural beauty range called Nature's Choice and FRAME is featured in the publicity and sales materials. The Fund is also seeking £600,000 from industrial companies to finance a further 4 year period of its research programme.

The latest FRAME annual report shows total income up 13% from the previous year with only 5% being spent on administration and £155,000 going to alternatives research.

The FRAME data bank of non-animal techniques in toxicology now contains contributions from about 200 scientists and is to be further developed with the aid of a grant from the Commission of European Communities.

Another FRAME research group (at Hatfield Poly) is to join the 3 existing ones and the Fund is helping to carry out a survey on the use of primates in British labs, with a report published at the end of last year. The Fund has embarked on a campaign against the LD50 test and FRAME research groups were represented at a non-animal tests toxicology conference at Nottingham University, where alternatives to the LD50 are being developed.

FRAME is also sponsoring research into humane alternatives to the Draize eye irritation test and several are being tried out.

FREE RANGE CAMPAIGN

The Free Range Egg Association has produced leaflets on the new salmonella regulations and is campaigning for exemption and/or financial assistance for small free range farmers. FREGG had a meeting with the Ministry of Agriculture in connection with this and sent out over 500 letters, petitions and leaflets to animal welfare groups up and down the country as well as giving interviews on local radio. The Association is planning to run a "Free Range Farmer of the Year" competition to find the most humane and efficient producer and to show healthy hens in a non-intensive environment.

Friends of the Earth now has more than 150,000 supporters (a 200% increase in just over 12 months), 280 local groups and 50 "Earth Action" youth groups, and is represented in well over 30 foreign countries.

The number of local groups is increasing at the rate of about 5 per month and FOE supporters organised over 200 sponsored fund-raising events on World Environment Day to raise money and support for local projects.

FOE is encouraging people to write to the president of Brazil's Institute of Environment and Renewable Resources asking him to adopt further measures for protecting the rainforest and also wants Britain to offer assistance to Brazil to fight forest fires if necessary.

In the summer the society launched its Emergency Rainforest Appeal to help stop the burning of the rainforest and the response has enabled an intensification of the campaign, which has also begun a special appeal to raise funds for the work of FOE in Ghana.

The destruction of the rainforest in Indonesia by the Scott Paper co. is also being opposed and FOE wants imports of tropical hardwoods and their products to the EC stopped unless they come from sustainably managed forests, with a levy on all tropical timber imports to help finance conservation measures.

The Friends of the Earth battle continues against proposed legislative relaxations in the discharge of effluents by sewage treatment works and info is being supplied on how people can fight these locally.

FOE is also campaigning against contamination of the water environment by dangerous substances such as mercury and wants the UK to honour its commitment to cut pollution to the North Sea by 50% by 1995 and introduce water protection zones where the use of pesticides and nitrates is restricted.

The society is fighting Government plans to increase road-building and is encouraging its local groups to fight such proposals at public consultations and inquiries. FOE is also pressing for a revised transport policy meaning fewer cars on the roads in order to reduce acid rain and the Greenhouse Effect and to protect the countryside.

A nationwide campaign has been launched to press for the immediate introduction of catalytic converters on all cars and the fight continues for increased funds for public transport. A leaflet giving a guide to "Cleaner Motoring" has also been produced as part of the major campaign against air pollution.

A FOE Environmental Charter for Local Government has been published, which sets out measures the society would like to see implemented at a local level.

Local groups are promoting the charter and urging councils to adopt it. The society is also pressing for the UK to comply with the EC Birds Directive by creating more Special Protection Areas and is urging that more nature reserves be set up.

A FOE campaign to save dolphins from mass slaughter in driftnets used by the tuna and squid industries has also been launched.

(26-28 Underwood St, London, N1 7JQ 01 490 1555)

The Greenpeace campaign against marine pollution has continued with a number of actions. Greenpeace inflatables harried Thames Water dumpships off the Essex coast and one of the society's vessels, the Moby Dick, blockaded a dumpship at Southampton. Another Greenpeace ship, the Beluga, arrived on the River Tees to start a campaign highlighting the gross sea pollution from east coast estuaries and activists used high-power sprays to return effluent back onto waste ground near the ICI plant at Billingham. The protest ship Sirius arrived on Tyneside in January and 6 protesters were arrested after trying to prevent a ship dumping 500 tonnes of ash into the North Sea as part of a 2 month campaign against the dumping of toxic waste in the area. Charges against the 6 were later dropped.

The society's efforts to preserve Antarctica as a World Park free from minerals exploitation are finally bearing fruit after years of pressurising the authorities and operating its World Park Base. Australia and France now support the World Park idea and have refused to sign CRAMRA, an international convention regarding Antarctic mineral exploitation. India has declared support for a World Park Conservation Treaty and Belgium has made it illegal for any of its citizens to prospect for or exploit minerals in Antarctica. The UK is still being pressed to support the World Park proposal.

There was victory for the Greenpeace boycott of Icelandic fish (which cost Iceland over £30 million) when Iceland announced at the IWC meeting that its killing of whales was to end. Greenpeace also held an action at the Icelandic embassy where a huge banner and inflatable whale were suspended from the building. Just before the January visit of the Japanese prime-minister the society advertised in the national papers asking people to phone Mrs Thatcher to request that she protest against the Japanese slaughter of Minke whales in the Antarctic. Mrs T. subsequently expressed her concern to him and said that Britain thought the whaling should stop. This was just one of many Greenpeace adverts that have appeared in recent months in the national press.

Greenpeace has also published a report on the effects of acid rain on trees in southern England, with a training video to facilitate identification of signs of forest damage, and the society called on its supporters to object to the building of more nuclear power stations at Sizewell and on Anglesey. The Moby Dick toured Cardigan Bay and the Moray Firth, which are home to the two remaining populations of resident dolphins in the UK, as part of a campaign for real protection for these regions in the form of "enhanced" Marine Nature Reserves in order to prevent pollution etc. MPs and Euro-MPs were taken to see the dolphins and the attention of local people was drawn to the animals' plight. Public meetings were held, which resulted in the formation of 4 local action groups. Local pressure in Cardigan Bay prevented the setting up of a jet ski hire business, which would almost certainly have driven the dolphins from the area.

A new Rainbow Warrior was launched 2 years after the French sinking of the original and the Greenpeace office in Paris has reopened. The society's album "Rainbow Warriors" had its world release, including the release of a Soviet version. (entitled "Breakthrough"). This went on to be the first Western album ever to top the Russian music charts. Over a million copies of the album have so far been sold, with a further 3 million being pressed. In the UK it is expected to sell 250,000. Proceeds are to go towards environmental campaigns throughout the world and the album is to be used to launch Greenpeace in Japan. Also on the fundraising front the society held 100 Whale Walks with 9,000 people taking part and £345,000 so far having been raised. Nationwide pub collections took place last December and flag days and door-to-door collections were held throughout the year. Local group activities raised £440,000 between January and September with one street collection in London bringing in £81,684. Total income for the year was £5.5 million.

The number of Greenpeace UK supporters is now over 300,000 with 120,000 having been recruited in 1989. Greenpeace is currently represented in over 20 countries with total support worldwide numbering 4 million and it now has 7 oceangoing vessels. (30-31 Islington Green, London N1 8XE 01 354 5100)

VEG FOR PETS

A company marketing vegetarian health-food for pets has been flooded with orders. Green Ark received a cash boost when Cumbria County Council provided a £10,000 loan from a special fund to encourage small business expansion plans and the company is due to move into a purpose-built factory soon. Business is good, with the sale of 250 bags a week and employment for 3 part-time workers.

NEW GREEN BULLETIN

Greenwave, a non-profit ecological movement, has now produced the first issue of its bulletin "Green Dawn". It is running a photo competition for scenes of environmental abuse and the mag gives advice about how to reduce the damage caused by cars. (BCM 1628, London WC1N 3XX)

INTERNATIONAL FUND FOR ANIMAL WELFARE

KOREAN CAMPAIGN

At the time of the visit of the South Korean president to Britain in November, the International Fund for Animal Welfare ran a big national newspaper advertising campaign urging people to write to the Queen (with a picture of their own pet) asking her to intervene to stop the cruel killing of dogs and cats for meat in South Korea. The Fund also held a press conference and organised demos outside South Korean embassies in several countries. The first animal protection society in South Korea has been established with the help of IFAW, which also contributed towards the costs of caring for dogs in the Philippines saved from slaughter for food. The Fund financed another newspaper ad as part of its campaign to end all cosmetics testing on animals and is able to supply a list of "cruelty-free" cosmetics. It is still organising Seal Watch holidays in Canada to provide funds to protect the seals and assisted in wildlife rescue operations after the Exxon Valdez oil spill off Alaska. IFAW is also campaigning to save the African elephant and provided funds to help combat poachers in Uganda's national parks. 1989 was the Fund's 20th anniversary.

WORLDWIDE HELP

The International Wildlife Coalition is helping animals round the world, including seals, kangaroos, elephants and whales. It is campaigning against the Japanese slaughter of whales and fighting to ensure that the moratorium on commercial whaling isn't lifted.

International League of Doctors for the Abolition of Vivisection

DOCTORS AGAINST

Last year veterinarian members from 4 countries of the International League of Doctors for the Abolition of Vivisection held a conference in Zurich, Switzerland, to explain why they are opposed to vivisection in veterinary as well as medical science. Excerpts from their speeches are available from ILDAV. The following month the League held a congress in Geneva where doctors from 7 countries presented papers describing the harm done to humans by animal experimentation.

GRANT FOR SIMULATION

The International Association Against Painful Experiments on Animals has made a grant to the University of Chile (Santiago) for the development of microcomputer simulation to replace animals in medical education. IAAPEA continues to promote the International Charter for Health and Humane Research and distributes speeches and videos on the better treatment of animals.

FUR AMNESTY

A national Fur Amnesty Week was organised by Lynx and Animal Aid from October 21-28. This consisted of a series of public meetings where fur owners were offered the chance of attending and giving up their coats for burial. The meetings featured prominent guest speakers, films and sometimes a Lynx fashion show and local animal rights groups were involved, doing leaf-

A call by which you must BRING OUT YOUR DEAD!

The Fur Trade is the plague of the animal kingdom.
This year it will kill tens of millions of the world's most beautiful creatures.
20 million of them will die in traps after struggling in agony, when the doors are shut.
Millions more will be gassed or shot dead after their short lives spent in the grim cages of fur factories.

If you own a fur coat, take advantage of this opportunity to letting, street collections and stalls. The week culminated with a rally in Trafalgar Square where all the fur coats were destroyed. Lynx is stepping up its lobbying of MEPs to try to strengthen the weak European Commission proposals regarding the banning of fur imports, so that all furs derived from animals in the wild are prohibited, with mandatory fur labelling as an interim measure. The society aimed to erect at least 3 times as many billboard posters this past winter as the winter before and its new poster, photographed by Linda McCartney, has been displayed throughout the country. Lynx has also advertised its campaign and Covent Garden shop in lights at Piccadilly Circus. On November 29th the Lynx fashion show and Fundraising Dinner was held at the Waldorf Hotel in London and it is calling upon designers to pledge never to use fur as well as encouraging young designers into cruelty-free fashion. The society has offered to buy all fur coats given to Oxfam for £5, so they can be destroyed, as part of a campaign to dissuade the charity from selling furs, and a second Lynx shop has now opened, this time in Cambridge. A Lynx inspection of a fur factory farm at Swales Moor, Yorks, revealed terrible conditions and a report, with a full set of photos, was sent to the Minister of Agriculture calling on him to close all such establishments in the UK. The society has linked up with CIWF, RSPCA and WSPA in issuing a joint mass petition for the closure of fur factory farms and has produced postcards for its members to send to the Ministry of Agriculture on the issue as well as others to Harrods and Selfridges (protesting against the sale of furs) and to the European Parliament and Commissioner (asking for an import ban on fur from trapped animals). BADGER DIGGERS BROKEN

The League Against Cruel Sports broke 2 badger digging gangs in undercover operations in conjunction with a national newspaper. The suspected diggers were targetted, infiltrated and then filmed in the act of digging and cruelly treating badgers and, after a LACS private prosecution, received heavy fines, with the association of the diggers with foxhunts being revealed in court. The League employs several undercover investigators to infiltrate and expose badger digging, dogfighting and cockfighting, and the illegal activities of gamekeepers, and is appealing for funds to help with the work. The prosecution of the badger diggers was congratulated in Parliament in an Early Day Motion signed by over 70 MPs. LACS held a photo competition to show the true side of staghunting and also a press conference the day before the opening meet of the season to publicize new scientific evidence that deer hunted by hounds can suffer severely even if they escape. A League demo took place outside the Savoy Hotel when the first grouse of the season was delivered to the chef and support is being given to the campaign to ban hunting on C of E land. In a case at Exeter Crown Court the League established that entry of even one hound onto forbidden property constituted trespass. LACS involvement in the campaign against the killing of seals in Canada continued and the number of MPs who signed the anti-hare coursing Early Day Motion rose to nearly 200. The League is lobbying to gain support for wildlife protection measures within the trade union movement and was present at the 1989 Trades Union Congress providing info to delegates. Two open days were held at the League's Baronsdown Sanctuary in Somerset as part of fund-raising efforts and a "Summer in the Sanctuary" appeal brought in over £29,000 for the carrying out of essential repairs and maintenance work there. LACS has Fundraising Support Groups in various areas and more are being set up, with many fundraising events being organised. The League support base has trebled in the last 2 years and it now runs seven 200 clubs to bring in extra money. A new full-colour range of campaign posters, containing info about the hunted animals, has now been issued by the LACS, which has decided to no longer organise balloon releases because of the potential harm to animals in the environment. THE LIVING AND THE DEAD

The Living Churchyards Project is being sponsored by various conservation organizations to manage churchyards as thriving habitats for wildlife. Projects are already underway throughout the country and both groups and individuals can take part with a project pack (£5) and special video (£15) available. (Arthur Rank Centre, National Agricultural Centre, Stoneleigh, Warwicks, CV8 2LZ)

FIRE AND WATER

Financial help is needed by the Marine Conservation Society after a fire spread to their offices and caused £50,000 damage, only a fraction of which was covered by insurance. The society is involved in exposing and fighting all threats to the habitats of marine creatures and recently set up an office in Scotland. (9 Gloucester Rd, Ross-on-Wye, Herefords, HR9 5BU)

EVA'S BOOKLET

The Movement for Compassionate Living has produced a special booklet with an appreciation of Eva Batt's work for veganism and extracts from her writing and funds were raised to plant a tree in her memory. MCL has various other new booklets as well as envelope stickers which promote the use of land for trees instead of animal farming and there are also videos for loan. The society has given talks and shown videos at various events. (47 Highlands Rd, Leatherhead, Surrey, KT22 8NQ)

DEATH WISH FOR CAT KILLERS

The summer '89 edition of The Petwatcher, magazine of National Petwatch, gives details of the Katlit Gallup Survey's findings regarding cats, in which 3% of people questioned said they believed that cat killers and molesters should receive the death sentence. The mag also contains a Special Report on Cat Stealing, which the society has distributed to the media and Government, as well as facts about cat thieves and info on how to protect cats. National Petwatch managed to obtain an agreement from the Home Office that its national dossier of cat thefts be given to the Association of Chief Police Officers and has also prepared a second report on such incidents. The society called for the RSPCA to invest money in a National Neutering Scheme to alleviate the dog over-population problem and is appealing for equipment, such as typewriters, word processor, photocopier and answering machine for its office.

Ban Animal Experiments

WORLD DAY DEMO

The World Day for Laboratory Animals demo in London this year (April 28th) is being organised by the National Anti-Vivisection Society. In December the society held a protest outside the Kings Langley, Herts, offices of Astra Pharmaceuticals, a subsidiary of the Swedish vivisection lab which ordered the ferry beagles.

NATIONAL PET REGISTER

REGISTER FOR PETS

To reunite lost pets with their owners is one of the main aims of the National Pet Register which has a 24 hour lost pet emergency phone service as well as offering 3rd party insurance cover. The Register aims to minimise destruction of strays and reduce problems caused by uncontrolled animals. It costs £5 to register a pet for life and details of the animal is entered in a computer system with the owner being sent an engraved identification disc for its collar, which carries the 24 hour emergency number.

NCDL

A DOG IS FOR LIFE

EDUCATION ROADSHOW

The National Canine Defence League's educational roadshow began its tour of the country in the autumn to encourage owners to have their pets neutered and the society continues to get media publicity for its work, including a piece on TV AM when a puppy found in a dustbin was looked after at one of its kennels. The League is supporting the lobby for a mandatory dog registration scheme and the creation of area Dog Welfare Officers to educate the public into more responsible ownership with registration payments being less for neutered dogs. Another NCDL campaign is against the docking of dogs' tails and car stickers are available in support of this. Ten new kennels have been opened at the League's home for dogs at Ilfracombe after a £66,000 bequest and there is now a new kennel block at its Kenilworth dogs home. An appeal has been launched for refurbishing a barn in order to extend kennelling facilities at Dumfries where an additional £12,000 is needed to add to a £10,000 grant from the local council and it is hoped that work will be completed before the end of 1991. There are now 13 NCDL rescue centres throughout the UK. Several sponsored walks have been held to raise funds and the League has launched a scheme in conjunction with the Royal Bank of Scotland whereby the bank donates £7.50 for every a/c opened and gives additional money whenever the mastercard is used.

CANINE LIFE LINE

The newly formed People and Dogs Society aims to help dog owners be more responsible and has established a Canine Advice Life Line to give info on all dog-related problems. Numbers, staffed by volunteers are as follows:- North of England 0924 896858 or 0977 517180, South of England 0225 708670, Wales - Brynsiencyn 343, Newcastle-upon-Tyne 091 267 2106, York 0430 860378. USEFUL FACT SHEET

Quaker Concern for Animals member, Martin Howard, a Chartered Town Planner and planning consultant, has drawn up an Animal Rights and Planning Law factsheet for help with objections against factory farms at planning appeals, for use by local groups. The society has also produced a new Animal Experimentation leaflet and updated its introductory leaflet.

Quaker Concern for Animals

Since its formation in December Prevent Unwanted Pets has helped to pay for over 260 dogs and cats to be neutered. The group recently wrote to every MP re the success of spay/neuter clinics in Canada and California (where the number of healthy, unwanted dogs and cats destroyed has been reduced by well over $\frac{1}{2}$) to ask if they would help get such clinics started in Britain and Europe. Many positive replies were received and PUP is now sending out follow-up letters with more information. The group is glad to supply info to those wanting to set up similar projects to its own. PTES

HATCHING SUCCESS

A project by the People's Trust for Endangered Species to help the giant sea turtle in Costa Rica is going well, with the turtles nesting and a good percentage of the young hatching out, but the Trust is going to have to move its sanctuary further up the coast to make it less accessible to poachers and is appealing for funds to do this. PTES is also helping with a campaign to save turtles in the USA and is in the process of setting up a marine park off Tanzania to protect the coral reef. The Trust's campaign against whaling continues and it is funding work in Africa to help the black rhino and giraffe in the Nakura Sanctuary. In this country a team from Oxford University is studying badger behaviour on the Trust's behalf as part of efforts to further protect the animal. Those donating to PTES are able to choose which project they wish their money to go to. (Hamble House, Meadow, Godalming, Surrey, GU7 3JX 048 68 24848)

PUPPY FARM PRESSURE

Puppy Watch Wales is campaigning for tighter controls, higher standards and regular inspections of licensed puppy farms and for illegal unlicensed breeders to be closed down or become licensed. PWW wants a curb on commercial breeding and has asked people to write to their MPs asking for immediate power of entry into puppy farms to be given to the RSPCA or local authorities. (PO Box 23, Neath, SA11 1QP)

HEDGEHOG HAZARDS

A recent survey by the Royal Society for Nature Conservation revealed the various hazards faced by hedgehogs and a new RSNCR report says that current legislation is not properly protecting wildlife and the environment and calls for Britain to become a signatory to a new European directive to give better protection. The society has set up the British Wildlife Appeal to help butterflies and other endangered British wildlife and in December a gala performance of Madame Butterfly was held at the London Coliseum to raise funds. The RSNCR aims to improve the health of the natural environment by buying land which hosts endangered species or declining habitats and by monitoring and protecting other sites. (The Green, Nettleham, Lincoln, LN2 2NR 0522 752326)

BARRAGE OF PROTEST

The Royal Society for the Protection of Birds has put forward an alternative to the proposed barrage across Cardiff Bay, claiming that existing plans would lead to the deaths of at least 8,000 wading birds. The alternative, which leaves most of the mudflats unharmed, was due to be considered by Parliament early this year. The society has also produced a video to put the case for conservation of estuaries to MPs and other decision makers and has launched a national appeal for at least £500,000 to help save Britain's estuaries from development. Its plan is to buy important estuaries and contest Parliamentary bills and proposals to develop or "destroy homes for birds" and 3 films made by the RSPB are touring the country to provide funds. Other fundraising targets are £15 million in the next 5 years to carry out urgent work to protect wild birds and the environment and a £1 million Emergency Fighting Fund for Reserves to enable the society to act immediately to purchase land where birds are threatened. The RSPB has called for a Common Market ban on exotic birds taken from the wild because of difficulties in controlling the trade and wants an EEC system where imports are only allowed in special cases, such as captive breeding programmes, to prevent species dying out. A call has also been made for an end to eel fishing to prevent young seabirds from starving where eels have been overfished. The society is lobbying for prison terms for those convicted of stealing rare birds' eggs and objected strongly to a major forestry scheme on open moor in Grampian because of the threat to nesting habitats of protected birds. An RSPB report on Scotland's rare birds showed that Ospreys, Golden Eagles and White-tailed Eagles had a very good year, successfully raising many offspring as did Montague harriers, stone curlews and red kites, and the society said that many of these successes were due to hard work by volunteers and the co-operation of farmers and landowners. 800,000 people were reported to have visited RSPB reserves in 1988, an increase of 10% and in the 1988-89 financial year £106 million was spent on buying land for nature reserves and £202 million on managing them. The society's Mawddach Valley reserve in Snowdonia has been extended as well as reserves at Ynys-hir in Dyfed and Castlecoldwell in Northern Ireland and its Action for Birds campaign raised over £700,000 to enable land to be bought when the need arises. A major new programme of heathland restoration and management has now been started, there are currently 46 RSPB research projects and in 1988/89 the society's conservation and Parliamentary staff undertook over 200 cases. A gala concert by the London Philharmonic was held to enable the purchase of the Berney Marshes reserve in Norfolk and over £300,000 was donated in 1989 for the RSPB's international work.

Last year, the RSPB Centenary, saw membership of the society rise to $\frac{1}{2}$ a million with hundreds joining every day, 184 local groups and a Young Ornithologists Club which is growing ever stronger. The Pride of Britain Hotel group is promoting RSPB membership in its brochures and mailings and the society's visacard has now raised over £200,000 for conservation work in Africa. An RSPB Gardening with Wildlife weekend took place in October and an Action for Birds weekend at the beginning of December and RSPB film show evenings, where fund-raising goods were sold, took place at over 100 locations during the autumn. The society published its 3rd conservation review in 1989 and several of its videos were awarded prizes at film festivals. (The Lodge, Sandy, Beds, SG19 2DL)

NEW SEAL HOSPITAL

The Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, which is 150 years old this year, wants to build a £500,000 wildlife hospital to care for orphan seals and sick animals at Bawsey, near Kings Lynn, to replace the Docking sanctuary which dealt with thousands of common seals dying from a virus in the North Sea in 1988. The society's Mid-Sussex and Brighton Branch is trying to raise £350,000 for work on its animal refuge which took in 1436 animals (dogs, cats, oiled sea birds, other wildlife) last year.

From February 1990 the RSPCA is neutering every cat and dog it sends to a new home in a £1 million campaign to curb the number of unwanted animals and a report on circuses commissioned by the society, which reveals abnormal behaviour in animals indicating stress, is to be published soon. The society is also campaigning for proper controls in the transport of animals and aims to set up artificial resting places for animals in transit at strategic points throughout Europe. An RSPCA food-labelling initiative is to be launched to mark food produced to basic minimum welfare standards. (Causeway, Horsham, W. Sussex, RH12 1HG 0403 64181)

CATALOGUE CAMPAIGN

After protests by RSPCA Members' Watchdog leather goods are to be banned from the society's sales catalogues. Watchdog also protested against RSPCA "Animal Tracks" holidays in which young members were taken to visit a calf unit and hunt kennels, and received a talk from a gamekeeper. The pressure group, which is now 3 years old, also urged the RSPCA to adopt a proper spaying and neutering scheme. (44 Kingsley Rd, Horley, Surrey, RH6 8RH 0293 786166)

TORTOISE TELEPHONE

A telephone help-line is being operated by the Tortoise Trust to offer advice and technical assistance with any matter relating to tortoises. The Trust also runs a sanctuary and hospital for tortoises and has started a new lecture service with illustrated talks to various groups and organizations. The Tortoise Trust is opposed to the sale of tortoises in pet shops and wants legislation requiring all animal retail sales outlets to issue accurate descriptions of species sold and reliable basic care info. The Tortoise Survival Project has been launched by the Trust to study and preserve endangered tortoises in their native habitats. (BM Tortoise, London, WC1N 3XX Helpline: 0249 720114)

CONSISTENT RESPECT

The Vegetarian and Vegan Pro-Life Network is a new organization set up to "promote consistent respect for life within pro-life and AR/vegetarian/vegan groups all over the country". The group aims to show the links between the two issues and supports "all positive initiatives for the protection of the rights of animals, unborn children and their mothers". It is running a competition to find a better name for the network and a suitable logo, and aims to start up local groups. The network, which has been flooded with letters expressing support from a wide range of people, wants anti-vivisection and anti-abortion groups to campaign together against animal experiments and experiments on human embryos. Membership is £2 worth of stamps, which helps towards postage and photocopying of the network's bulletin for one year. (Lesley Roberts, c/o 38 Pallant House, Tabard St, Southwark, London, SE1 4YD)

VEGEXPANSION

The Annual Report of the Vegetarian Society shows yet another year of expansion, despite the sale of the society's London property at Marloes Rd. Since their launch in 1987, 100,000 sets of Vegetarian Society publicity leaflets have been distributed and the society now has more than 15,000 members. Around 130 companies currently sport the Vegetarian Society symbol and over 100 shops and businesses offer discount to members. The society is bringing out a new general purpose introductory leaflet and has compiled a Start Up Information Pack for new vegetarian groups. Free posters have been produced for distribution to libraries, wholefood shops, bookshops etc. advertising its Cookery School and there are also new Cookery School brochures. Response to the new-style Vegetarian magazine has been "enthusiastic" and the society once again held a protest at the Smithfield Show, where 200 members laid wreaths at the opening, as well as a vegetarian fair in Manchester.

The society's Youth Dept. now gives an average of at least one school talk per day with often $\frac{1}{2}$ of pupils saying they'll never eat meat again. To assist with this a new 20 minute video "Food Without Fear" has been produced, which is aimed at 14-18 year olds and deals with all the vital issues surrounding vegetarianism. There is also a new youth mag "Greenscene", which can be contacted for advice on how to set up a vegetarian fair.

POPULAR SHOPPER

The new, thoroughly revised and expanded second edition of the "Cruelty-Free Shopper" produced by Bloomsbury Publishing Ltd. in association with the Vegan Society has already sold over 15,000 copies. The first edition sold out its 10,000 copies in only 20 months. The society now has a new council with more members and a more democratic process and is trying to raise £16,000 to acquire its own premises by means of issuing debentures.

The society has launched the Vegan Society Trade Mark and is prepared to authorize its use on products fulfilling its "no animal ingredients, no animal testing" criteria. Consumers will be able to buy products bearing the trade mark in the knowledge that no animal suffered during any stage of the products development and manufacture.

The Vegan Society featured in a TV programme about alternative Xmas dinners and held a sponsored walk in November in aid of its Cruelty-Free Data Base Appeal.

The World Society for the Protection of Animals is appealing for donations to help open an office in India as the hub of a future network of operations throughout the nation. This follows an extensive field investigation into all aspects of the welfare of livestock in India. Meanwhile, in Africa, the WSPA Humane Education Office has had considerable success with its large-scale efforts for animal welfare. This includes a programme aimed at children to promote humane education and respect for animals and the environment and 100 "kindness clubs" have been set up for African children to join. WSPA has joined forces with 3 UK animal welfare societies to form Elefriends, which is campaigning to save the African elephant and the society has projects in Africa to protect the mountain gorilla, giant tortoise, forest elephant, rhino etc., with much of its work on that continent now being sponsored by Sheraton Hotels.

The society has persuaded Costa Rica to introduce a humane education programme into its primary schools and is campaigning against bullfighting there where it also runs the only animal shelter in Central America. WSPA Officers in Costa Rica and Colombia have been involved in numerous raids on illegal animal traffickers and have taken care of animals seized by customs authorities as well as organizing teaching programmes and workshops in rural areas to promote respect for wildlife.

WSPA played a significant part in the formulation of new Columbian animal protection laws and its field office in Bogota provided some of the funds needed to give successful veterinary treatment to a rare Andean Condor suffering from a gunshot wound in the leg. It now has plans to build a wildlife shelter there. The society is campaigning to stop cruelty to livestock at festivals in Brazil and is planning to orchestrate an educational programme to this end in conjunction with Brazilian animal protection societies. In Uruguay WSPA has released 875 coypu confiscated from a bankrupt Dutch fur farm and the animals now inhabit preserves where trapping and hunting are forbidden.

It is now endeavouring to find a suitable home for over 150 llamas and alpacas stranded on a Caribbean island off Antigua during shipment from Chile to the USA. WSPA has initiated dog control programmes in Latin America with free sterilization facilities and a public education campaign, and at Xmas it mounted a strong publicity and awareness campaign in Central America against the sale of dyed baby chicks as toys.

In North America WSPA gave funds to help clean-up costs following an oil spill off the coast of Washington State and drafted a list of recommendations to Exxon following the Valdez disaster, which it has been regularly monitoring and reporting on. Burton's Biscuits are contributing towards WSPA efforts to protect wildlife in the USA and in the summer the society embarked upon a Global oceans campaign to protect animals from the dangers associated with persistent marine debris, such as plastic and other waste products. WSPA offices organized beach clean-ups and other community programmes and prevented the mass release of thousands of balloons at 2 separate celebratory events in the US and Canada. An information pack on organising a clean-up campaign is available from WSPA Boston. After strong pressure from the society a rodeo in Toronto was cancelled and WSPA offices in the Caribbean region mounted a full-scale disaster relief operation for animals following Hurricane Hugo.

WSPA protests resulted in the improvement of conditions for animals at a zoo in Sumatra and all shipments of sheep from New Zealand to Saudi Arabia were halted in October as a result of pressure from the society and other animal protection organizations. The campaign continues against the live sheep trade from Australia and New Zealand as does that for World Park status to be given to Antarctica, so that wildlife there is protected.

The WSPA anti-fur campaign has already distributed over 100,000 copies of its campaign poster in 11 languages and this is expected to appear in over 80 countries. The society's campaign for an extension of the EC seal pup skin ban to cover older seals continues and it presented evidence to the Commission in September in support of its opposition to the fur trade as a whole. WSPA is also stepping up its campaign to protect whales with a view to 1991 when the IWC moratorium is up for reconsideration and it is sponsoring a study of river dolphins in order to formulate plans for their protection. WSPA anti-bullfighting campaign leaflets, poster, petition and factsheets have been translated into several languages and its campaign pack sent to all newly elected MEPs as part of its general campaign for European legislation banning cruel sports, for which over 110,000 signatures have been collected. The society is continuing its efforts against the trade in frogs legs by trying to reduce consumer demand in the USA and Europe and in conjunction with UFAW has published a report on humane methods of handling and euthanizing amphibians and reptiles.

Other campaigns are against the use of chimps by beach photographers in Spanish holiday resorts and against the export of retired Irish greyhounds to France and Spain and the society has lobbied CITES for stricter controls on the air transport of wildlife. WSPA has set up a special fund for Poland and is providing food and medicine for dogs and cats in animal shelters there, with plans to extend its work to other Eastern European countries. Meanwhile in Britain the society is aiming to set up a network of voluntary area co-ordinators to publicise its activities and increase membership throughout the UK.

PANDA PROJECT

Experts from the World Wide Fund for Nature are helping Chinese officials monitor the panda population and the state of bamboo in panda reserves, where the protection and conservation of the bamboo forest is ensuring the survival of thousands of other rare animals. WWF is still helping to manage the Wolong Nature Reserve, one of the panda's most important strongholds, and is recruiting and training more park rangers and providing them with modern equipment to more effectively combat poachers. Bamboo corridors are to be planted linking up separated forests in order to enable pandas to move freely and more widely in search of food and breeding companions.

WWF World Wide Fund For Nature

WWF is also supporting efforts to protect the black rhino in Zambia and the white rhino in Zaire and is aiming to increase numbers of game wardens and improve training and equipment in order to protect many species of wildlife in Africa.

Other African animals receiving help from the Fund are the oryx, elephant, mountain gorilla, ibex and cheetah.

The Peter Scott Appeal for Conservation has been set up to raise funds for WWF and the Wildfowl and Wetlands Trust, with £100,000 pledged even before the official launch and in October tens of thousands of people pledged support for 250 WWF Walks for Wildlife all over the British Isles to raise money for marine conservation. The Fund has published a new education catalogue of over 60 publications and projects developed in conjunction with educationalists and in January it took part in a 'green exhibition' at the Association for Science Education Annual General Meeting at Lancaster University.

Have plans to convert coach or caravan into mobile anti-Glaxo exhibition, complete with displays, leaflets, posters, videos etc. Plan to tour the town, leafletting particular areas night before exhibition visits. Want to collect signatures from at least $\frac{1}{2}$ the residents of Stevenage. Considering other forms of protest such as civil disobedience. Group of students at Stevenage College put together petition against proposed connection between college and Glaxo (training courses for lab technicians etc.). Also handed out leaflets. Hundreds of students signed petition. College now has its own A/R group with over 40 members. Have had speakers from various A/R societies. SAR also held cosmetics amnesty in September and supported BUAV Day of Action against L'Oreal with leaflets, petition and a bin for L'Oreal products. Quite a few people threw these away. Also spoke to managers of chemist stores asking them to put pressure on head office to remove cruelly-produced products from sale. Some agreed and group is writing to other head offices themselves. Went to picket against Huntingdon Research Centre in November and December.

STOKE-ON-TRENT ANIMAL AID

October held benefit gig and 8 mile sponsored walk to raise funds.

SUNDERLAND ANIMAL RIGHTS

About 2,000 people have petitioned local council's Education Committee protesting against dissection in schools.

SURREY/HANTS ANIMAL RIGHTS COUNCIL

Campaigning for permanent water supply to be installed for animals at Guildford Market and have drawn up petition. 20 members held demo in protest at Princess Anne's visit to a Staines knitwear firm which uses frog's skin as decoration. Good press reports.

SWANSEA ANIMAL RIGHTS

(PO Box 53, Swansea, SA1 1BW)

Have produced own 'Animals Charter' to be presented to Swansea city councillors. In summer picketted British Medical Association conference in Swansea protesting against vivisection. Were surprised at number of doctors who agreed with them. Went on vigil outside Perrycroft Lodge. Have been campaigning against L'Oreal and held cosmetics amnesty with excellent response. November held fur amnesty and burnt furs on November 5th. Showed videos on anti-fur campaign and badger-baiting at FOE "Green Xmas Fayre". Held a display on vegan/vegetarian Xmas in local shopping arcade. Have gained several dozen new members and got several hun-red more signatures for European anti-leghold trap petition. Last fur shop in Swansea, Glyn & Leinhardt's, is to close. Did Xmas leafletting and a street collection for Lynx (collected £110). Holding training sessions to teach members how to give talks on animal rights.

Surrey/Hants AR Council

TAUNTON ANIMAL AID

December held Cruelty-Free exhibition in town. Campaigning against local furshop, regular pickets, letters etc. Trying to get owner to take part in public debate. Campaigning against circuses, resulting in matter going to Taunton Deane Council for discussion.

TYNESIDE ANIMAL RIGHTS

(PO Box 1JY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, NE99 1JY) October held march and demo against animal experiments at Newcastle University.

VEGAN ACTION GROUP

(136 Ingram St, Glasgow, G1 1EJ) Involved in organising for Anti-McDonalds Day. Did mass leafletting, street theatre, stalls. Still producing newsletter. Contributed animals section to "Green Guide" being put out in Glasgow.

WELLINGTON & DISTRICT VEGETARIAN & VEGAN SOC

(Somerset) Raising money for tent fund to enable them to attend major events. Run local events. Produce quarterly newsletter. December held stall to promote vegetarian Xmas and took part in cruelty-free exhibition in Taunton.

WESTERN ANIMAL RIGHTS ALLIANCE

(Box 174, 37 Stokes Croft, Bristol, BS2 3PY) 2 local animal protection campaigners tricked way on to Bristol University's "H" floor where animal experiments carried out. Took pictures of animals. Got publicity in local papers about cruelty at lab.

WEST WALES ANIMAL AID

(PO Box 2, Llandysul, Dyfed, SA44 4EB) Had first ever stand at Royal Welsh Show. Tent often crowded. Intend to return this year.

WINCHESTER ANIMAL RIGHTS GROUP

Fairly new group but very active. Had stall and petition in town on opening day of hunting season and gave out leaflets. Held demo outside Marks & Spencer to try to get them to stop selling battery eggs and intensively farmed turkeys. Put on Cruelty Free Fair with vegetarian food, video, cruelty-free toiletries etc. Leafleted late night Xmas shoppers and had public helping give out leaflets and wanting to join group. Hold stalls in town centre with petitions etc. Much interest from public. Also good response from students. One college started own A/R group, with seminars there on animal rights and cosmetics testing, numerous videos and fortnightly display in library.

Wirral Animal Rights

WIRRAL ANIMAL RIGHTS

September held Festival for Animals with talks, videos, stalls etc. Screen videos and hold stalls regularly. Help find homes for animals.

WORCESTER ANIMAL AID

Produce own leaflets featuring local animal abuse centres. Been holding demos at Perrycroft Lodge (where beagles bred for vivisection) including all night sometimes. Staff at kennels have threatened to walk out because fed up with it all. Bloke who runs place spread dog muck along grass verge to keep protestors away and is now being prosecuted for it. 200 people at one big demo there. Also had info stall in Malvern town centre and door to door leafletting and petitioning against kennels. Public support overwhelming. Held public meeting in September with 140 local residents attending. Recently ran campaign to highlight stealing of cats for their fur. Held Cruelty-Free Xmas Afternoon (Dec 17th) with stalls, cosmetics, tasters, videos etc. Went Xmas carol singing round pubs to raise funds.

WORCESTER ANIMAL RIGHTS YOUTH GROUP

Campaigning against dissection in local schools. Do leafletting with own leaflets. Plans to leaflet cancer research shops and hold demo at cattle market. Also planned - sponsored walk from Toxicol labs at Ledbury at Perrycroft Lodge and anti-battery egg campaign. Have now got small office.

YEOVIL

Animal protectionists opposed to vivisection won the support of local MP Paddy Ashdown. In December presented petition to him expressing disgust and outrage at animal experiments. Ashdown pledged he would fight for greater controls on animal tests.

YORKSHIRE WILDLIFE TRUST

Fighting Parliamentary Bill which will allow stages of Lombard RAC Rally to go through areas of Special Scientific Interest. Humberside County Council wants motor rally held on rural lanes. YWT (7,000 members, owns 56 nature reserves) says high speed cars would do untold damage to the environment. Asking MPs to reject plans to let rally run through 3 areas of the wolds.

Veggies Catering Campaign compiles an 'Animal Rights Contact List', a very useful directory of national, international and local animal rights groups, as well as other useful addresses ('cruelty-free' cosmetic companies, natural medicine societies etc.) Please help Veggies to keep the listing as up-to-date and as comprehensive as possible by keeping them informed about the formation of new groups, changes of addresses of existing groups and also when groups disband so that they can be deleted from the list. Details of additions, amendments and deletions can be sent either to Veggies Ltd., Freepost, Nottingham, NG1 1BR (no stamp required) or to their office address, Veggies Catering Campaign, c/o The Rainbow Centre, 180 Mansfield Rd., Nottingham, NG1 3HU (use a stamp for this one - this will save their funds) or phone them on (0602) 585666. To subscribe to the 'Animal Rights Contact List' send name and address, with £1 + 30p P&P, to either of the above addresses.

DIRECT ACTION

Sea Shepherd 2, the Sea Shepherd Conservation Society ship, has confronted the US and Central American tuna fleets in the Pacific with the aim of forcing a slow-down in net laying to save thousands of dolphins from being killed by drowning in the tuna nets. The ship sailed to the Panama Canal where some of the tuna boats were located. Crew members shackled themselves to the anchor chain of a tuna vessel in Costa Rica, which delayed it leaving the port of Puntarenas and then 2 Mexican tuna boats were sighted. One was chased for 7 hours and the other for 5, severely disrupting fishing operations. The society is backing up its direct action campaign with efforts to stop Heinz Ltd selling yellowfin tuna. The Sea Shepherd Dolphin Rescue Brigade interfered with attempts to capture dolphins for marine parks and aquaria in the Gulf of Mexico and caused several of the animals to be released. The society is also campaigning against the use of dolphins in US Navy training programmes. The next target for the Sea Shepherd 2 is a confrontation with the Japanese, Taiwanese and Korean drift net fleets in the North Pacific where they are devastating marine mammals, fish and sea birds. The society has also located a faster ship, which it wants to purchase to improve disruption of tuna fishing and is raising funds and looking for sponsors for a trust fund in order to do this. Meanwhile, in Alaska, Sea Shepherd members have been involved in cleaning and rehabilitating oil-soaked wildlife after the Exxon Valdez spill. (Box 5, Ashford, Middx, TW15 2PY 0784 254846)

Fur coats worth more than £2,000 were ruined by activists who tricked their way into a high security shop in Hockley, Birmingham. Furs were ripped and smothered with glue. 27 people were arrested, facing charges ranging from breach of the peace to criminal damage.

In Surrey a woman had her £3,000 silver fox fur coat ripped from her in Guildford when she stopped to ask for directions. The attackers ordered her back into her car without it and told her to leave town immediately.

In Vancouver, Canada, so-called "performance artist" Rick Gibson planned to crush a live rat with a 50 pound weight outside the library on Jan 6th "in the name of art". 4 members of Liferforce confiscated the crushing device while Gibson was loading it into a van to take to the performance. A crowd of about 400 gathered at the library, where Gibson explained that he'd been ambushed by animal activists and had equipment taken and that he'd returned Sniffy, the rat, to the pet store. About 100 people chased Gibson down the street. He dashed into a major Vancouver hotel and hid in the office until police smuggled him out. Liferforce bought Sniffy from the pet store and he's now in a good home. On TV the following night Gibson said he is "definitely not going to try the stunt again".

At the end of '89 in Beinheim, Alsace, France, 5 members of Animal Liberation Unlimited liberated 200 mink from a fur farm into the freedom of an adjacent wood.

Italy - on 27th Oct '89 members of Animal Rescue claimed responsibility for setting fire to a drug co. in Milan. In Sept '89 in Begamo, members of TUN (Animal and Nature Protection Society) and editors of the German newspaper Recht Fur Tiere (Rights For Animals) freed about 2,000 decoy birds from a football-field-sized bird-catching enclosure. Since 1982 they have travelled every year to Italy and have freed a total of over 10,000 decoy birds, thereby also saving about a million migratory birds (the decoys are used by hunters to attract the others). They've continued the actions despite being shot at by hunters.

West Germany - the ASTRA animal lab received bomb threats on 19th Sept '89. On 25th Nov '89 ninety-eight dogs were rescued from Hoechst animal lab breeders in Hanau. The Happy Woodchoppers have sawn down 8 hunting platforms in Ennepetal near Hagen. Autonomous Animal Protectors smashed windows of furshops and stores selling furs, sprayed them with slogans and glued locks. Many furshops have now closed down and one main group of dept. stores has stopped selling furs. During a demo in Koblenz at an animal dealer's premises, a cat was rescued. In Oct '89 a slaughterhouse in Damstadt was painted with "Murderers" and "Demolition".

HUNT SABOTEURS

by Jamie Hepburn

WALES

Sabs in Wales probably have the worst sab group:hunt ratio of anywhere in the UK. Some hunts have never seen sabs. Welsh groups are busy rectifying this! Active groups exist in Bangor, Aberystwyth, Wrexham and the Vale and Valleys area (Cardiff, Swansea etc.). Readers may recall last year's ludicrous "sabs poison hounds" stories emanating from the Pentyrch FH. Arkangel can exclusively reveal that one of the hunt's joint masters is dying from stomach cancer. Some local sabs believe that a story will soon emerge that they have force-fed him furniture polish. Watch this space.....

WEST COUNTRY

The West Country has a similar density of hunts per square mile to Wales; luckily it's got more sabs to go with them. Sabs from Devon have been out against an array of local hunts, with the unfortunate South Devon FH being (still) the most popular. They also tried to sab the North Dartmoor Beagles, but the hunt decided that drinking was better than hunting (we agree) and stayed in the pub. A joint hit on the Cattistock FH with Somerset sabs went well, except for repeated van problems. The first time the van broke down, sabs called the AA, but then managed to fix it themselves. Within half an hour it had broken down again, but luckily the AA arrived - from the first call!

SOUTH WEST

1990 has seen varied levels of activity in the SW. The attentions of Somerset sabs have persuaded the Blackmore and Sparkford Vale FH to stop advertising their meets, and sabs have found time to visit other hunts in the area too. Unfortunately one such visit (to the Crowcombe Beagles) resulted in 3 sabs being hospitalised. Cotswold, Bath and Bristol sabs have also been busy and rounded off the season with a Beagling Festival in Marlborough College country. The visiting hunts were thoroughly sabotaged (to the point where the Huckworthy Bassets didn't bother turning up to their Saturday meet) but the best moment of the week, apparently, was the expression on the face of the Marlborough College huntsman when sabs showed up at his meet on Wednesday. Who says sabbing isn't its own reward?

SOUTH

Sabs in the south have had a very successful season, with a high intensity of sabbing, and a lot of good publicity too. The number of sab groups (and sabs) is on the increase, while the number of hunts is slowly diminishing. Not that sabbing has anything to do with this, heavens no, of course not. For instance, the Surrey Union FH may face closure because of "urbanisation and the pressures of shooting". But if they do close "other hunts in the south east will come under increasing pressure". From urbanization??!! It couldn't possibly be the 50 or more sabs of North Downs HSA, could it? Another hunt on its last legs is Clinkard's Hounds (although Roy Clinkard himself has a new hip joint). This hunt has seen sabs virtually every time it's been out and rarely has more than 10 followers. The prestigious Chiddingfold, Leconfield and Cowdray FH has had a miserable second half of the season.

Sabs from Bognor and Chichester, aided and abetted by Brighton, Brixton and Petersfield sabs, have been in regular attendance. On one notable occasion a mere 6 sabs stood up to about 20 followers and prevented them from digging out a fox. A couple of weeks later sabs scored an even greater victory when the police - despite having about 20 officers and a helicopter - told the hunt that they could offer no further protection and ordered them to pack up at 1.30pm. For a hunt who often stay out till 5pm this must have been extremely humiliating. Elsewhere in the south, sabs have also covered the Hursley Hambledon FH and the various New Forest and Isle of Wight hunts.

SOUTH EAST

Not content with saving foxes and hares, sabs in the south east have also saved a horse. The unfortunate animal ended up in a drainage ditch at a meet of the East Sussex and Romney Marsh FH. Sabs jumped in immediately, but hunt supporters hesitated, perhaps savouring the sight of sabs having their first bath in years. Eventually, however, they helped sabs lift the horse out. Sabs have visited the South-down and Eridge FH and the West Kent FH regularly and have also attended joint hits on other hunts in the area. New Year's Day saw about 40 sabs run rings around the Surrey and North Sussex Beagles. "We're starting the decade as we mean to go on", one sab explained to the huntsman. The huntsman, incidentally, is of South African extraction so sabs rounded the day off with a chorus of "I've never met a nice South African"

EAST ANGLIA

Despite the modesty of the Eastern region's rep ("activity a bit down on last season") East Anglia is a veritable hotbed of hunt sabotage. Several hunts see sabs virtually every time they go out and every hunt in the region can expect a visit at some point. The West Norfolk FH have even resorted to employing a private detective to investigate sabs - been watching too much TV, obviously. Elsewhere, the Cambridgeshire FH have been forced further underground. They play all sorts of silly games to avoid sabs, using several different hound vans and blocking roads. Perhaps if their road manners were slightly better, they wouldn't have been involved in a multiple crash in which one supporter died and 9 others were injured. Both the Puckeridge and Thurlow FH and the Enfield Chase FH have seen Stevenage sabs on a regular basis, and the latter hunt has now split in two. As if sabs and internal feuding weren't enough, they still haven't learnt how to spell "chase" properly (someone tell 'em....).

OXFORDSHIRE

Oxfordshire Vale HSA has had a typically hectic season, attending well over 100 hunts. The Old Berkshire FH has seen them most, but they've had successful days at the Radley College Beagles and others. The Radley College, in fact, have tried the same tactic used by the North Dartmoor Beagles when sabs show up: stay in the pub. Do they really think it'll get rid of us??!

WEST MIDLANDS

West Midlands sabs haven't had their best season this year, due to transport problems and ludicrous policing. Their cubbing season was successful, though, with hits on the Ledbury FH and the North Ledbury FH. After that things took a downward turn, with the van catching the 'flu and the police multiplying. On Boxing Day 2 undercover sabs attended a hunt in Stratford-upon-Avon. This meet usually attracts a lot of sabs and a lot of supporters, and has often ended with sabs on the receiving end of punches, kicks and biased policing. This year 2 sabs successfully foiled the hunt and avoided trouble completely. In Shropshire over the festive season the local sabs were out against the North Shropshire FH 6 times in 16 days, with another two hunts also covered in the same period! This intensive action resulted in widespread coverage in local media, and forced the hunt to stop advertising their meets - and also prevented any of the hunts from killing. A fine Christmas present for local wildlife!

Above: Hunt sabs bring mink hunt to a halt in Dorset. 5 sabs arrested, 4 charged with threatening behaviour and one with assault. All held for more than 40 hours in police cells. On 30th Jan all 5 cases were dismissed after a 2 day court case.

EAST MIDLANDS

In the East Midlands the Cottesmore FH have been under steady pressure all season. The violence of last season has been replaced by heavy policing, but sabs are still managing to interfere at crucial moments. The police now bring out a video crew on a regular basis and there's often as many police as sabs. Further east a new group has been set up in Lincoln. They have had a very successful season, with only two arrests. Amazingly, they managed to cover every hunt in Lincolnshire on Boxing Day!

YORKSHIRE AND HUMBERSIDE

Sabs in this area have been out against a variety of hunts, with the Holderness FH probably being the most popular. One sab was hospitalised after an incident there and 3 riders have been charged. The other favourite was the Middleton FH. Sabs attended 10 of their cubbing meets, causing total chaos. The terrier and spade brigade started a bit of aggro occasionally but gradually things quietened down. The formal season hasn't been quite so intensive, but the Middleton can rest assured that they haven't been forgotten.

NORTH EAST

The main event of the season up here is the Northumberland Beagling Festival. This is an opportunity for bloodsports enthusiasts to go on holiday and still watch animals die, and until recently it was very popular. Unfortunately, part of the package now includes a rather large number of hunt saboteurs: not surprisingly, most beaglers have now realised that travelling several hundred miles just to be sabbed is a bit stupid (one day they'll realise that hunting is stupid too). Sabs in the north east have spent the rest of the season chasing the host pack of the festival, the Newcastle and District Beagles. The hunt's support has dropped rapidly, and they have now gone almost completely underground. Also underground (six foot, to be precise) is the huntsman, as was, of the Cleveland FH. He was killed by a train after hounds strayed onto a railway line. Several other hunts in the NE have lost hounds in this way (or on roads) which shows all too well that their contempt for animals' lives extends beyonds the ones they chase.

NORTH WEST

M

Sabs in the North West have been concentrating on the beleaguered Holcombe Harriers. This hunt have now reduced the number of days they hunt from three a week to two. Like the Surrey Union's troubles, we're sure this has nothing to do with years of intensive sabbing. Slightly further north, sabs in the Lake District have been active against fell packs. Readers of Arkangel may not be familiar with this phenomenon: a fell pack is a foxhunt which operates on foot, high in the Cumbrian mountains. They tend to be violent, and very good at catching foxes. They also continue official hunting at least a week after most other British packs have finished. This year sabs from all over the UK took advantage of this extended season to travel to Cumbria for a week of massive hits on fell packs. Of the 7 planned hits (6 days of sabbing, with 2 hunts planned for one of the days) 5 went off successfully, another was cancelled due to the weather and, best of all, one was cancelled due to sabs! An excellent week, which left sabs exhausted (but fit) and ready to run minxhunts ragged.

SCOTLAND

Not so long ago there were only two sab groups in Scotland; Clydeside and Edinburgh. Now there are half a dozen, thanks to new groups in Fife, Stirling, Ayrshire and the Borders. The Linlithgow and Stirlingshire FH in particular has been worn down by years of sabbing, with their country shrinking and their subscribers dwindling. Boxing Day saw only 27 riders, a poor showing for a once prestigious hunt.

THE REST OF THE WORLD

Readers may have seen BBC news coverage of American sabs. Herds of buffalo had strayed out of the protected areas in National Parks (due to lack of food) and bloodfiends from all over the US descended to shoot them. The coverage included one scene with a dying buffalo and the hunter who'd shot him. Although this was very upsetting it also showed the real nature of killing, with other buffalos nuzzling up to the dying animal and the hunter boasting about his prowess with a gun. American sabs have also been active against the Tule Elk Hunt, but we don't have any further details. Britain seems to be leading the world in hunt sabotage - makes you proud doesn't it?

SPECIAL POLICE FEATURE

(Early Learning Section)

The cat sat on the mat. The hounds sat on the cat. The sabs sat in the field. The hunt sat on the sabs. The coppers sat in the police van. Soon the sabs sat in the van too. That's all for now - next time we'll try some longer words.

The HSA exists to take non-violent direct action against all bloodsports ranging from illegal ones such as dog-fighting to supposedly prestigious ones like foxhunting and staghunting. The HSA's strength lies in its network of local groups - over 1,000 saboteurs are active every Saturday, and often mid-week as well. Both local groups and the national HSA are always in need of support, financial, moral, active or whatever. NB. Note new address of the HSA :- PO Box 1, Carlton, Nottingham, NG4 2JY.

196 quail and 32 cocks and hens rescued from factory farm in Lancashire

NATIONWIDE

L'Oreal staff carried out intensive checks on their products following ALF claims that they'd been contaminated on 20th Feb.

CAMBRIDGESHIRE

13th Dec '89 - fire started by incendiary devices destroyed one of the 12 empty sheds at Gallyhill chicken farm, owned by Buxted Chickens, at Hemingford Grey, near St. Ives, causing £50,000 damage. At full capacity the farm holds 12,000 chickens.

CHESHIRE

Chemist shops in Eccleston belonging to Ray Longster had all 5 large windows etched. In Sale a gun shop's windows were etched.

ESSEX

Incendiary devices were planted in 3 empty sheds at Hazelmere chicken farm, owned by Harvest Poultry, in Rayne. Damage to one shed was estimated at £8,000-£10,000. The Managing Director said they would be unable to use it for months.

HAMPSHIRE

£2,300 worth of damage was caused by breaking windows and putting glue in door locks of butchers shops in Titchfield and Portsmouth areas.

HERTFORDSHIRE

in Enfield staff had to climb in through windows of the Imperial Cancer Research Fund shop grand celebrity opening because locks had been glued. In Jan, in Enfield, 3 butchers and one fishmonger had windows daubed with etching fluid. A Cheshunt hairdressing salon had etching fluid daubed on 4 large windows and 2 glass doors because it stocks L'Oreal products - there were similar attacks on butchers shops in Hoddesdon.

KENT

In Nov '89 more than 20 rats, mice, hamsters and a rabbit were rescued from Tonbridge Girls Grammar School and slogans were daubed. The school pledged, shortly afterwards, not to use animals for dissection again. In Whitstable a "Cancer Research Collection Mine" was paintstrippered for the 3rd time in '89. In Dec a Whitstable butchers shop window was smashed and another etched and in Herne Bay 12 windows of a furriers were etched. Acid was thrown into a butchers and a furriers shop in Herne Bay. On Dec 20th in Thanet 2 butchers shop windows were decorated with etchings. In Hastings damage was caused to 9 butchers (locks glued, windows etched, including 16 panes of glass at one shop), 2 anglers shops and 2 Boots. A butchers near Sevenoaks was bricked. In Hastings a fence was destroyed belonging to a farmer letting out his land to a circus with animals, and a BASC members van was paintstrippered. There were 4 bomb scares in McDonalds in Tonbridge and Tunbridge Wells. A turkey unit near Sevenoaks was decorated with ALF slogans. 3 rats used for dissection were rescued from a Ravensbourne school. 3 BFSS members vehicles in Tonbridge and Hildenborough were paintstrippered and 2 French's Dairy milk floats were paintstrippered. Slogans were daubed and damage caused at Sevenoaks Cattle Market - chicken pens were destroyed - on the eve of the BFSS Terrier Show and there was a bomb scare during the show. Two more milk floats, in Sevenoaks, were paintstrippered, spray painted, tyres were slashed and windows were etched. A dog was rescued from appalling conditions in Borough Green. Bottles of Vosene shampoo were contaminated in Boots in Ashford and Canterbury and stocks were removed from shelves by staff.

LANCASHIRE

On Xmas Eve in Bolton a large window of McDonalds was smashed. 2 new lorries belonging to Openshaw's Fish Wholesalers were dealt with (tyres slashed, windows broken etc.). On 29th Dec in Rochdale 4 lorries belonging to Weddel Meat Co. received similar treatment and on the same night Holcombe Hunt member John Pilkington had his horsebox paintstripped, etched and tyres slashed in Bury. In Feb in Bury the windscreen of a Holcombe Hunt members horsebox was catapulted and in Bolton 3 butchers windows were also catapulted. The horsebox of a 'hard' Holcombe Hunt rider had wipers, tyres, mirrors, windows and paintwork wrecked in Farnworth. In Bolton the new transit delivery van of Farwood mink farm was etched, stripped and internally painted. In Oldham 5 slaughterhouse freezer vans had windows broken, sugar put in petrol tanks and were paintstripped - the ALF's 2nd visit. 3 slaughterhouse freezer vans in Rochdale were etched, paintstripped and sugar was put in petrol tanks. Thousands of pounds worth of damage was caused at a meat transporters yard in Bolton and in Bury 10 butchers windows had to be replaced after being catapulted. 2 were broken again as soon as they'd been repaired. McDonalds window was bricked again in Bolton. On 23rd Feb 10 freezer vans of Bolton Cold Stores (meat packers) were glued, etched, paintstripped and all 40 tyres were stabbed. On 26th Feb 196 quail and 32 hens and cocks were rescued from the disgusting conditions of John Hamer's factory farm in Bradshaw. Every single bird was rescued and maximum damage caused - all fittings and cages wrecked - so as to make the place unworkable again.

LONDON

2 incendiary devices were placed in the mens wear dept. of Selfridges in Oxford Street (because of the fur dept. there) and in the offices of their parent co. Sears plc, on Dec 29th and again on New Years Day. In the Edgware area last autumn a cruelly treated puppy was taken by 2 activists posing as council officials. On New Years Eve a brick, wrapped in a cloth bearing the message "ALF - Meat is Murder", was thrown through the window of McDonalds in Hackney causing £500 damage. On 18th Jan "Cat Killer" was daubed on the porch wall of the Chiswick home of Jason Williams who battered a young cat to death with a stick.

KILLER

MANCHESTER

A World of Leather warehouse had all 8 large display windows etched. The Medical School animal lab. had windows and doors etched. "Stop This Slaughter" was sprayed at Tyldesley Wakes ox-roasting show in Oct. In Dec a couple of horseboxes belonging to Holcombe Hunt were sprayed with paint. In Feb in Stockport a fish vans tyres were stabbed.

MIDLANDS

In Coventry various butchers and a Boots had windows smashed and in Nov butchers windows and walls in Birmingham were daubed with "Murderers" and "ALF" and had glue put in locks. In Dec the entire stock of 17 foxes were rescued from Cocksparrow fur farm. In Jan damage was caused to a showjumping horsebox in Solihull.

NORFOLK

A gun shop in Great Yarmouth was bricked and a BFSS member's landrover was paintstripped. Paint was thrown over Great Yarmouth circus.

NORTHAMPTONSHIRE

On 23rd Nov '89 a hundred hens were rescued from the battery farm at Our Lady of the Passion Monastery in Daventry. Hundreds of eggs and equipment and cages were smashed. Sister Catherine said "This is going to cost us a pretty penny".

Birmingham Post

Animal rights activists release chickens from the convent henhouse at the centre of a recent salmonella controversy.

NORTH YORKSHIRE

Harrogate is now a furshop-free zone following an intensive ALF campaign against 'Whiteheads of Montpelier' who have now closed their fur dept. Over recent months extensive damage has been caused to the shop, windows were smashed many times, the owner's car was re-painted, smoke damage was caused to the shop, ALF slogans were painted on boarded-up windows, hate campaign posters were exhibited around the town. A partner in the shop said they'd been forced to offer remaining stock at knock-down prices to finance a £6,000 window repair bill - they couldn't get insurance for the glass frontage because of the number of attacks there'd been against the shop - and were at that time consequently considering whether to continue the trade in furs. Their decision was not to continue. In Jan five William Hill betting shops had locks (front and rear) glued and in Feb two plate glass windows of McDonalds were smashed - all in Harrogate.

SUSSEX

In Oct '89 in East Grinstead a 2ft high "Liberate Laboratory Animals" message was sprayed on walls of the Blond McIndoe Centre for Medical Research, part of the Queen Victoria Hospital, where animals are kept for medical research. A window was smashed setting off an alarm. At Churchills furshop in West Sussex 3 locks were superglued on 4 separate occasions, all plate glass windows were smashed and a gallon of paint was thrown over the shop. Locks of Dewhurst's butchers in Littlehampton were glued numerous times before Xmas.

WILTSHIRE

In Feb lumps of stone were thrown through 2 large windows of a butchers shop at Midsomer Morton. Doors, walls and the pavement were painted with slogans. Damage was estimated at £1,000.

OXFORDSHIRE

During the afternoon of New Years Eve 36 beagles were rescued from University Park Farm in Northmoor near Witney - a breeding and holding centre for animals used in experiments by Oxford University. Many of the dogs were pregnant. 5 incendiary devices were planted underneath lorries belonging to Tadmorton Poultry Ltd in Banbury in early Nov '89. In Witney "Meat is Murder" was carved into the wooden shuttering of a butchers shop and signed "ALF".

SHROPSHIRE

Butchers shops in Wellington, Hadley and Telford were damaged and daubed with "Murderers" and "ALF" on windows. Similar slogans were painted on an abattoir in Hadley.

WORCESTERSHIRE

"Meat is Murder" and "Murdering Scum" was painted over Worcester Cattle Market and a week later the market was broken into and the inside wrecked.

IRELAND

ALF threats, including a firebomb threat, forced the Waterford Coursing Club to seek an alternative venue for its Oct '89 meeting. Also in Oct, in Comber Co. Down, an empty battery chicken unit was set fire to. On 20th Dec shelves of Boots and Woolworths were cleared of thousands of bottles of L'Oreal products throughout N. Ireland (Belfast, Lisburn, Bangor, Coleraine, Enniskillen) after their products had been spiked with paintstripper.

SCOTLAND

times in Sept '89 a butchers business in Paisley was hit - front shutters ripped, main window smashed and inside of shop wrecked.

WALES

A member of a Wrexham hunt had locks of the horsebox, car and house filled with superglue. Hens were freed from a broiler unit in Wrexham. In Feb tyres of a poultry van were stabbed and a new Sherpa poultry van had its windscreen etched, paintwork stripped and tyres stabbed, again in Wrexham.

BELGIUM

All 4 tyres of a hunting jeep were burst and "FLA" was scratched on the bodywork while the owners were beating for game.

CANADA

Actions in Edmonton are averaging about 40 per week. Windows have been smashed and paint sprayed and locks glued of butchers, McDonalds, Burger King, Wendy's, Kentucky, furriers, fur warehouses, slaughterhouses, leather shops, a sausage factory and taxidermists. 'Artz Fur and Leather' now has a card in the window saying "These premises under police surveillance". In Oct '89 there was an attempt to burn down Queen City Meats - some damage was caused - which was attacked again later in the month with etching fluid, superglue and spray paint. Hudsons Bay Fur Co. had display windows etched and locks glued. The Alberta Fish and Game Association (paying $100 bounty for wolves killed, they want 2,500 dead) found their front door smashed and "No Wolf Kill" and "ALF" spray painted on walls.

CORSICA

Early in Jan a slaughterhouse in Bastia was blown-up.

ITALY

Hundreds of pounds of damage was caused by daubing windows with etching fluid at Stephen's zoo in Milan, which is involved in the trade in exotic animals. Also in Milan some offices of the Maggioni-Winthrop pharmaceutical firm were set fire to. Leaflets delivered to the media said "To your crimes we respond with fire and rebellion". In Nov '89, in Veneto, 600 mink were liberated from a factory farm.

NETHERLANDS

On 20th Dec '89 raids were carried out overnight to protest against the killing of animals for Xmas feasts - glue was poured in locks and truck tyres were slashed at various animal abuse premises.

POLAND

In Wroclaw more than 40 birds native to Poland were released from the zoo and 6 cages and over 10 padlocks were destroyed. In Grudziadz and Pruszkow activists broke windows and sprayed slogans on walls of furshops, butchers shops and hunting shops. One butcher was closed for a day awaiting new windows. Locks of most butchers shops in Pruszkow have been destroyed. A meat co. had slogans painted on walls and the windows are regularly broken. Car windows have been broken of people connected with the company. Red paint has been squirted on furs at exhibitions. A Polish ALF member in an interview said "A primitive society calls us foolish, hooligans or bandits. But we do not kill animals or devour them, we are not murderers. Those who do are just killers".

SWEDEN

A McDonalds in Gothenburg was damaged on Anti-McDonalds Day. A new ALF group formed in late '89 in Northern Sweden, and their first action, on 27th Oct '89, was to paint about 100 foxes with red henna at a fur farm near Hofers. On 3rd Dec '89 twelve guinea pigs were rescued from the University of Lund Institute of Zoology. On 24th Feb 3 dogs were rescued from Sweden's biggest breeder of dogs for vivisection.

USA

On 4th July 5 cats were rescued from psychology experiments at the Texas Tech University Health Sciences Center in Lubbock. The electronic equipment and stereotaxic restraint devices were destroyed. The stored brains of dozens of other cats were taken for burial. A Texas Tech spokeswoman said the raid caused $70,000 damage. On Jan 14th documents, videotapes, slides and floppy discs were taken from the office of Adrian Morrison, anatomy professor at the University of Pennsylvania School of Veterinary Medicine. "Cat Killer" and "ALF" was written on a wall. Talking about Morrison in an interview, one of the activists said "...there's a lot of discussion about what we're going to do next. He'd probably retire if he knew what different people are talking about".

The ALF carries out direct action against animal abuse, rescuing animals and causing financial loss, usually through the damage and destruction of property, to animal abusers. ALF actions are illegal and therefore activists work anonymously, either individually or in groups, and do not have any centralised organization or address.

SANCTUARIES

by Ronnie Lee

BERKSHIRE WILDLIFE REHABILITATION UNIT

Situated at Padworth. Released 8 pairs of barn owls into countryside as part of national Barn Owl Breeding and Release Scheme to compensate for decline in numbers due to pesticides and loss of natural habitat.

THE DONKEY SANCTUARY

(Sidmouth, Devon, EX10 0NU 0395 378222)
Has bought a farm and 136 acres for some animals in its care with some of the money left in record-breaking bequests worth £2 million. Hopes to move into Woode Farm at Harpford, near Ottery St. Mary early this year. Currently has about 4,000 donkeys in its care, 1,200 of which in foster homes. Also runs International Donkey Protection Trust to care for Donkeys in other countries and campaign against cruelty to them. Recently produced 2nd edition of 'Professional Handbook of the Donkey'. Now has branch in Ireland.

FREEDOM ANIMAL SANCTUARY TRUST

(12b, Dudley Rd, Tunbridge Wells, Kent TN1 1LF 0892 43764)

Involved in animal rescue and rehoming on small scale. Hold fundraising events. Have produced leaflets including one for the public concerning care and neutering of pets.

HYDESTILE WILDLIFE HOSPITAL

(Mitwood Cottage, New Rd, Hydestile, Godalming, Surrey GU8 4DJ)

Have been donated a wildlife ambulance and fundraising literature by the Co-op. Need inflatable dinghy in order to help injured swans, geese, ducks etc. Started appeal for £1,500 to buy one. Give talks to schools and occasionally appear on TV.

LIZ BLOOMFIELD ANIMAL RESCUE CENTRE

(Palms Hall Bungalow, Lovesome Hill, Northallerton, N Yorks)

Rehomes 300 animals a year. Gives permanent homes to ones not adopted. Built 6 new catteries with 12 heated beds. Produces regular newsletter. Started new membership scheme, £2 a year (£1 children under 16) to receive quarterly newsletter and be kept informed of news and events.

MONKEY WORLD SANCTUARY

(Dorset)

Gave home to chimpanzee rescued from Spanish beach photographer. Had been made into drug addict to pose quietly for holiday photos. Now with other rescued monkeys there. Trying to build another 4 acre reserve to accommodate 30 more rescued chimps at total cost of £80,000.

NORFOLK WILDLIFE SANCTUARIES

New group. Hopes to buy pieces of land to establish wildlife sanctuaries. Against all forms of bloodsports including fishing, but will encourage visits by public for walks and picnics.

ORKNEY SEAL RESCUE CENTRE

Treated seals suffering from distemper epidemic. Volunteers run 24 hour service, treating up to 10 sick seals at a time.

Editor's note - The amount of animal sanctuary work is enormous and the amount of available space in Arkangel is minimal. But please do send news about sanctuaries and efforts will be made to include as much as possible.

PHIL CLARKE'S FERAL CATS HOME

(9 Edward St, Kirkby in Ashfield, Notts Mansfield 756592/Nottingham 585666)

Acquired new property to establish better facilities for cat rescue. Helps feral cats - sometimes as many as 50 in care. Also helps low-waged to have cats neutered. Traps and spays feral cats and returns them to colony. Also homes and protects domesticated cats (always neutered or spayed before being homed).

PIGEON RESCUE

(PO Box 216, Leyton, London E15 4NT)

Travel regularly to Trafalgar Square to rescue injured pigeons and help those whose feet are entwined with string. Also take in injured pigeons from elsewhere. Have small sanctuary for nursing birds back to health. Raised £60 at stall at animal welfare fair. Rescued pigeon chicks from flats to save them from being destroyed by local council. Were reared by foster mother and later released.

REDWINGS HORSE SANCTUARY

(Hill Top Farm, Hall Lane, Frettenham, Nr. Norwich, Norfolk, NR12 7LT 0603 737432)

Founded in 1984. Cares for over 700 horses, ponies, donkeys, saved from abuse, neglect and the slaughterhouse. Dedicates much time and resources to educating horse owners on equine care. Asks them to control breeding to prevent many healthy foals going to slaughter. Used proceeds from special fundraising week to build additional hay barn, urgently needed to store winter feed. Appealing for cash to purchase another farm. £50,000 so far raised. Now has larger gift shop and new info centre with wide range of literature on care of horses etc. Open days held on Sundays, Easter till Mid-Dec. Has adoption scheme - people sponsor horse, pony or donkey and receive photo with twice yearly report. Plans to build veterinary unit with operating theatre, X-ray facilities, treatment/isolation boxes. £30,000 already raised towards this.

A PLEA

by Richard Farhall

General Secretary - The Vegan Society

Would those who currently insist on using sweeping, catch-all phrases such as 'the nationals' and the like kindly be more specific in future?

In 'Comment' (Arkangel, Winter 1989), 'PL', Ronnie Lee, Brendan McNally and Barry Maycock all fall into this trap. It may be convenient to lapse into such generalization but the fact is that 'the nationals' could include the 'soft option' RSPCA at one extreme and the 'hard option' Campaign for the Abolition of Angling (CAA) at the other. The former has millions 'in reserve', the latter has barely two pennies to rub together.

Because I have been involved in the movement for some years I know that nine times out of ten 'the nationals' is used in a derogatory sense and is likely to include some or all of 'the ones we love to hate' - the RSPCA, BUAV, NAVS, Animal Aid and LACS. However, what are newcomers or those not into AR politics reading Arkangel No. 1 to make of 'the nationals'? Are they to assume that the RSPCA, CAA, HSA, LACS, Captive Animals Protection Society, BUAV, DAARE, LYNX, Chickens' Lib, NAVS, Animal Concern (Scotland), Vegetarian Society, Campaign Against Leather and Fur, Vegan Society, RSPCA Members' Watchdog, Animal Aid etc. are all full of mega-salaried officials in secure, cosy jobs with nothing to do but wait for the phone to ring so they can slag off the ALF?!

Ronnie asks (of "salaried animal rights officials"): "What does it feel like to be sitting comfortably in an office while others are going to prison for the cause of animal liberation? A bit uneasy on the conscience perhaps". Is this supposed to make "salaried animal rights officials" feel guilty? If so, I am afraid it doesn't work with this one. I am here (the Vegan Society) because I wish to use various skills for the promotion of both veganism and the Society and I believe I am performing a useful role. In the same way that I chose to apply for this job, the imprisoned 'activist' chose (unless s/he was set up) to break the law. I respect those who have the courage to risk incurring the wrath of the state but this does not mean that I consider their contributions to that diverse entity we refer to as 'the movement' to be of greater worth than my own. I support direct action - always have done; however, I can honestly say that in no way do I feel inferior to the individual who chooses to 'specialize' in direct action.

Ronnie further states: "How can the salaried animal rights campaigners justify their positions?" Why should they? How many of us would ask a paper boy/girl, library assistant or postie to justify their jobs? What's the difference? Besides, surely it is the duty of my employer (currently nine elected directors) to justify my position? Having said that, I am happy to put forward a case for the employment of paid staff: Efficiency is only possible if an organization has regular, reliable, skilled, knowledgeable labour. In today's society it is impossible for completely voluntary organizations to possess all these qualities and so they tend to be unstable. The majority of us need an income from some source in order to survive. It is all very well saying that staff should exist on state benefits but it is becoming increasingly difficult to remain 'unemployed'. You cannot run a modern office and all that it entails with a high staff turnover.

In order to retain staff with skills and expertise (usually acquired over many months) a reasonable income must be guaranteed. Moreover, I would argue that those organizations that can afford it are morally obliged to pay a 'living wage'. 'Slave labour' has no place in a movement based on morality - nor, indeed, elsewhere. To deny an animal rights organization paid staff is to deny it effective growth, stability and influence in the face of well-resourced opposition. 'PL' refers to "cushy jobs and large salaries" but neglects to substantiate the statement and qualify "cushy" and "large". I can assure 'PL' that Vegan Society staff (two full-time, two part-time) are most definitely not here for the money, or an easy life. Because I consider it necessary, I average 75 hours per week and normally work seven-day weeks. By no stretch of the imagination am I rolling in dosh. I hasten to add that I seek neither recognition nor sympathy. I merely wish to go somewhat towards challenging 'PL's blanket assertion.

It may well be that there are other "salaried animal rights officials" in similar positions to me - I'm not sure. I have not investigated the matter and I suspect neither has 'PL' nor some of the others who spout self-righteous, anti-national generalizations so freely. By all means question the work of 'the nationals' but do not allow smugness, resentment or bitterness to cause you to make sweeping generalizations. Be rational; be factual; be specific.

WHAT PRICE VIOLENCE?

by James Hepburn

I see no inescapable logic in Ronnie Lee's assertion that "if one is to stake claim to non-violence one must be consistently opposed to violence". Hunt saboteurs do not ordinarily (to the best of my knowledge) consider that unprovoked attack upon the person or property of hunt members is justifiable, but they often consider that violent self-defence in response to attack upon themselves by hunt members is justifiable. I suppose that hunt saboteurs who regard themselves as thoroughly pacifist would favour the violence of legal sanction against a hunt member who committed manslaughter. I think most people concerned with animal rights would say that there is violence and violence (in contrast to "violence is violence is violence"). We make up our minds, and sometimes change them, about what sort and degree of violence is justifiable, and under what circumstances.

For myself, violence is something the world needs less of rather than more of. I would not commit an act of planned violence in the cause of reducing violence. If I committed such an act, I might frighten people who are cruel to animals into abandoning their activities, but I think I would run the risks of merely turning their bloody-mindedness into other channels and of encouraging my own bloody-mindedness. I think the real lessening of violence in the world requires example, persuasion, patience, civil action - keeping the long term in view quite as much as the short term. Seventy per cent of British people are apparently opposed to blood-sports, and I think too little effort has been made to turn that opposition into effective protest and law. In the end we want even the violence of legal sanction to be minimal: we want people to treat animals well because they want to treat animals well.

STAND UP FOR THE ANIMALS

by Scrappy

I would like to ask you all "Do you realise the extent to which living, feeling creatures are being abused in the world today?" I am sure a great deal of you do and, if you do, please could you try to inform the members of the larger groups just how much pain is involved, as they don't seem to understand. We all see TV pictures of people being tortured in foreign countries and we all feel very angry. Most of us are sickened by the situation in South Africa and we are not afraid to say so, so why is it that when we talk of Animal suffering some of us are careful not to offend people who are actively taking part in the abuse? Many times I've spoken to people in the AR movement who have said they support the ALF, yet when they come out on a demo and a member of the public asks them about the ALF they're not sure what to say. Eventually they decide to keep quiet and the questioner thinks that we're all a bunch of misguided loonies. It's a very sad sight indeed.

Please stand up for the ALF. Consider the facts:

- 1) Most of the people that ask you about the ALF will be supporting Animal abuse by eating meat and using products that are tested on Animals. They are not interested in facts, they are just trying to justify the things they do by shifting the argument. They won't even consider our arguments as having the slightest bit of substance. They are right, we are wrong - that is their logic. Pain and suffering is OK as long as it is not them that suffers.
- 2) Don't be afraid to offend. They don't care that they offend us by helping the Death Industries to continue. You aren't helping the Animals by giving in to bullying tactics; stand up for them.
- 3) It is not the idea of bombs that offends people. Try asking them whether or not we should have bombed Germany during the war (they'll probably say "Oh, but that's different"). Don't be fooled, the war was worse, it killed innocent people, the ALF only attack the abusers).
- 4) When you get down to basics the ALF are the real AR people, the rest of us are trying to change the world by talking with people who rarely want to listen. I'm not saying that this is a bad thing, we have to recognise that there are many varied methods we can use to help Animals and Humans become free from the torment of suffering, but considerable social change is rarely brought about without a long hard fight. The government condemns ALF actions but I don't seem to remember the Falklands War being won by friendly persuasion, do you?

5) You don't have to belong to the ALF to help them achieve their aims. The chances are that if you support their actions you are probably living a cruelty-free lifestyle or at least just starting to, and that is a brilliant thing in itself. You could send the ALF Supporters Group donations, every little helps, or you could write letters to ALF prisoners. People in prison need your support - they've just taken part in a selfless act on your behalf. It can't be easy to take your commitment that far, knowing that you could end up inside. Don't forget about them and insult them by condemning them in public. You could write to the papers, start up an AR group, go to a demo, anything to help the Animals that are dying in pain as you read this. But remember that the ALF have played a vital part in the demise of the fur trade in this country, not to mention bringing many things to the public's attention. How do you think we obtained all of the pictures of Animals being tortured in medical labs? Not from the scientists but from people who really care.

So remember, don't be afraid to offend people by giving your support to an organization that tackles Animal abuse by direct action. The people you talk to won't give a damn that they're offending you by supporting the abuse.

(Editor's note - Slight alterations have had to be made to this article for legal reasons. I hope the author has no objection. Unfortunately I was unable to contact him/her about it as no address was given.)

ANIMAL LIBERATION

BUT NOT TOO MUCH?

by Ronnie Lee

You will notice that in the National and Local sections of Arkangel I have included information about environmental organizations (Greenpeace, Friends of the Earth etc.) as well as the more usual animal rights/protection ones. I feel this is very important as, although these environmental groups do not operate from a strictly "animal rights" standpoint, their work has a very important part to play in the achievement of animal liberation.

Too often animal rights campaigners, heavily involved in their constant battle against vivisection, factory farming, the fur trade etc., ignore the extent to which animals are persecuted by the destruction of the environment. Vivisection labs and factory farms may well be the concentration camps of the human reich, but they are, in a sense, only the tip of the iceberg of animal persecution and getting rid of them would only go part of the way to giving the animals back their freedom. More animal suffering and oppression probably arises from environmental destruction than from any other single cause.

It would do well for us to speak of human imperialism. Not content with just having its fair share of the planet, the human species has everywhere invaded and despoiled territories which rightfully belong to other creatures. Perhaps the worst words ever spoken (if, indeed, they were) were "Go forth and multiply". A call for a human occupation of the world similar to that of the nazis for "Lebensraum". Thus the end of vivisection labs, of factory farms, will never be enough because it still leaves behind the injustice and oppression of the original "enemy" occupation. True animal liberation will not come merely through the destruction of the Dachaus and Buchenwalds that the occupiers have built for their victims, but demands nothing less than the driving back of the human species to pre-invasion boundaries.

So, in practical terms, what does this mean? It means the end of environmental pollution and the industrial society which causes it. The end of such things as the private car. The end of methods of agriculture relying on pesticides, artificial fertilizers and other poisons. The end of cities and vast urban conurbations, which are like deserts to most wild animal species. The end of large-scale farming which provides little habitat for them either. And perhaps above all, a drastic cut in the number of the human species. The radical American environmental group Earth First! has estimated that the right level of human population worldwide should be about 50 million. Today more than that number live just in Britain.!

Thus true animal liberation doesn't just require a tinkering with the worst excesses of human oppression but widespread and radical changes in the very way we live. The only form of human society conducive to the just treatment of other creatures is one which is decentralized, with people living in small communities rather than towns or cities, de-industrialized, employing small-scale organic (veganic) methods of farming and with a vast reduction in human numbers (by humane methods of course).

Sadly this may all be too much for many "animal protectionists" who still want their jobs, their cars, their umpteen kids, their many domestic appliances. But half a liberation is no liberation. Animal rights campaigning needs to extend itself to other areas which hitherto it has hardly touched on. To fighting against pollution, industrialization, habitat destruction and for the intensive and extensive control of human overbreeding.

Thus we have to work hand in hand with Green and environmental organizations, not just (as is their motive) to create a better world for "our children and our children's children", but to give freedom, justice and life itself to the other animals and theirs.

FOLLOW THE FORCE

by Geoff Sheppard

Would the critics of the use of violence in the struggle for animal liberation be so vocal in their condemnation if they themselves were suffering the tortures that animals suffer? I expect not.

The fact always remains that the animal liberation movement is made up of human beings. If the animals could fight adequately for themselves it is undoubtedly the case that many vivisectionists and other animal torturers and exploiters would have died by now. There are many good arguments that justify the use of violence in the struggle against the torture and exploitation of animals, but (in the end) do we really need to torment ourselves about what is (tactically or 'morally') 'right' or 'wrong'? Have we no faith in the wisdom and the force of our own lives, our own selves? We should trust our instincts above all else, and if they lead us to sympathise with the use of lethal violence against animal torturers, then so be it. Instinct is far deeper and stronger and more reliable than 'rational' thought.

I don't believe we can trust these human minds of ours to keep us on the right track. Only what's deepest in us can be trusted, and that is simply - silent. It is beyond thought. It is your own deepest self. It is only our so-called 'intellect' that distinguishes us from the other animals on this planet. They live their lives uncorrupted by tortuous mental distortions and rationalizations. They are the equivalents of our own deepest silent selves, and (if we are in touch with that silence) we find, with new shocked awareness, that it really is true - they really are like us. They feel, thrill and grieve and suffer, as we do.

The issue is not violence or non-violence, but simply to be true to what is deepest within ourselves - the genuine uncorrupted force of our own individual lives. To follow the force with complete trust - wherever it may lead.

DOONESBURY/Garry Trudeau

IDEAS

by Michael Maas

We need a spokesperson for the movement. See how the anti-porners have gained by having Whitehouse, and the environmentalists by having Porritt, to speak for them. Those two are quick-witted, eloquent, fully-briefed and ready for all the hostile and tricky and dishonest questions that crop up in interviews and debates. I've asked three of our notables. They didn't think it was possible in such a quarrelsome movement. One I didn't ask was the chap who said of Dingles: "We did them a favour....that place was a danger to the public". I think he could do it. The radio and telly would love it. They'd start off hoping to smear us and end up with respect. In the process we could attack a lot of the lies propagated by the 'media' and the animal exploiters. As it is, I think people actually believe the 'violent thug' description of activists and, thanks to the secrecy of the exploiters, they don't yet know about broiler houses or the separation of cow and calf, or even the fact that most cosmetics are still tested by torture.

Back in the early eighties I used to hope that by '89 we'd be able to block Whitehall with five hundred thousand demonstrators. That would have compelled Parliament to act, as it has compelled tyrants to capitulate in Eastern Europe. We peaked at about 8,000 at Carshalton and then seemed to give up. Was that right? Is homo image-of-God sapiens so selfish that we could never have built up to half a million in an altruistic cause? Do we understand, better than before, the nature of our opponents - MPs, churchmen, exploiters, mediapersons? Have we found some of their weaknesses? Do we understand why the Euro Parliament voted 160 - 10 for baby seals and why our own people banned street-pet-markets after Club Row? Have we learnt from our successes and failures? Have we learnt from other groups - eg. Greenpeace, with its enormous income and its publicity stunts that we don't do? Have we found any remedies for the despair that turns people away from our cause? I think that a group of sensible, experienced people could meet and draw some valuable conclusions. I don't think it has been done.

At a point when some form of exploitation was approaching defeat, like fur-trading now, the exploiters would be preparing their excuses and denials, fearing the future scorn and disgust of their neighbours. That defeat might be hastened if the exploiters knew quite well that their neighbours would be informed about them. It could be made known that a List was in preparation, with all the exploiters' names on and that their neighbours would receive a leaflet mentioning their name and describing their trade. No threat, abuse or insult. Just a bit of truth.

BEYOND NONVIOLENCE

by John F. Robins

Organising Secretary - Animal Concern (Scotland)

Thanks for the copy of Arkangel 1, it was interesting, informative and thought provoking. I hope it keeps going and that before too long Ronnie is able to work on it without his current restrictions.

I would, of course, like to comment on Ronnie's piece 'Beyond Nonviolence'. Only a fool would deny the tremendous advances won for animals by the work of Ronnie and other direct action activists but I do think Ronnie is being naive over the issue of incendiaries, bombs and contamination of 'food' stuffs. All the philosophy and soul searching in the world cannot justify setting in action situations over which there can be no control and which put at risk firefighters, security/cleaning staff, bystanders and animals which live in or on targeted premises.

To live a cruelty-free life style people look for alternatives. Are there lower risk (to life if not to capture) alternative methods for causing economic damage? On that all I can say is that I have never condemned activists who have physically caused damage to research, fur or farming establishments without resorting to uncontrolled tactics such as fire. Actions which released animals or damning information, even when causing considerable physical damage to property, were effective in causing economic damage to exploiters and in opening the eyes of the public to the horrors of the exploitation. Fires and bombs add to the vivisection and furriers own smokescreen of secrecy and turn liberators into terrorists and exploiters into victims. This was recognised by the Economic League who stated that if the violence died down the exploiters better start getting some good PR together because they would have to justify their case.

These are not just my words of condemnation nor the words of the media but the reaction felt from the public on the street. The public often react in support of what they see as the underdog and will feel sympathy for a vivisectioner who finds a device under her car before they would even bother to think of the beagles under her scalpel. In December 1989 a woman had a fur coat torn from her back in the street. It didn't hurt her and I doubt if it even caused her as much stress as two minutes in the cages of the coats real owners would have done. Within days the press was full of comment and letters supporting the woman with little reference to the real victims. We must avoid turning the exploiter into the exploited.

When incidents like the Bristol bomb or Edinburgh fires occur the media contact the contactable for comment. If I said "I understand why people do this" I would be lying. I don't understand why people take uncontrolled action which risks innocent life. I've been inside factory farms, vivisection laboratories, fur farms and slaughter houses. I know where hell is. I also know you cannot close these hellish places down by giving the authorities the excuse to further protect the exploiters and persecute the liberators. If on the other hand I refused to comment then that would be taken as silent support for such actions. I should also like to mention that in some of the live broadcasts I was able to discuss animal exploitation and make it clear my condemnation was directed at those using fire or explosives, not at liberators. However, as expected, recorded and written pieces edited out most of that. I did not slag the ALF as a whole, I have too much respect for what they have achieved to do that. All my condemnation has been directed at the individuals concerned in specific actions.

Ronnie suggests that condemnation, by myself and the many others who have done so, of such actions as bombing or arson is counter-productive. I would suggest that it is those actions themselves which are counter-productive and condemnation limits the damage to our cause as a whole. It is only a very small minority who carry out such actions and it must be made clear that such acts do not have the support of the movement as a whole. The fact that condemnation has come in volume from so very many diverse areas within the movement must surely make those responsible open their minds to the possibility that their tactics may be wrong?

During my time with Mobilization for Animals there were many voices telling us we were wrong in the way we were tackling the proposals for new legislation. I wish we had listened. We were wrong and wasted time, effort and resources. I appeal to those involved in bombing or incendiary actions to at least listen to their critics. If, as Ronnie suggests, those involved are genuine animal rights campaigners then I apologise for calling them scum. I still think they are very, very wrong and misguided and causing more damage to our cause than that of the exploiters.

On the subject of whether or not such people are as much our enemies as exploiters I think they are. By giving the exploiters public sympathy and added security they, albeit not deliberately, are causing the movement harm. Perhaps a better comparison would be with someone in a liberationist cell who downs a few pints and starts talking about actions in the pub.

I would ask you to think about the Fran Trutt case in the USA. The opposition realised how effective it would be for their cause to encourage her into violence and even supplied her with the tools. Had the infiltrators not been uncovered they could easily have turned the mask of liberation in America into the helmet of terrorism.

Finally I would suggest that we must all be prepared to admit our mistakes. We must also be prepared to listen to the voices of our colleagues in the struggle. I've had what I thought were terrific ideas for successful campaign tactics but have had to put them aside when few people agreed with me. When everyone seems to be telling you that you are wrong human nature often brings your ego to the fore, urging you to march on regardless. Perhaps that was why mistakes were made with Mobilization? If we are a movement and try to accept each other as part of that movement despite differences of opinion then surely we can also learn from each others mistakes?

CONTROVERSIAL ACTIONS

by Andrew Fenton

As Ronnie Lee very ably explains, "violence" against property and against "guilty" people is justified. Unless we are to adopt a hypocritical and therefore speciesist stance with regard to violence we must realise that morally there will always be circumstances where violence is justified. Let's look at an imaginary (though not unlikely) situation:- A person who is physically incapable of defending him/herself is being violently attacked in the street. Is there one of us who would not use whatever force was necessary to prevent the attacker from causing his victim further suffering? Somehow I doubt it. How is it then logically possible to condemn the actions of a person who attacks a vivisectioner in a laboratory? The two situations are hardly dissimilar. As animal liberationists we are unable to draw a line between the pain of a human and the pain of an animal. That is what makes us the way we are.

Ronnie Lee also raised the question of endangering lives (human and animal) in incendiary attacks and hunt sabotage and compares this to the possibility of people being injured by speeding police cars or ambulances. Again, this argument (that the risk of harming life is so small as to be worth taking) is faultless in its logic. What we as a movement must consider, however, is not simply whether violence is justified, but whether it is valid as an effective campaigning tactic. We are all involved in the animal rights movement because we want to bring an end to the abuse and exploitation of animals. Therefore we surely have a duty to do what will be most effective in bringing about animal liberation. The fact that a bombing or other violent act is morally justifiable does not mean that we, as a movement, should necessarily indulge in such acts. We have to do what is best for the cause and what will most quickly bring about a situation where animal abuse comes to an end.

I believe that, at the moment, most violent acts are counter-productive. The only thing which will, in the long run, bring about animal liberation is a massive change in the way people view animals. When the majority of people see things our way, then, perhaps, violence could be used as a campaign tactic to hammer the last nail into the coffin. This situation has already occurred with the campaign against the fur trade. The majority of people agree with our views on fur and when a furrier's window gets smashed the media generally use the label "animal rights activists" or, at worst, "extremists". There is no mention of loonies, maniacs or terrorists. Behind this media reaction must be a subliminal approval of the attack, or at least a disapproval of the fur trade. I also believe that the public are not alienated by such attacks simply because the majority of them, like us, want to see the fur trade dead and buried.

If, however, violent attacks are carried out on medical research laboratories, cancer research shops etc., we will be labelled by the media as cranks, loonies, terrorists etc. etc. The way the public and the media react to violent acts depends more or less totally on how they view the victim of the violence. Imagine this situation:- Someone rapes and murders Mother Theresa of Calcutta. On the following day someone does the same to Myra Hindley. Public and media reactions would obviously be vastly different. One murder would be widely condemned, the other would, more than likely, be seen as some kind of poetic justice.

The ALF should be aware that just because violence is morally justifiable, it is not necessarily acceptable to carry out such acts due to their possibly negative effects on the progress of our movement. I believe that some acts of violence are acceptable now. Setting fire to the local hunt's hound van or smashing a furrier's window puts pressure on those animal abusers and these sort of attacks have, without doubt, saved the lives of many animals. What is equally important is that these sort of attacks don't alienate the public. How many people are bothered that the hunt has folded or that the furrier has closed down? Equally the destruction of equipment used for testing cosmetics on animals would probably be widely, though perhaps not vociferously, supported. It must be realised that where the public feels their own lifestyles and/or wellbeing are being threatened, violent acts will almost always be counter-productive. Attacks on factory farms, medical research labs etc. will only lead to alienation. When people share our views on the barbarity and senselessness of vivisection and animal farming, then acts of violence against property (though never against people) will be widely supported and worthwhile. If we are to gain any credibility as a humanitarian movement we must reject personal violence as an offensive tactic now and forever.

As regards the rantings of various parts of the movement in response to certain acts (particularly the Bristol explosion) I have to agree with almost everything Ronnie Lee says. Surely we have all felt the anger and frustration which must have been behind the planting of the Bristol bomb and other more extreme actions. And let's not kid ourselves, it was a bomb and no amount of wordplay can, or indeed should, attempt to disguise the fact. Whether or not we agree with such acts, the only way to deal with much of the outrage surrounding them is to attempt to explain the deep feelings which motivate people to commit these acts.

Frustrating though it is, there are no short cuts along the road to animal liberation. Ours will be a long, long fight, but we owe it to our fellow animals to consider very carefully exactly what we are doing in their name and how we are going to do it. There is no room for acts of self-indulgence, for doing anything just so we feel as if we've done something. Their freedom is more important than our self gratification.

IN BRIEF

A lot of nonsense is talked about "violence". The violence to animals is so terrible that all decent people are outraged. As Brendan McNally says, the Suffragettes thought nothing of firing postboxes, bricking windows of Parliament etc. and even endured force-feeding in prison for their Cause.

All the "respectable" societies have to do is to tell the media that they don't indulge in direct action, but they can well understand why others do. Certainly, there is a place for everybody in the Fight, from letter writers and leafletters to old ladies knitting balaclavas for the Activists.

IMPORTANCE of SABBBING

by Simon Russell

Even the most idealist of animal rights activists would agree that the struggle we are undertaking will be a long time winning. Taking that as a basic fact, we should look to the future and consider what attracts new people into the movement and, more importantly, keeps them there. By this I do not mean just higher memberships and more supporters on paper, I am talking about the people who get out on the streets, in whatever form, and actively work towards animal liberation. It is my intention to show in this article that the best recruiting force we have is the Hunt Saboteur groups scattered around the country and to show why the movement as a whole should support these groups as much as is possible to keep our movement a force to be reckoned with.

We need to bring into the movement new and young people, if only to make up for the people who leave for whatever reason. For an outsider looking in, with perhaps an inclination to support our work, the practice of leafletting, holding stalls etc., no matter how important, seems to be boring and tedious. Most of us would agree that this is so but, as we see that these things have to be done, we continue. Before a new person sees that these things need to be done they have to be drawn into the movement and do some sort of activity which has a direct effect in saving animals' lives and, let's admit it, a bit of excitement. Apart from demos, which have only one of these qualities, the only form of legal animal rights work that we are left with is hunt sabotage. By it's very form it attracts younger people who want to stop, by their actions, the abuse of animals. Many have had no other contact with animal rights people and the sab van turns into a school about animal abuse. Personal experience has shown me that in a very short space of time a person who is a meat-eater, and even working in places like McDonalds, will become a vegetarian and change jobs. Many go on from hunt sabbing into other areas of work against animal abuse and so the movement becomes replenished and hopefully increased in numbers.

Unfortunately, within the animal rights movement there is a strange lack of respect between general animal rights people and hunt saboteurs. Hunt sabbing seems to be looked upon as a marginal activity without a thought for its overall effect on the movement. Many towns and cities have both animal rights groups and sabbing groups which have few joint members and little contact or support for each other. Money is nearly always the main bone of contention because many standard animal rights activities also bring in cash, if only as a by-product of the activity, whereas sabbing only drains resources. For those who don't or have never been sabbing it is hard to see where all the money can go, but if a group hires vans, or even owns its own van, the costs are rarely below about £1,000 a year. The relationship between such groups is not always helped by some sabs who see sabbing as the be-all-and-end-all of animal work and view the local AR group as solely a fund raising group for their actions.

Personal problems apart, the movement as a whole should recognise the important value that hunt sabbing has and do its utmost to support it. We must all see that we are in for a long hard fight and even the most dedicated person, who at the present could not imagine themselves not working for animals, may, due to personal problems drop out, or even 'burn out', due to overwork or the depressing nature of animal abuse. We are all prone to these effects and so must keep new people coming into the movement. As well as replacing the people we lose, we also bring new enthusiasm and ideas of campaigning.

Hunt sabbing will, by it's nature, continue with or without the support of the main stream AR movement but we must all remember that hunting will more than likely be one of the first big institutions of animal abuse to go and, when it does, we will lose one important area of recruitment. By then (and it may not be long) we must be ready to have other plans for attracting new people into our movement. I do not think this will be easy and we must realise that the end of hunting could, if we don't handle it right, mean a reduction in the number of people working for animal rights.

Hunt sabbing brings great benefits to the movement but it will not be with us forever. While it is, let us increase the number of new young people involved so we have at least a build-up to allow for the possible reduction we could experience in the future.

Putting Animals Into Politics

by Tina Pye

Well, first of all I must start by declaring a strong bias - as Press Secretary and possible future Convenor of the Green Party Animal Rights Working Group it is obvious where my sympathies lie! Green Party policies tend to be excluded from many Animal Rights magazines, taken as being unlikely to be put into operation, but readers would be wise to note that we have already taken third place position away from SLD/Liberal Candidates in most elections and we can only extend our support as more and more people become aware of the seriousness of the crisis of this planet.

Mainstream politics make lots of green murmurs but very few turn into concrete action - how many policies have they put into action that genuinely help the environment? Green Party policies are already well in advance of the other parties as far as animal rights are concerned, for example our policy on vivisection is to outlaw cosmetic, household, behavioural, LD50, Me-Too and various other procedures immediately on attaining office and the remainder (it doesn't leave much) within five years. Government funding would of course transfer from animal to alternative experiments. In addition we are the only party to allow only Vegetarian/Vegan catering at our conferences. Despite this the Working Group continually strives to update and improve policy and we are presently proceeding with a total revamp of animal rights policy for our manifesto.

It is most important to understand however that Green Party AR policy is not treated in isolation, it is reflected in our Agricultural, Educational, Health policies etc. Green Party is holistic in its approach - it is no use having one policy contradicting another as is the case often in the other parties. No matter how good you may consider SLD or Labour AR policies (I'm afraid I'll have to rule out the Conservatives as they don't have any although there are some genuinely concerned and hardworking individual Tory MPs) it is important not to see them in isolation. The other political parties are still committed to economic and material growth - the planet cannot support this, we have only limited minerals, land etc. The more we consume, the less there will be for the animals, less land, less food, less freedom. Green Party does not propose to return to pre Industrial Revolution days or to some mythical Golden Age but we do seek a path of need not greed, of moderation in all things and appreciation of non material treasures such as peace, friendship, compassion. We do not own the planet, we share it, and the animals are entitled to their fair share. No matter how good in theory other animal rights policies are they are not worth the paper they are printed on (recycled or otherwise) if policies protecting the Ozone layer, halting the Greenhouse effect, preserving the Rainforests etc. are not put into effect.

I believe Green Party is the only party to seriously address these issues. All the theoretical rights in the world are of no use if you have no world in which to put them into practice. If you really care about animals use your vote at every opportunity to benefit them and the planet, be seen to vote Green! If anyone would like further information on Green Party AR policies present or future or about the working group please drop me a line (SAE appreciated) at 23 Highfield South, Rock Ferry, Wirral L42 4NA.

DILEMMAS?

by Davy Barr

The more I hear of 'smoke bombs' the harder I've got to think. I won't condemn any action for animals, but incendiary devices are potentially lethal and it is an act of violence to do anything which could endanger life - where do we draw the line?

It's only been luck that nobody's been hurt - not only with those but arson as well. If a sprinkler system is faulty and the device activates, there's a good chance of a fire starting. Be it tomorrow or twenty years from now, somebody will be hurt, perhaps even die. Whether the fire is deliberate or otherwise we are, as a whole, directly responsible.

We ask for society to respect the lives and liberties of other animals, we profess to be non-violent, but how much longer will our luck last out? However, on saying that, in a violent world violence is easy to understand. Where would the IRA, PLO or whoever, be today if they worked totally within the law? Can we use violence to deter violence? Is it right? Nobody can dictate to activists what to do and what not to do, but I firmly believe that the ALF's policy on non-violence is somewhat lacking in truth.

Everytime a store is flooded or burned, a representative of a national organization manages to help the media put the wrong picture across. We hear the usual talk, a lot of it true, but the point is usually missed. Animals are suffering and some people are frustrated with the speed of legitimate protest - something is wrong and needs to be changed - at the end of the day we all share a common goal, don't we?

Dingles, Debenhams and any other stores which are 'accidentally' burnt down in the future will end up being yesterdays news and nobody tends to remember it, like the Greenpeace photographer who died on the Rainbow Warrior - what was his name?

Direct action has its place, but so too does legitimate campaigning (whatever that means!) and we all must learn to respect each others levels of commitment and work as one for the animals sake - not for individual egos.

SPEAKING OUT

by Neil from Shrewsbury

It is good to see a forum for the debate about direct action, allowing supporters of this method of campaigning a platform to put forward an intelligent and rational argument to allow others to understand the philosophies behind the ALF and other similar organizations.

The state has done its upmost to brand activists as 'mindless' and 'extremists' by an almost blanket censorship of arguments in favour of direct action. Subtlety has been their key weapon. To the average person on the street it may seem that direct action has been given a voice in the media, with the occasional TV programme, or radio debate, but unfortunately things go further than that. Any person voicing an opinion in favour of illegal methods of campaigning, be it on TV, the radio, or even just a talk at a local animal rights meeting is laying himself, or herself, open to extensive police harassment and possible imprisonment, as has happened in the past for just vocalising personal beliefs. It is no wonder that the general public and, unfortunately, a number of "animal sympathetic" people belonging to certain national organizations have developed these bigoted ideas about activism and activists. The sheer bombardment of propaganda by the state, the media and certain animal rights organizations (whose ultimate aim is not to end animal abuse, but to sustain it so that their positions of power are not undermined) must take its toll.

How gratifying it is, though, to hear the responses of audiences after animal rights discussions of direct action at local levels. The most common reactions (ie. "I didn't realise that" or "Now I understand") lead me to conclude that there is one very important avenue to be followed. There is a great need for sympathisers of direct action to be prepared to speak out in defence of illegal action. Obviously the press will not allow such voices to be heard, but local animal rights groups, universities, colleges etc. are ideal places for countering such immense propaganda. This obviously is not a be all/end all situation, as on its own enlightening and highlighting people's awareness is next to useless. But the prospects that this creates are enormous. In future not as many people would be as quick to jump onto the bandwagon of the self-appointed 'leaders' of the animal rights movement, and more and more people will become aware of the arguments for positive action to alleviate animal abuse.

Why, we must ask, is the hysteria of the state etc. becoming so aggressive? The usage of words such as 'terrorists' and 'bombers' is obviously geared to create as much hostility to the movement as possible. This shows a growing fear that the state, which thrives on the proceeds of animal abuse, is running scared that the ALF is a force that is having increasing successes in attaining its objectives. They have seen that the escalation of actions, from daubing slogans to planting incendiaries, has occurred because the movement is increasing effectiveness and technological expertise, not (as the state would maintain) an organization in its death throes.

I challenge anyone to come up with a logical argument against the use of incendiary devices in department stores. We often hear poorly thought out comments that life is in danger. A very emotive argument as life is sacrosanct to most people (as long as its human life), but really if the unfortunate did happen, would the blame really lie with the people who planted the device? As I understand it, these incendiary devices create a short but intense amount of heat in order to activate a premises' in-built sprinkler system. At Dingles the system didn't work - what would have happened if a legitimate fire had started there during a busy Saturday afternoon? Hundreds of dead need not be an overstatement. Therefore, by logical deduction, the incendiary campaign has two major features which would seem to make it an 'acceptable' form of attack. It is not right, therefore, that animal rights representatives should condemn such actions.

Firstly, as we have already discovered, department stores are more than ready to discontinue fur departments after repeated attacks, but also secondly these attacks are a safeguard to the lives of any shopper at any one of these outlets nationwide, as the managers are having to spend considerable amounts of money to ensure all safety precautions are maintained at a high standard - money that would normally be passed straight on to the accounts as profit.

There is also much debate about what levels of violence, if any, is acceptable to an organization fighting a moral battle against violence towards animals. Theories about how far any activist should be prepared to go cannot satisfactorily be answered objectively, but I would counter any argument that stated that by employing any violence whatsoever animal rights activists are equating themselves with the abusers of animals. They employ violence on innocents for their own pleasure or greed. It is hard to see how even an equal amount of violence used against an animal abuser could be unacceptable if the end result is that the abuser no longer inflicts himself on others. Take the following situation: You are walking home down a partially lit road and see in the distance an old person being attacked - what would you do? 1) Ignore it and say "that's awful" but do nothing else. 2) Shout and scream at the attacker in the hope he may become scared and run away (possibly repeating his actions at another occasion). 3) Discuss the wrongs of what he is doing and hope he will see the error of his ways. 4) Physically intervene to prevent him causing harm. I hope all of you can associate each of the above alternatives with responses that are often generated about animal rights issues - the two situations are not really that different.

THE LEATHER ISSUE

by David Lane

A friend once asked me why the animal rights movement are anti-fur but not anti-leather. He said he couldn't understand why we are violently opposed to the use of fur, yet seem unconcerned by the use of leather. He argued that they are basically the same thing - animal skins. My friend isn't particularly sympathetic to our aims and the question was a thinly disguised accusation of double standards. But it troubled me because I couldn't give a satisfactory answer. It's quite true, we have ignored the leather issue and it is time we woke up to the fact. Have you ever wondered why our towns are full of shops selling leather while everywhere fur shops and fur departments are closing down? Or wondered why there is no "leather" equivalent of Lynx? Or why so many people in the animal rights movement actually wear the stuff?

The By-product Myth

There are several answers to these questions but the most popular one invariably involves the term "by-product", as in "animals are killed for their flesh, not their skin, so leather is a by-product of the meat industry",...and if leather is only a by-product then we might as well use it because it would only be thrown away otherwise, and anyway, not using it does nothing to save the lives of animals.... or that is how the reasoning goes.

My dictionary defines "by-product" as a "substance produced incidentally in the making of something else". But leather is not a by-product of the meat industry, and it is not produced incidentally. Every part of an animal killed in a slaughterhouse can be sold. Its muscles, fat and most of its internal organs are sold for meat. Its blood goes to make petfood and fertiliser. Its horns, hooves and bones are used to make gelatine. Its eyes may go to a school for dissection. Its hair is used to make brushes and to stuff furniture. Its skin is made into suede, sheepskin or leather. The skin of an animal represents something like 10 per cent of its value at the abattoir. As Peter Singer writes in 'Animal Liberation', "The sale of hides for leather plays a significant role in the profitability of the meat industry". Just as the body of an animal is treated as a raw material to be broken down into a variety of useful products, so crude oil is broken down into petrol, kerosine, bitumen, butane gas and so on. Kerosine accounts for roughly 10 per cent of the value of crude oil. It is used for jet fuel and as paraffin, but kerosine is not a by-product of petrol. Like leather, it is a valuable product in its own right.

The Old Cow Myth

All right, so leather isn't a by-product of meat, but surely the fur trade inflicts far more suffering on animals than the meat and leather industry. After all, doesn't most leather come from old dairy cows who have spent a relatively comfortable life down on the farm?

The myth here is that the production of leather involves significantly less cruelty than the production of fur. Even if it were true it would not excuse the use of leather, since being less cruel doesn't make something acceptable. But it is not true. The difference in suffering is one of kind not severity. Most of the leather that people buy is soft leather, the softer the better. Soft leather is luxurious leather. Shoe uppers, handbags, wallets, briefcases, sofas, armchairs and jackets are all made from soft leather. But soft leather doesn't come from old cows. It comes from young calves. The very softest, most luxurious leather comes from the unborn calf of a pregnant cow at the slaughterhouse. Many meat-eaters refuse to eat veal because of the blatant cruelty to calves, so why is it that most vegetarians and many animal rights campaigners continue to wear their skins?

A Question of Money?

Is the difference between leather and fur one of money? I hope not, but this possibility has occurred to me. It is a very obvious fact that fur has only ever been available to the privileged few. On the other hand, most people can afford leather goods. I know it sounds cynical, but it's easy to despise an activity that you can't afford to indulge in anyway. Probably some equally cynical person will add that foxhunting seems to attract rather more attention than the far more widespread bloodsport of angling!

It might be argued that it is better to concentrate our efforts on areas where there is a greater chance of success. We are more likely to abolish foxhunting than fishing, and it will be easier to close down the fur trade than the meat and leather trade. Of course that's true, but you don't have to choose between two evils, simply reject both. Don't buy a fur coat, and don't buy a leather coat either!

No Alternative?

There will be many who accept much of what I say about the leather issue, but who continue to use it anyway. They usually claim not to like wearing leather but say they have no choice. Isn't the "no choice" excuse the one used by vivisectionists? Don't they claim that they have to use animals in experiments because there are no alternatives? There are always alternatives to leather, and the alternatives are generally cheaper than the "real thing". How often have you heard the claim that there are no alternatives to meat, eggs, cow's milk and other animal products? Of course no-one needs to consume animal products but many people like to. But what people want should never be confused with what people need, and quite clearly nobody needs to use leather.

The Problem Within

Anything that anybody does to reduce animal suffering is a good and positive thing. A meat-eater who cuts down on meat should be praised, and encouraged to eat still less. But anyone claiming to work for animal rights must be prepared to free themselves from any possible charge of hypocrisy. If we are to be successful in our attempts to persuade others to adopt a cruelty-free lifestyle, we have to be seen to be doing everything possible to live up to our own aims. How can anybody wearing leather shoes or a leather jacket hope to persuade another person not to buy a fur coat? They don't have the moral right to even try. It is a sad fact that far too many people in the animal rights movement are not prepared to free themselves from animal abuse. They, like those they hope to influence, prefer to remain ignorant of the cruelty involved in areas such as dairy farming and leather production. They like their milk and their leather shoes, and would rather not be asked awkward questions. But the use of animal skins for clothing, luxury goods or furniture involves animal suffering comparable in scale to that caused by any other form of animal abuse. We can't ignore the problem any longer.

Get Informed!

There are two things you can do to help change things. First, do not buy anything made from leather. Second, get informed! The Campaign Against Leather and Fur (CALF!) is a new group which aims to educate both the general public and the animal rights movement about the leather issue. CALF can be contacted at: Box 17, 198 Blackstock Road, London N5.

FOR UNITY

by Nick Newbury

I have just read the first edition of the magazine which I found very informative on society and group news and also on direct action news. I welcome a magazine such as this for, as was pointed out in the mag, there has been a lot of division in the Animal Rights Movement, and any forum which seeks to promote rational debate and foster unity is to be welcomed.

Surely the animal abusers must heave sighs of relief when they see and hear us slagging each other off, for they know that they have no valid defence against our arguments and that a united attack against them would surely succeed eventually. To my mind every action that we take in the cause of animal liberation, whether it be handing out a leaflet, picketting a shop, giving talks, liberating animals or damaging animal abusers' property is a valid and important action. We all have different roles to play and, therefore, just because a person chooses a different form of protest it should not be condemned - this applies not only to those members of Animal Rights Societies who condemn direct action but also to activists who are dismissive of the campaigning tactics of local groups and national societies.

I have noticed a tendency for some local groups to follow in the footsteps of the national societies in that when an action has taken place in their area they have used the local media attention to condemn such actions as damaging to their own campaigns, instead of using the opportunity to explain the reason for the action and the goings-on of the animal abuser concerned. Direct action, although effective, needs to be backed up with education and, similarly, leafletting, demos etc. make more impact when supported by direct action campaigns, so let's all put aside any past differences and get on with the task in hand - that of fighting for animal liberation.

There is, however, one issue which I think it is important to discuss, that of violence towards humans. I do not regard damage to property as violent and, as was stated in the last mag, to describe such action as violent only clouds the issue. I believe that we have a right to defend ourselves when attacked and, indeed, should do so, however I believe that deliberate violence towards other human beings is wrong.

If we consider it morally then surely if we aim to create a society where no creature, human or animal, is to suffer at the hands of humans, then the use of violence towards people is not in accordance with this aim. If we consider violence towards people in tactical terms I think it is also counter-productive. Imagine if a vivisectioner were to be assassinated then the backlash would be far worse than perhaps anything positive which could be gained (if anything?). For a start the media would completely condemn the action with more than their usual vehemence towards the AR movement. Also the vivisection community would be seen as martyrs and could turn possible public protest against their activities into public sympathy and support. The police would also react strongly which would surely involve raids on activists and local groups and the state would then bring its full weight to bear on the direct action movement - with increased surveillance, arrests etc., which would perhaps deter and frighten off potential activists. Also if the activists responsible for the killing were themselves caught they could face life imprisonment sentences which would end for good their animal liberation activities.

I think we all experience extreme frustration and anger at the atrocities carried out on animals and we must channel this anger into positive action and not allow this anger to force us into actions which are morally wrong and counter-productive. The policy of the ALF is one of non-violence and I think that it is something to be proud of in the AR movement that no-one has been seriously injured or killed by ALF actions. I believe this policy of non-violence should continue to guide direct actions.

I hope that this mag does become a good outlet for group views and direct action views, and also that those who have been dividing the movement will use it as a forum to voice differences of opinion and that we can all get on with our different types of campaigning with support and mutual respect for each other.

LOOSE TALK

Anon

The animal rights movement, in its present form, is fairly young, but this aside, some amazing developments and advancements have taken place, thrusting the whole concept of rights for animals directly into the spotlight of contemporary Britain. Changes in tactics and methods used by activists and supporters have taken place and, although not always 100% effective, they have shown that this is one movement that is extremely capable of carrying out serious campaigns of economic sabotage - one only has to look at some of the actions of the past few years to realise just how effective. Despite a distinct lack of finances and resources, the technology and sophistication of actions is improving all the time. More and more damage and destruction is being carried out by activists and, of course, this brings with it the unwanted attention of the police, who start to pour more finances and peoplepower into tracing the people responsible.

This in itself is difficult enough to cope with, being that the police have infinitely more resources than animal rights campaigners do, but it seems apparent that, despite everybody within the movement being aware of the importance of not talking to the police, and the old adage "Loose talk costs lives", there are still some people who feel that that excuses them from talking to others.

It appears that, despite victories won and the increasing pace of the movement's maturation, there are some people who are not maturing with it. Complacency appears to be the order of the day, either knowingly or through lack of concern. People feel that they can rest on their 'laurels', feeling untouchable, and that scorn and derision can be handed out to those that disagree. Speculation is going on about what other people or groups are up to and very dangerous statements are being made. There is no apparent reason for this, let alone a good one, except maybe human nature, but there is nothing but harm that can come of it. Eventually the foolhardy statements are bound to reach the ears of the police, and another activist will probably end up in jail.

If one looks at other more 'advanced' direct action groups or 'terrorist' groups, vast amounts can be learned, especially from those that have been around for a long time. Take, for instance, the IRA. Whether or not you agree with them, they have advanced from being a floundering 'peasant army' equipped with primitive tools and a few weapons at the turn of the century, to an extremely well-equipped, effective, serious threat to their 'enemy'. They made, and still do make, mistakes; but they have sorted out their own camp fairly well, especially with regards informants or people who make unjustified statements. If faced with a threat from within their own movement they deal with it harshly, even if there is not much evidence to back up the 'rumours'. They realise that to put up an effective campaign they have to purge themselves of people who talk loosely. They do not tolerate gossips and speculation. Admittedly their ideals and aims are totally different from those of the animal rights movement but animal rights campaigners can learn a great deal from studying them and other groups.

Let us turn back to the animal rights movement. It is said that there are people who have made some extremely dangerous remarks and statements to other people within the movement - statements that could have no purpose and which have seriously jeopardised future actions and caused some real stress. Why should this be? Unlike the animals they purport to represent, animal rights campaigners all have the freedom of choice to decide which path to follow - whether it be legal campaigning or direct action, and so as such they should each be respected, whatever path they take. But if someone does choose direct action rather than 'legal protest' then they should also feel fairly secure in the knowledge that unless they are unlucky, or make a bad mistake, that the chances of them being caught are fairly slim. They should most certainly not have the fear of someone with a big mouth helping them into prison. If people want to damn themselves by loose talk, or maybe become 'martyrs to the cause' then, egotistical as it is, it is up to them, but if they also drag other people in, this could be very bad for the movement if nothing is done to stop them. Speculation, name dropping, gossip - all this has to stop because, harmless as it may seem, it soon builds up and gets twisted out of all proportion - by which time it may be too late for some.

If it is known that there is someone in the movement who says things to others, or who wants to be a martyr, or who seems to have overstepped the mark, then it may be a good idea for fellow campaigners to have a quiet word with them (keep it quiet) or perhaps back off from them, keeping a distance and taking a close look at what has been said, and why. If the source of the problem is isolated then hopefully it may go away.

Unless animal rights campaigners wake up to the danger from within, then as a movement, they could so easily be in serious trouble. In the future, if actions become more and more serious, then naivety and complacency will be left behind and it could be the case that in the struggle for animal liberation there will be a development in actions, with people possibly being hurt. If and when that time comes it can be guaranteed that the state will put into full effect its vast machinery to try and decimate the threat posed, and any people that they can use, either knowingly or unknowingly, they will. It seems that they are starting already - watching and listening to certain people in the hope that something will come up that will help them. The movement must get serious and be aware of what is going on. People may appear paranoid, but with reason. Animal rights campaigners have too much at stake to allow the statements and actions of a few to pose extra danger to all!

If this happens, the only real losers will be the animals. It would be wrong to allow them to be put at risk any longer - they have enough of a horrible time as it is and if the movement which is supposed to help them is spending its time arguing, speculating and dividing itself, thanks to the actions of a small but extremely vocal minority, then it is valuable time wasted. As it goes into the '90s, the animal liberation movement needs to grow up - the childish games and chatter must stop. Now!

Editorial Note:

Apologies for being late with this issue. Thank you to everyone who has helped. If you have sent information, articles or illustrations which don't appear in this magazine, the chances are they will be included in the next issue which will be put together soon to catch up.

A few months ago we became aware of a leaflet "From Friends of Arkangel", informing "Animal Aid Local Organisers" that Arkangel was banned at this year's Living Without Cruelty exhibition and inviting them to decide if the magazine "deserves to be persecuted". Some AA contacts, understandably but wrongly, assumed that we'd produced this leaflet ourselves. In fact, we don't even know who did! We would, however, like to thank these "Friends of Arkangel" for their support. They'll be pleased to learn that the response was positive and heartening.

ONE

PAR FOR THE COURSE

I wonder how many readers of Arkangel will remember Richard Course, who was executive director of the League Against Cruel Sports throughout most of the eighties. Of those who remember him I wonder how many will be surprised by the fact that Course has now gone over to the side of the hunters, sending a pro-bloodsports statement to all Members of Parliament, attempting to persuade the Labour Party to exclude the proposal to ban hunting with hounds from its next General Election manifesto and giving evidence on behalf of hunts who are taken to court by the LACS.

There may be many who are not surprised by this behaviour. To my mind, during his days at the League, there was always strong suspicion that Course did not care properly about the animals. He was determinedly opposed to any attempt to combat angling, distanced himself from the term "animal rights" and was always ready to condemn ALF actions. It seems, therefore, to be quite in keeping with his character that, following his departure from the LACS after an acrimonious dispute, he should attempt to hit back at the League by seeming to damage their campaign, no matter what the cost in animal suffering. The harm he is trying to cause to the fight against animal persecution even goes further than that, as he has also stated to MPs that "our society (quite rightly) tolerates cruelty to animals in the cause of medical research". In addition, his statement says that the shooting of Red Deer by farmers and landowners is "completely understandable and fully justifiable" and he agrees with the toleration of cruelty to farm animals "in the cause of the provision of meat".

So how in the world was such a character allowed to rise to a supreme position of power and influence within an animal protection society? Perhaps the problem lies in the fact that such positions exist at all. If it is possible to achieve power and wealth through involvement in animal protection, then this fact is bound to attract people who will be more motivated by self aggrandizement than by a genuine concern for the animals. It is my suspicion that Course is not the only one and that there may be others in powerful positions in the movement who are there for the wrong reasons or who have become corrupted by the power they have obtained.

In recent years there have been attempts to run national animal protection societies more and more along the lines of big business, in the cause of effectiveness and efficiency, so it is said. But animal protection isn't about the cut and thrust of the market place. It is about compassion and loving and caring. An organization which preaches kindness and fairness should be run with kindness and fairness, but if we look at the bigger animal protection societies we can see that this is often not the case. Such things as high-powered officials and large wage differentials between those "in charge" and ordinary staff members surely do not reflect the values of the equitable society which I would hope we all want to create.

I believe there is a strong case for the staff of animal protection societies to operate as a collective, with no officials being in positions of supremacy regarding either power or wages. There is no reason why this should be less efficient than present systems. Indeed, I am sure it would be more so. All staff would feel they had a real part to play in the running of the organization and so would be more content, there would be a saving on wages as people would work because of their concern for the animals rather than for financial reward, there would be less internal disputes within a structure which did not invite "power-play" and there would be nothing to encourage the involvement of individuals motivated by the lust for power rather than by a genuine desire for animal protection. There would also be a greater deterrence to infiltrators because the amount of influence they could achieve would be more limited and genuine campaigners would not become corrupted by power.

Can societies for the protection of animals really afford to carry on with an hierarchical system of administration which, with little doubt, will continue to throw up more Richard Courses, who will return to haunt them and to seriously hamper the battle against animal persecution?

LARSON

"The revolution has been postponed ... We've discovered a leak."

WITHOUT CRUELTY?

It was very sad to hear that at this year's "Living Without Cruelty" exhibition in London, Animal Aid officials attempted to stop some of the stalls there from selling Arkangel and even forced stallholders to remove the magazine from display. Many copies of Arkangel were none the less sold and a lot of people attending the exhibition expressed strong disapproval of the action of the Animal Aid officials. At a time when unity in the movement is more important than ever, one wonders why officers of a society that exists to protect animals should behave in such a heavy-handed and antagonistic way towards an animal liberation magazine.

It is possible that the action of the Animal Aid officials may have had something to do with the "car bombs" which had occurred a few days before and was, perhaps, part of the general hysteria which tends to grip many representatives of certain national societies following such events. It seems strange, however, that such hysteria should be directed towards Arkangel. The magazine reports on direct action (as do many of the national newspapers!) as part of its coverage of the animal liberation/protection movement as a whole and has published articles reflecting many different shades of opinion on controversial actions, but it is an express (and legally necessary) policy not to include items which intend to encourage illegal activity.

Articles I have written for Arkangel have sometimes contained criticism of utterances that Animal Aid officials have made in the media, but such criticism has been reasoned and has come from a position of general respect for them as animal rights campaigners. Nevertheless, perhaps they are unwilling to tolerate any criticism, no matter how respectful, of their behaviour. If that is the case, it shows a sad lack of maturity and common sense. It is open at any time for Animal Aid officials to write articles for Arkangel expressing their views and there is no doubt that such articles would be printed. Unlike them, Arkangel does not believe in censoring the views of other people in the movement. In fact certain Animal Aid officials have been specifically invited to express their opinions in Arkangel, but have not taken up the offer. In contrast, John Robins of Animal Concern (Scotland), who was similarly criticised for some of his statements, did submit an article, which was printed in the last edition. A far more sensible response than attempting to suppress the distribution of the magazine.

A problem that can occur with officials of the larger animal protection societies is that they sometimes become seized with a desire to "control" the movement, so that local animal rights groups become their "fiefdoms" and campaigners follow all instructions they might give. Such people may view Arkangel as a threat because it invites AR campaigners to think for themselves and to express their own opinions. One wonders if this may be, perhaps, the real reason for what occurred at the LWC exhibition.

As one of the founders of Arkangel, it might be very tempting for me now to encourage AR campaigners to organise some sort of boycott of Animal Aid. This would, however, be of no benefit to the animals and would only further intensify the ill-feeling within the movement. One of the major reasons for Arkangel's existence is to promote harmony and respect between all those who believe in animal protection/liberation and it is very important that those of us involved in the magazine practise what we preach. I therefore urge Arkangel readers to continue to support Animal Aid's excellent "Living Without Cruelty" campaign and would be very much opposed to any insults or nastiness being directed at Animal Aid officials, despite what they have done. Instead, I offer those officials the hand of friendship and reconciliation. If they do not want to take it, that is up to them, but an eye for an eye type behaviour has already made too many people in our movement blind - blind to the suffering of the animals that goes on unabated while AR campaigners fight one another. Our enemy is the animal abusers, not other people in the movement, no matter how unfortunate the behaviour of those people may be at times.

Hopefully, the Animal Aid officials responsible for the attempted suppression of Arkangel will reconsider the wisdom of such intolerance. The cause of animal protection will not be furthered by their behaving like the securitate. Such heavy-handed action will only succeed in driving people away from "animal rights", far more than unfortunate events like the "car bombs" could ever do. If the strength of the movement isn't going to be continually sapped by internal nastiness, the concept of Living Without Cruelty must be extended to also mean without cruelty to other animal protectionists. People whose eyes have been opened to the horrors of animal persecution need to be given love and support if they are to maintain the inner strength to campaign effectively against it. If being in our movement is like entering into a den of savages, constantly tearing at each other, then who will want to join, and who to stay?

ANOTHER CASE FOR RECONCILIATION

Following the attempts to blow up a couple of animal torturers in June, the spectacle of various vivisectionists spouting off in the media about the "benefits" of animal experimentation further emphasised the importance of scientific arguments against vivisection as a major weapon at the disposal of animal rights campaigners. It was disappointing that animal rights "representatives", in their media statements, made so little mention of the unscientific nature of animal experimentation (including the immense harm to human health resulting from the vivisection method). A great pity, also, that the works of Hans Reusch and his CIVIS Foundation, which expose the scientific invalidity of vivisection, have been shunned to such a large extent by many anti-vivisection organizations.

To my mind, however, the attitude of Hans Reusch and his followers has significantly contributed to this unhappy situation. By accusing so many officials of anti-vivisection societies of being "infiltrators" they have put those people's backs up and so made it more difficult for the "vivisection is scientific fraud" message to be spread throughout the movement and beyond. It cannot be ruled out that there may be infiltrators within animal protection societies, but the at times unfortunate behaviour of certain representatives of such organizations can be explained by factors other than infiltration. If people are falsely accused of being "infiltrators", it is human nature that they will not be very willing to listen to or publicize anything whatsoever that the accusers have to say.

In the interests of the fight against vivisection it is vital that the ill-feeling between so many anti-vivisection societies and Hans Reusch and his supporters come to an end. On the one side let us see an end to dubious accusations of infiltration and on the other a greater willingness to promote such books as "Slaughter of the Innocent" and "Naked Empress" as well as other important publications from the CIVIS organization.

SABS DISPUTE

It is good to hear that the dispute within the Hunt Saboteurs Association seems to be over and that things are getting back onto an even keel again. It is sad, however, that the situation took many months to sort out and for a long period of time the energies of a lot of anti-bloodsports campaigners were diverted by the internal HSA struggle. Both sides in the dispute obviously care about the animals. It is a pity, therefore, that they could not have got round a table and sorted out their differences right at the beginning rather than allowing the conflict to develop. Maybe there were some who were willing to sort the problem out amicably, but if so, they were obviously not listened to.

The real losers in situations of protracted strife between animal protectionists are the animals. It is important that we all recognise this and that attempts are made by all sides to solve internal disputes, in a spirit of friendship and respect, as soon as they arise.

(10 Queensferry St., Edinburgh, EH2 4PG)
Formerly the Scottish Society for the Prevention of Vivisection. An investigation into animal experimentation at the National Institute for Medical Research (NIMR) carried out in conjunction with Animal Cruelty Investigation Group was exposed in the national press on 9th May. Video and photographic evidence revealed abuses of animals undergoing experimentation caused by incompetence, indifference and neglect by the scientists concerned. As a result of the investigation Professor Wilhelm Feldberg and animal technician John Stean surrendered their licences to carry out experiments on animals. A report of the investigation has been sent to the Secretary of State.

BRITISH HEDGEHOG PRESERVATION SOCIETY

(Knowbury House, Knowbury, Ludlow, Shropshire SY8 3LQ)

Exists to encourage and give advice to the public concerning the care of hedgehogs, particularly when injured, sick, treated cruelly, orphaned or in any other danger. It encourages children to respect our natural wildlife by supplying information and giving lectures and thus fostering an interest in hedgehogs. It also funds research into the behavioural habits of hedgehogs to ascertain the best methods of assisting their survival.

LIVING WITHOUT CRUELTY EXHIBITION

ANIMAL AID

(7 Castle St., Tonbridge, Kent TN9 1BH)

Continuing its campaign against dissection in schools and is calling on all 'A' level exam boards to remove dissection requirements from their syllabus, following the example set by the London Examination Board which has become the first GCSE 'A' level board to do so. The tour around laboratories in the Whistleblowers campaign has been encouraging. It has gained much media coverage and some potential informants have come forward, as have scientists interested in discussing the issues. Information collected so far includes an Incident Diary from the physiology department at Birmingham University and statements from ex-workers of Perrycroft Lodge kennels, the breeders responsible for the 79 beagles who died on their way to a Swedish vivisection laboratory. A further "Whistleblower", from an employee within London Zoo, exposed information about research on baby wallabies at the Institute of Zoology. The director of London Zoo, Prof. Tony Flint, used to work at the notorious Babraham laboratory at Cambridge and Barry Cross, formerly director of Babraham and responsible for trying to justify all the research that went on there, is now vice-president of Regents Park. Animal Aid held a National Day of Action against L'Oreal on April 21st. Despite public pressure and the increasing number of other companies who have stopped cosmetic experiments on animals, L'Oreal arrogantly continue to test their products on animals. The fourth highly successful Living Without Cruelty exhibition took place on June 15th-17th at Kensington Town Hall, promoting "a compassionate lifestyle for a new decade" with information, films, lectures, celebrities, demonstrations and "cruelty-free" products.

ALF SUPPORTERS GROUP

(BCM 1160, London WC1N 3XX)

To avoid duplication of prisoners support work the organization Support Animal Rights Prisoners is merging with the ALF Supporters Group. The SG's name and address will continue and SARP will keep their box number open for a while for any mail which is still sent there.

BEAUTY WITHOUT CRUELTY

(57 King Henry's Walk, London N1 4NH)

BWC joined other animal rights groups to protest at the position of the British Prime Minister to allow Kong Kong 6 months to sell its 670 tonnes of ivory worth about £80 million. It has been estimated that at least 570 tonnes of the ivory was obtained illegally. BWC has also submitted an amendment to the EEC proposals to ban certain furs into the community where the animal has been caught by the leghold trap. BWC have stocks of a 12 minute video made by PETA, showing conditions inside the notorious Jindo fox and mink farm in South Korea - price £10 inc p+p. Ms. Diana Ratnagar, Chairperson of BWC India branch, has been appointed honorary consultant on animal welfare to the Ministry of Environment and Forests. A grant from the Jean Sainsbury Charitable Trust will enable BWC to bring out a new leaflet aimed at schools in the near future. An anti-fur petition, organised by BWC, has been presented by Glenda Jackson to the Prime Minister.

BRITISH UNION FOR THE ABOLITION OF VIVISECTION

(16a Crane Grove, London N7 8LB)

The campaign against Huntingdon Research Centre following the BUAV's undercover investigation continued to be at the forefront of anti-vivisection campaigning. Following the expose of the conditions and treatment suffered by the animals, an ex-employee of local animal breeders Interfauna approached the BUAV and gave photos and details regarding the terrible conditions in which the animals live. Interfauna can supply primates, hamsters, rabbits, cats, beagles, mice, rats and guinea-pigs. They supply HRC with beagles. BUAV, along with 'cruelty-free' companies such as the Body Shop and Beauty Without Cruelty and other animal protection groups such as IFAW and RSPCA have created a counter campaign to exert pressure in an effort to revise the EEC draft proposals which would make the testing of all ingredients on animals compulsory. The 1990 Health With Humanity bus tour completed its tour of schools and then made its way around the country visiting over 50 towns and cities. The BUAV have also been involved in organising protests and media coverage against the exportation of beagles for research abroad. This included demonstrations at both Humberside and Manchester airports, following tip-offs from cargo holders. The "Choose Cruelty-Free" campaign celebrated its third birthday - on average enquiries number 200 a week.

CAMPAIGN FOR THE ABOLITION OF ANGLING

(PO Box 130, Sevenoaks, Kent TW14 5NR)

After a quiet period from this group, CAA are now again in the forefront of the campaign to abolish angling. Their National Anti-Angling Day was this year held on June 16th.

CAMPAIGN FOR HUMANE ANIMAL TREATMENT

(PO Box 9, Yelverton, Devon PL20 6YW)

Spending 1990 circulating schools with the literature of many animal protection organizations and they also have a new campaign against the export of live animals for slaughter.

CARE FOR THE WILD

(1 Ashfolds, Horsham Rd., Rusper, W. Sussex RH12 4QX)

Made front page news in their continuing efforts to persuade the European Parliament to regulate the import of wild caught fur into the EC. On the 10th May the Daily Star ran a full front page picture depicting the horrors of wild caught fur.

This led to further media interest and gave the whole fur issue publicity on the radio and TV.

As part of the campaign, Care for the Wild also sent each of the 50 members of the Environment Committee a video showing the horror of trapping. This is to be followed up by a postcard campaign to MEPs in conjunction with Beauty Without Cruelty and other European organizations.

Care for the Wild continue to fund numerous projects in both the UK and abroad - these include an investigation into the effects of explosives on dolphins by Earth Island Institute.

The fishing industry use bombs to increase their catch of tuna. The decision has been made to ban the use of explosives by the US fishing boats and instrumental to this decision was the document produced following the investigation.

Care for the Wild are funding a survey of the population of a species of whale, the Right, during the coming year. A report will be compiled to present to the 1991 International Whaling Commission meeting.

Care for the Wild has joined in an African Ele-fund/ Elefriends initiative to protect the elephants of Tanzania.

The elephant fostering scheme continues to be successful - supporters are able to become foster-parents of an orphan elephant that is in the care of Daphne Sheldrick at her orphanage near Nairobi.

In this country Care for the Wild have funded 12 different badger protection groups from Cheshire down to Eastbourne.

As a companion to the popular Care for the Wild book, a new book called The Sanctuary Network is shortly to be produced. It will be a comprehensive handbook of sanctuaries throughout the country which take in sick and injured wildlife and it will be distributed free of charge.

Care for the Wild is supporting 'Batman' Dr. Stebbings who cares for bats which have been injured by poison, cats and sometimes by mindless vandals. It costs on average £18 to care for a bat and Dr. Stebbings treats about 300 a year.

CHICKENS' LIB

(PO Box 2, Holmfirth, Huddersfield, HD7 1QT)

With growing consumer awareness Chickens' Lib is renewing its efforts to abolish intensive farming methods. They are appealing to their supporters to write letters of protest to 'key' people.

As part of their turkey campaign, Chickens' Lib are determined to stop the 'heaviest turkey' competition before Christmas 1990.

The competition is a means of raising funds for charity by turkey producers. In April Chickens' Lib were able to successfully bid for four 'Easter' turkeys at Chelford Livestock Market in Cheshire.

One of the male turkeys was suffering so greatly that he had to be put down. The remaining three turkeys are now enjoying the rest of their lives free from suffering.

Chickens' Lib highlighted their battery hen petition in June when it was presented at 10 Downing Street along with supportive letters from VIPs.

They have also reprinted an updated version of their booklet 'Intensive Egg and Chicken Production' which now includes a section on turkeys and is available from Chickens' Lib at the cost of a SAE (24p).

COMPASSION IN WORLD FARMING

(20 Lavant St., Petersfield, Hants GU32 3EW)

CIWF are continuing with their Ban Live Exports campaign and arranged a massive Live Exports Lobby of Parliament in June.

They also featured in the farming programme Countryfile earlier in the year when they accompanied the RSPCA on an undercover surveillance operation of a shipment of sheep being taken to the continent.

CIWF continue to work with Animal Aid and the Vegetarian Society in their Choice campaign encouraging schools to adopt healthy vegetarian meals.

Since the launch of the campaign in November 1988 fifty six (out of 108) local education authorities have taken part.

The Great British Meat-Out campaign 1990 (with Animal Aid and the Vegetarian Society) intends to tie in their Meat-Out events with the Smithfield Show.

As a result of the 1989 Meat-Out campaign £1000 was sent to the Leaf Protein Feeding Scheme for undernourished children in Sri Lanka. The CIWF public awareness campaign on deer farming continues.

Although the number of deer farms has increased the number of deer being slaughtered in abattoirs, as opposed to being shot in the field, has decreased.

Sainsbury's and Asda only stock venison that has been shot in the field and Tesco, planning to sell venison, assure CIWF that they will do the same. Waitrose and Safeways continue to sell venison from deer slaughtered in abattoirs.

ELEFRIENDS

(Cherry Tree Cottage, Coldharbour, Nr. Dorking, Surrey RH5 6HA)

Set up to save the African elephant, the campaign has two objectives, to support anti-poaching and conservation initiatives and to persuade consumers not to buy ivory products, thereby destroying ivory markets.

To date Elefriends has donated £50,000 to various projects including anti-poaching work in Kenya, equipment in Tanzania, Nigeria and Namibia and the continued in-depth monitoring of the ivory trade by the Environmental Investigation Agency.

Elefriends has organised a phone line telling of the plight of the elephant. It's updated every two days and gives the latest news of the efforts to save elephants from poachers.

Each call generates 50p for Elefriends to help fund anti-poaching patrols and other conservation methods (the phone line number is 0898 338329).

ENVIRONMENTAL INVESTIGATION AGENCY

(208-9 Upper St., London N1 1RL)

The EIA's major 2 year investigation into the illegal ivory trade was featured in major articles in the Mail on Sunday and Sunday Times in the week before the CITES (Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species) agreed last year on a ban on the international trade in African elephant ivory. EIA is now continuing its investigation to ensure the ban is enforced and implemented. EIA is also campaigning to gain international protection for dolphins, porpoises and small whales. This will involve persuading the International Whaling Commission to assume responsibility to conserve these species. Currently around 750,000 are killed each year, either deliberately through kills in the Faroe Islands or Japan or accidentally in fishermen's nets. EIA have returned to the Faroe Islands this year to launch a campaign against the hunt. A further campaign is calling for a ban on the import of all wild-caught birds into the European Community. EIA has presented its year-long study into the trade to the European Commission.

(100 Gretney Walk, Moss Side, Manchester M15 5ND)
The alternative consumer magazine, The Ethical Consumer, is now reporting on more issues of concern to vegetarians, vegans and animal rights campaigners. In response to demand it now includes two new categories in its assessment of company records. In addition to animal testing, the magazine now reports on companies involved in factory farming and other animal rights issues, such as involvement in the meat, leather and fur industries.

FRIENDS OF THE EARTH

(26-28 Underwood St., London N1 7JQ)

The Arts for The Earth (TATE), Friends of the Earth's arts fundraising section, co-ordinated The Rainforest Festival which took place from 20th May - 5th June. The aim of the festival was to raise funds for the Friends of the Earth's Tropical Rainforest Campaign and it involved artists and celebrities, local groups, schools and other organizations. FOE launched a new campaign called 'In Whose Interest?'. On 21st April a Day of Action took place where the public were asked to stamp their bank cheques with 'Stamp out the debt not the rainforests' and to take the 'Debt Pledge' which involves moving bank accounts from those that do not support the campaign demands to those that have environmentally and socially responsible policies on Third World debt.

GREEK ANIMAL RESCUE

(30 MacDonald Rd., Friern Barnet, London N11 3JD)
The organization's shelter lease ran out in May but a deal is near to conclusion on 6 acres of land not far from the original site. The new shelter will have to be built from scratch and more money is needed. At present the shelter has 170 dogs, 25 cats, a mule and a donkey.

GREYHOUND RESCUE

(The Pines, Ballelin, Maughold, Isle of Man)
Greyhound Rescue is urging people to write to their MPs, to the Prime Ministers of Britain and Ireland (C.J. Haughey, Leinster House, Kildare St., Dublin, Eire) and to the Spanish Consulate (20, Draycott Place, London SW3) asking for Article 24 of Directive 86/609/EC to be invoked to make it totally illegal for ex-track (ie. tattooed) Greyhounds to be used for laboratory purposes in any category whatsoever, including breeding. Greyhound Rescue is also asking for people to write to the Irish Greyhound Board, (104, Henry Street, Limerick, Eire) protesting against the trade of cheap low-racing-grade Greyhounds from Eire to Spain. The dogs suffer appalling abuse during transit, on arrival in Spain and for the rest of their lives until they are disposed of by various inhumane methods.

GREENPEACE

(30-31 Islington Green, London N1 8XE)

Earlier this year 6 protesters in Auckland chained themselves to a Philippine-registered supply ship and also chained the propeller and, with trade union help, stopped the ship refueling. The ship was suspected of preparing to refuel Japanese drift-net fishing boats in the South Pacific. On 10th May 100 Greenpeace activists took part in a day of action against ICI, labelling it as "World Class Ozone Destroyers". Protesters dressed in white overalls and goggles and carried banners saying "CFC" in the shape of the distinctive ICI logo. According to recent data ICI is the largest producer of CFCs in Western Europe, the largest Western European producer of methyl chloroform and produces thousands of tonnes of carbon tetrachlorides. Greenpeace wants the production and use of all these chemicals stopped now. Supporters are invited to share their concern by obtaining one of their stickers and placing it in a prominent place. "Walk for the Whales", a sponsored walk throughout the country, was held on July 15th as part of Greenpeace's continuing campaign against all scientific and commercial whaling. Greenpeace have now introduced a new campaign publication, a four colour broadsheet format containing fewer pages but a higher photographic content than in the old format.

LEAGUE AGAINST CRUEL SPORTS

(83/87 Union St., London SE1 1SG)

Carried out an exclusive poll. MPs were asked whether they supported or opposed live hare coursing. 85% said they opposed it. This has led to an all-party parliamentary campaign with the aim of asking the Government to provide time for a full debate on the issue. The LACS controversial anti-foxhunting advertisement which was banned by the Cannon cinema chain has won two major awards. LACS continue to provide a free legal service for landowners, pet owners etc. who have suffered at the hands of hunts. Legal cases include an assault on sanctuaries manager John Hicks by followers of the Devon and Somerset Stag hounds. The League took out a private prosecution as the Crown Prosecution Service declined to prosecute. As a result four followers of the hunt were found guilty of offences under the Public Order Act.

Lynx

LYNX

(PO Box 300, Nottingham NG1 5HN)

Following Lynx's successful investigation into the Swalesmoor mink factory near Halifax last summer, the organization, together with key personnel, have received writs for trespass. Some of these writs were delivered during the Lynx rally in Trafalgar Square. Lynx is being sued for financial damages (no damage was done to any property) and faces substantial legal costs. They are therefore appealing to members and supporters to make a contribution to the Lynx Legal Defence Fund. Lynx has launched a campaign to end the tradition of wearing fur-trimmed ceremonial robes. Legal, academic and court robes are trimmed with ermine. Ede and Ravenscroft, suppliers of these robes, state that they can use synthetic rather than real fur but that less than 1% of their customers ask them to do so. So far a handful of mayors have changed to synthetic fur and Lynx is asking all their supporters to write to their mayors. Due to an ever increasing demand for their merchandise, Lynx has opened up its second shop located at the Quayside Shopping Precinct, Bridge Street, Cambridge. Lynx itself has relocated to Nottingham.

Animal Day

'AD' - from the NAVS 'The Campaigner' magazine

NATIONAL ANTI-VIVISECTION SOCIETY

(51 Harley St., London W1N 1DD)

A highly successful World Day for Laboratory Animals demo took place on 28th April in London where an estimated 8,000 people attended, making it one of the biggest demos for many years. The day also coincided with the launch of the NAVS youth department, Animal Defenders. This new group is for people from 8-18 years and will cover all issues concerning animal rights and welfare, the environment and conservation. The group is headed by a streetwise cartoon character called 'AD' - an ex-laboratory rabbit. NAVS have also been involved in protesting at a shipment of beagle dogs from the USA through Manchester airport en route to Hazleton laboratories. NAVS obtained much media coverage nationally and locally and organised a demo at the airport. KLM, the Dutch airline handling the shipment, announced that they would no longer handle beagle shipments. NAVS campaign over the export of animals from Humberside continues. In the meantime NAVS are appealing to workers in the transportation industry to support them in the campaign against the transport of lab animals.

NATIONAL PET REGISTER

(Chishill Rd., Heydon, Herts)

Over 100,000 animals are currently registered with the organization. The register has been able to reunite a large number of lost animals with their owners. There is now a no charge phone no. 0800 581553. Pet health insurance is available and the register will provide free identity discs to kennel and cattery establishments.

WAGING WAR ON PET THIEVES!

NATIONAL PETWATCH

(PO Box 16, Brighouse, W. Yorks HD6 1DS)

The only organization in the country monitoring and investigating the theft of cats and dogs have had an exceptionally busy period. Following a tip-off about a suspicious dog sanctuary the group undertook a 3 month investigation which revealed that dogs taken to the sanctuary in Wales were almost immediately killed (even though homes were available) and then taken to a factory to be turned into petfood. Following major national and local press coverage the dogs home closed down and Chetwynd Animal By-Products promised not to take in anymore dead pets.

Another Petwatch investigation followed information that a gang of cat thieves were planning to steal cats in 3 Welsh villages over one weekend. The cats were destined for "sacrifice" to "celebrate" the devils birthday. National Petwatch were able to warn cat owners in the villages before the weekend. The group appeared on BBC TV after investigators revealed that over 2,000 cats had disappeared from the streets of Bournemouth during an 18 month period. The name and address of at least one person suspected of being a cat thief was handed to the police, along with a complete dossier of cat losses in Bournemouth during the making of the programme.

National Petwatch continues to campaign for the police to take the theft of cats seriously. The police continue to officially deny that pet stealing takes place despite vast evidence to the contrary. The organization has now launched an appeal for funds to help pay for current and future investigations and bring the guilty parties to court. Publicity was obtained about an incident in Woking, Surrey, where a man walking home from work saw a cat thief grab a cat and throw it into the back of a waiting van. The good citizen went up to the thief and questioned him and the thief punched him. But when the man bravely punched the thief back the thief panicked and jumped into the van which sped off. In their haste the rear door hadn't been closed and six cats spilled out of the van onto the road and ran away.

PEOPLE'S TRUST FOR ENDANGERED SPECIES

(Hamble House, Meadrow, Godalming, Surrey GU7 3JX)

Recently started an investigation with the aim of gaining protection for the snapping turtle and publicising its plight. The snapping turtle lives in the swamps of North America and is hunted for soup and steaks. PTES are appealing for funds to conduct an investigation into the activities of the hunters and the status of the snappers. In Costa Rica PTES has donated funds for a Leatherback turtle project. Their survival depends on the protection of their nesting grounds, under attack from tourists and poachers. For 6 weeks during April and May the nests were guarded whilst hatching. Plans are also being made for the protection of the nests of green turtles. Already the number of green turtles that are legally killed each year has been reduced. Another investigation funded by PTES, into trace element deficiencies in the soil of the Rift Valley - home of the Nakuru Rhino Reserve, is nearing completion. Other projects funded by PTES include the restoration of a bat breeding site at Wadbury Mill following its destruction by fire in 1988, the investigation into the increased trading of Box turtles following the banning of the tortoise trade, an investigation into the cruelty and destruction of wildlife and habitat as a result of rattlesnake round-ups held in the USA annually for entertainment. Two further studies also being supported by PTES include the Right whale population, following the belief of some scientists that whale populations are increasing again and that hunting could be re-started, and the study of the population of seabirds around the coast of Scotland and the Orkneys. Their numbers are declining, thought to be due to a decline in the number of sandeels being caught in increasing numbers by fishermen.

PUPPY WATCH WALES

(PO Box 23, Neath, Wales SA11 1QP)

Have received much national publicity on the TV and in the press, with a major article in the Wales on Sunday newspaper. Members of Puppy Watch accompanied journalists on a tour of puppy farms in West Wales. They found and photographed the appalling conditions. Wales on Sunday presented the RSPCA with a full dossier. Puppy Watch continue to investigate and collate information on what has become the latest form of animal abuse - intensive puppy farming.

RSPCA

(Causeway, Horsham, West Sussex RH12 1HG)

Celebrating its 150th anniversary with a year long programme of events, including a special issue of Royal Mail stamps and the unveiling of a new crest. The RSPCA is campaigning for the registration of dogs. The society placed a poster near Earls Court underground station in West London, close to the venue of the Crufts Dog Show. The poster showed a mountain of dead dogs. The RSPCA are calling for the public to use non-animal tested cosmetics and other products, to say "no" to garments made of animal fur, to stop using pesticides in a bid to safeguard wildlife, to boycott circuses with performing animals and for holidaymakers to shun bullfights and other bloodsports.

RSPCA WATCHDOG

(44 Kingsley Rd., Horley, Surrey RH6 8RH)

(PO Box 32879, Nairobi and 1 Ashfolds, Horsham Rd., Ruspur, W. Sussex RH12 4QX)

The "Rhino Charge" motoring event took place in February and raised important funds for the Rhino sanctuary in Aberdare Salient. The Rhino Ark sanctuary will protect all animals within its boundary fence.

VEGETARIAN SOCIETY (UK)

(Parkdale, Dunham Rd., Altrincham, Cheshire) Continues to grow - membership now exceeds 16,000. The Youth Education department receives about 70-120 enquiries every day. The new magazine can now be bought in newsagents, especially in the major ones such as WH Smith, as well as in supermarkets. The 'V' symbol found on vegetarian products is to be registered throughout the European Community to ensure it is protected in 1992. The society has also licensed the Dutch Vegetarian Society to develop the use of the symbol in the Netherlands. The Vegetarian Society is to have a new membership category with corporate membership. Cranks (vegetarian restaurant chain) is to be the first corporate member.

WORLD WIDE FUND FOR NATURE

(Panda House, Wayside Park, Catteshall Lane, Godalming, Surrey GU7 1XR)

Published a scientific survey which exposes the threat to wildlife from logging and crop planting in Sarawak. The WWF is part of an alliance of conservationists lobbying the EEC to crack down on European logging companies that are causing destruction of tropical rainforests.

The Vegan, Summer 1990

VEGAN SOCIETY

(7 Battle Rd., St. Leonards-on-Sea, East Sussex TN37 7AA)

The society has moved to new premises. This includes a shop on the ground floor and a flat above which will be let to defray costs. The Oxford office has been sub-let so that the move has had all-round advantages for the society. Plamil and The Organic Product Company have become the first two companies to be permitted to use the Vegan Society Trade Mark. A new book specifically for prisons has been produced called Vegan Cooking Behind Bars. It will be sent to all prisons free of charge.

WHALE AND DOLPHIN CONSERVATION SOCIETY

(20 West Lee Rd., Bath, Avon BA1 3RL)

WDCS held a film premier evening in Bristol of their film "Where have all the dolphins gone?" which shows the massive killing of dolphins by the Pacific tuna industry. The group are also asking members to write letters protesting to the USA about the slaughter. Other letter writing campaigns include the killing of pilot whales in the Faroe Islands, minky whales in Japan and the imprisonment of 4 Orca-killer whales in a bankrupt dolphinarium in Iceland.

WSPA is now going to be represented by its own staff in Kenya as part of its ongoing work in the protection of endangered species in Africa. This year the WSPA African campaign has been conducting operations to increase the physical protection of the elephants in Nigeria, help the survival of gorillas in the forests of Uganda, protect the habitat of the okapi in Zaire and reintroduce the giant tortoise in the Seychelles. A poster has been produced, aimed at tourists flying to Spain who may be considering going to a bullfight. It was displayed at most charter flight airports during July and August. WSPA is researching a report for publication in the new year regarding the effects of litter on animal life.

In the last issue of Arkangel mention was made of the Badger Trust and Greenwave in the National Campaigns section. It has since transpired that the National Federation of Badger Groups has found "abundant evidence of mismanagement and misconduct" in an investigation of the Badger Trust; also that Greenwave is connected with the National Front and so may not be a bona fide "Green" organization. In the light of these revelations it may be prudent for Arkangel readers to be wary of making any donations either to Greenwave or the Badger Trust. It appears that Greenwave has folded and the founder of the Badger Trust has been jailed for dishonestly obtaining housing benefits and a mortgage.

ZOO CHECK

Cherry Tree Cottage, Coldharbour, Nr. Dorking, Surrey RH5 6HA)

Have been particularly busy with a number of investigations. These included the plight of elephants at Cricket St. Thomas wildlife park, the terrible suffering of animals at Zoolandia in Teneriffe, the following of two ex-London zoo polar bears to a zoo in Poland and an investigation into the abnormal behaviour of animals in British zoos. Zoo Check have a 40 minute VHS video available called "Elephants and their Ivory". It includes a discussion between Virginia McKenna and Daphne Sheldrick on the problems of conservation and poaching of the African elephant.

LOCAL GROUPS

ALLERDALE ANIMAL AID

Took part in nationwide day of action against L'Oreal and regularly hold stalls to collect petitions and leaflet on many animal rights issues.

ANIMAL RIGHTS CAMBRIDGE

Has held a stall in Cambridge town centre every Saturday morning this year. The stall attracts new members and helps finance the groups other activities. There has been a house-to-house collection and donations have been made to Cambridge Anti-Bloodsports and West Norfolk Seal Sanctuary, amongst others. In coming months the group will be concentrating on factory farming and the transport of animals, as well as continuing to support the campaign against Huntingdon Research Centre. Meetings are held on the fourth Tuesday of every month at 8pm, the Bath House, Gwydir Street.

BASILDON ANIMAL RIGHTS

(PO Box 323, Basildon, Essex)
With plenty of support from other Essex groups a well organised march and demonstration took place against the Smithkline Beecham Lab at Stock. Outside the lab there was some street theatre involving vivisectioners, rabbits and MPs; the rabbits eventually being rescued by the ALF. The whole event was well covered by the local media. The drug company claim to be moving from Stock to Welwyn (Herts) but local campaigners say they will keep up the pressure until the day the lab closes. They have also warned other animal abusers not to move into their area. "We have two members of RADA in our group, so ICI won't know what's hit them" said a spokesman.

BERKSHIRE CIWF

Stalls were held at the Oxford Fair and the Reading Green Fair, both of which were well received. Several local schools have been approached with a view to giving a talk and video show. The response has been favourable and this is an idea that other groups may wish to try.

BIRMINGHAM ANIMAL AID

(3 George St., Balsall Heath, Birmingham B12 9RG) Have continued leafletting and holding stalls in the city centre and also took part in the national day of action against L'Oreal with a demonstration in the city centre.

BOGNOR AND CHICHESTER ACTION FOR ANIMALS

A regular newsletter is produced and a stall held in Bognor town centre every Thursday, 10am-3pm, as well as street collections for the local hunt sabs. The BUAV's cinema trailer against cosmetic testing was being shown all week and the public were leafletted entering and leaving the cinema. Letters were sent to Nat West Bank to protest about them allowing hunting on their land, with a demo to be held outside the Bognor branch and threats to close accounts. A talk was arranged with a speaker from the Animal Cruelty Investigation Group. Animal rights stalls were held at the Bognor College Festival, the Chichester City Fayre and the Worthing Day for Animals.

BOURNEMOUTH ANIMAL RIGHTS

A demonstration was held in the town square to mark the World Day for Laboratory Animals, with free copies of a local cruelty-free product guide being handed out.

BRADFORD ANIMAL RIGHTS

(PO Box 253, Bradford, W. Yorks B10 0RE)

The pressure on Bradford University is continuing with a meeting on the campus attracting over 150 people and being addressed by representatives from Bradford Animal Rights and the BUAV. After a successful demonstration outside the university, with demonstrators wearing black to mark World Day, university chiefs agreed to a meeting to debate live animal experiments. The group have also been busy with street stalls, leafletting, petitioning etc. in the city centre.

BRIGHTON ANIMAL RIGHTS CAMPAIGN

(PO Box 307, Ship St., Brighton, E. Sussex BN2 1HW)
Keeping busy with campaigns against Shamrock Farms and Brighton Dolphinarium.

BRISTOL ANIMAL AID

(PO Box 589, Bristol, Avon BS99 1RW)

A march from Clifton Downs to the city centre attracted hundreds of people with many others joining along the way. Speakers called for an end to animal experiments at the University. The group have their own petition demanding the release of Beagles from Langford Veterinary School into the care of Bristol Animal Aid and calling for the RSPCA and the council to be allowed to inspect the University on a monthly basis. The group have a recently taken video of the dogs at Langford. Bristol City Council have been asked to erect a statue within the shadow of the University tower with a plaque protesting against the use of animals at the university.

BROMSGROVE ANIMAL AID

(3c Hanover St., Bromsgrove, Worcs., B61 7JH)

As well as the usual leafletting and fundraising, the group holds public meetings, organises library displays, gives talks to youth centres and schools and hosts vegetarian cookery demonstrations. Coaches were booked taking members to the 'Living Without Cruelty' exhibition and the demo against lab animal suppliers 'Inter-fauna'. Two official street collections have enabled a donation of £650 to be made to CIWF. The group's bi-monthly magazine is sent out to local libraries, newspapers etc. A member of BAA was imprisoned for 24 hours in a mock battery cage in the town centre achieving much publicity, including TV and national press. A mobile phone enabled the 'hen' to do live radio interviews. A 'champagne' party was held outside Faulkes Furriers to celebrate the shop's closure. A youth group has been set up with the help of BAA which is intended to soon become autonomous. A World Day stunt took the form of some rabbits turning the tables and experimenting on a vivisection. The group has its own library of books which are available to non-members and hope to include videos soon.

BROXBOURNE ANIMAL RIGHTS

(PO Box 66, Broxbourne, Herts EN10 6LU)

Continuing to hold street stalls which help raise money that is donated to sympathetic groups. Still very much involved in Stevenage's anti-Glaxo campaign. They are hoping to cover every home in Ware and Hertford with a major leaflet drop. The leaflet, titled "Caught Out, The Truth, Glaxo's Hidden Secrets Exposed" catalogues many incidents of animal abuse allegedly witnessed by an informer. Another leaflet produced by the group was delivered door to door in Broxbourne - it explained what the group stands for, gave a local cruelty-free shoppers guide and urged people to boycott a local hairdresser who stocks only L'Oreal products. The group have voted to merge with the newly formed 'Herts Anti-Vivisection'.

CAMBRIDGESHIRE ANTI-BLOODSPORTS SOCIETY

(Box CABS, c/o Grapevine Bookshop, Unit 6, Dales Brewery, Gwydir St., Cambridge)

Run a stall in Cambridge town centre on most Saturday afternoons, informing public of coming events. A public meeting with a guest speaker is held three or four times a year.

CARDIFF ANIMAL RIGHTS SOCIETY

(c/o The University Union, Park Place, Cardiff)

Beginning a campaign in October against vivisection at Cardiff University. Anyone wishing to be involved is invited to contact the group. The group are also having a stall at the University's Societies Fayre in October.

Carshalton Animal Aid leaflet lab workers entering BIBRA

CARSHALTON ANIMAL AID

Took part in the 'Whistle Blower' campaign, giving cards to lab workers on their way to work, offering cash for information received relating to animal cruelty. The lab they chose was the British Industrial Biological Research Association (BIBRA), Woodmansterne Rd., who carry out over half their work for the government. The group also hold regular stalls, leafletting sessions etc.

CIWF NORTHERN IRELAND

Constantly rescuing and re-homing stray and abandoned animals.

CIWF PETERSFIELD

Have spent many evenings taking the 'Status of Animals' petition door to door and received an excellent response with a refusal rate of only 1%.

CLAPHAM-BATTERSEA ANIMAL RIGHTS

Have just started their first major campaign which is to get Wandsworth Borough Council to ban circuses with performing animals from council land, beginning with door to door leafletting. Planning for an "awareness evening" incorporating local bands, and there has been some leafletting on the subject of "local laboratories' use of animals".

DARTMOOR LIVESTOCK PROTECTION SOCIETY

Because of storms in the area members began Moorland Patrols to investigate the conditions of ponies, sheep and cattle. They have appealed to walkers and riders to report animals in distress to the society so that members can investigate and inform the relevant bodies if necessary.

COVENTRY ANIMAL ALLIANCE

(Box 1, Wedge Bookshop, 13 High St., Coventry, Warwickshire)

Many members of the group took part in a sit-in at the Peter Price fur shop. Unfortunately they were all arrested and taken in for questioning by the police after the owner falsely claimed that they had caused £2,000 worth of damage. He also attacked two of the protesters with a stick. Weekly stalls are held in the city centre which receive a positive public response as did a stall at an alternative fair.

DEVON ANIMAL RIGHTS

(PO Box 79, Exeter, Devon EX2 9AR)

Large crowds were drawn to their street theatre in Exeter's Bedford Square. A wide range of unpleasant, messy mock experiments were performed on people instead of animals. Apart from one six year old thinking they were going to experiment on him, the response was marvellous, with a street poll conducted during the demo finding 100% of those answering being opposed to cosmetic testing on animals.

DEVON CONSERVATION SOCIETY

The main campaign at present is to block proposals for extending the M5 from Exeter to Plymouth. This would have a devastating effect on the wildlife and environment, particularly Dartmoor. They are already liaising with like-minded groups and have urged the Secretary of State for Transport to scrap the scheme.

DORSET ANIMAL AID

There is an ongoing campaign to educate the public through stalls, leaflets, petitions, with current emphasis being on the possible new EEC proposals that all cosmetics must be tested on animals.

DORSET ANIMAL WELFARE GROUP

In association with Bournemouth/Poole Animal Aid a vigorous media and leafletting campaign was launched against the introduction of hormones in cows to increase milk yield, the hormones ending up in the milk. One thousand leaflets were also printed and distributed targetting a local battery egg farm, this action getting local radio coverage. A future campaign is planned in connection with 'mad-cow' disease.

EAST LONDON ANIMAL RIGHTS

(PO Box 216, Forest Gate, London E7 8TB)

Hold regular street stalls and have an ongoing campaign to promote vegetarianism, with many people signing their compassionate diet pledge and showing an interest in their leaflets.

GRAYS ANIMAL RIGHTS

An animal rights conference was held in Pitsea with four workshops on different topics relating to animal rights.

GUERNSEY ANIMAL RIGHTS

A fairly new group who have been holding street stalls and leafletting.

GUILDFORD ANIMAL RIGHTS DEFENDERS

(PO Box 217, Guildford, Surrey)

Took part in the anti-angling day and some of the group planned for going to the sabbing of the grouse shooting on the glorious 12th August. The group are active in all areas of animal rights and have just produced their own leaflet about ICI as well as attending a demonstration against one of their nearby plants when ICI had an 'open day'. One current campaign is lobbying the council for a ban on animal circuses on council land.

FRIENDS OF ANIMALS UNDER ABUSE (FAUNA)

(PO Box 156, Cardiff, CF5 5YD)

There have been numerous demos and pickets against various circuses in Newport and Cardiff and attempts to get Cardiff City Council to ban performing animals are continuing. A very successful fur amnesty was held which resulted in sixteen coats being 'dumped' by the public. A demonstration outside a hall where L'Oreal were holding their colour trophy awards received a positive response. The ongoing campaign urging the public to adopt an animal from their local sanctuary rather than buy one from a pet shop or breeder is going very nicely. FAUNA are always keen to help other groups by attending demos and they recently joined forces with other groups in Wales to form the Welsh Campaign Against Live Exports.

HACKNEY AND ISLINGTON ANIMAL RIGHTS

(Box 17, Sunpower, 198 Blackstock Rd., London N5)

Every Saturday, and sometimes weekdays, members are leafletting, running stalls, picketting or staging exhibitions and the group can boast over one hundred members. Meetings are on the first Monday of the month in the Gillespie Neighbourhood Office, 102 Blackstock Rd., at 7.30pm.

HALIFAX ANIMAL RIGHTS

Set up a special World Day for Laboratory Animals stall in the city centre with leaflets and a petition. Also did the same regarding the new EC proposals that even 'cruelty-free' products will have to be tested on animals.

HARLOW ANIMAL RIGHTS

Talks and slide shows are sometimes arranged at the College's lecture hall and videos ('Hidden Crimes' etc.). Many members of the group are still at school and they always help out at the weekly stall in the town centre on Saturdays. The stall is always crowded with people waiting to sign petitions and take leaflets. A full minibus was taken to the 'Living Without Cruelty' exhibition.

HERNE BAY AND WHITSTABLE ANIMAL RIGHTS

(PO Box 50, Herne Bay, Kent CT6 7PY)

Have been fairly busy recently with the usual street stalls, leafletting and jumble sales. Many letters have been written to and printed by the local papers.

HERTS ANTI-VIVISECTION GROUP

Held their inaugural meeting with a showing of 'Hidden Crimes' which drew an emotional response from the audience. They also plan to stage a half-marathon between the two Glaxo Labs in Ware and Stevenage.

IPSWICH ANIMAL RIGHTS

Produced their own leaflet objecting to the Life Science's premises at Orford being extended and explaining to local people of the danger to themselves of viruses escaping. Took part in the 'Whistle Blower' campaign outside the Life Science lab and have collected many signatures against it and also helped organise a demonstration there.

HERTFORDSHIRE ANIMAL RIGHTS CHARTER CAMPAIGN

(PO Box 66, Broxbourne, Herts EN10 6LU)

HARCC is an umbrella organization whose aim is to persuade initially Herts County Council, then Hertfordshire's Borough/District councils, to adopt as policy the Hertfordshire Animal Charter. The primary aim of the charter is to secure a ban on hunting with hounds on council controlled land. However, if adopting the charter the council is committing itself to banning animal circuses from council land, imposing strict conditions on pet shops/breeding establishments, helping animal groups to spay/neuter feral cats, promising to provide at least one vegetarian meal at all it's premises, and calling on central government to ban vivisection and factory farming. There are to be a series of public meetings preceded by town centre stalls in many towns in Herts. All meetings will be advertised in the local press and frequent press releases will be issued. There will be postcards produced to be sent to Herts County Council as well as petitions, Prize Draws, letter writing campaigns etc.

March to Interfauna - Photo: St. Ives Weekly News

HINCKLEY ANIMAL RIGHTS

Held a "gardening without muck, blood or chemicals" evening and gave a talk to a "Young Methodist Wives" group on vegetarianism. There have been information stalls in the town, library displays, a circus campaign, charity jumble sales and a stall at Hinckley carnival. A link-up with Leicester Animal Concern is planned for a big anti-zoo campaign. Had a 'food without fear' evening at Hinckley library, showing the vegetarian society's new 'Food Without Fear' video and providing vegan food and information about cruelty-free living, and also selling vegetarian and vegan cook books and other merchandise.

HUNTINGDON ANIMAL CONCERN

A very active, well-run local group, continuing their campaign against the notorious Huntingdon Research Centre. A public meeting with speakers from the BUAV and Dr. Hadwen Trust for Humane Research was a great success attracting over 70 people. This was followed by HAC's fete which raised much needed funds for the group. Following an ALF raid at Interfauna (a local firm supplying animals to vivisection labs) when 82 beagle puppies were rescued, HAC quickly organised an all-night vigil outside the firm's premises at Wyton, attended by over 60 people. The following weekend Interfauna were again the target of a demo organised by HAC and this time over 200 people arrived to protest. In May another public meeting was held in Huntingdon, this time in the form of a debate between an RSPCA council member and a former ALF activist, provoking a lively discussion on the best way to achieve animal rights.

ISLE OF MAN BEAUTY WITHOUT CRUELTY

Campaigners acted when the fur trade tried to cash in on a fundraising event by the Rushen Majorettes, a group of local children aged 4-14. The furriers staged a fur fashion show, supposedly in support of the majorettes cause at a local hotel. Letters were sent to the Managing Director of the hotel and to the President of the majorettes, pointing out that most letters of protest against the fur trade are from schoolchildren. A successful demo was held outside the hotel and good media coverage was achieved in local papers and on Radio Manx.

ISLE OF WIGHT ANIMAL PRESERVATION AND ACTION

An interesting and informative news sheet is produced with articles on a variety of topics from pet rescue, export of live animals, hunting and vivisection, to an account of a turkey slaughterhouse. IOWAPAAG have lobbied successfully for the council to ban hare coursing and hunting from its land. Sponsored walks, stalls and letter writing are regular actions carried out by the group.

KENSINGTON ANIMAL AID

Picketed the offices of cosmetic company L'Oreal in Kensington Church St., handing out leaflets to passers-by, telling them how L'Oreal fry mice in suntan oil.

KENT UNIVERSITY STUDENTS FOR ANIMAL RIGHTS

Have forced researchers to admit live animal experiments are being conducted at the university and launched a campaign to halt the breeding of rabbits, rats and mice for use in research into brain disease. Three hundred signatures were collected for a petition in under two hours during a protest outside the campus library.

KETTERING ANIMAL CONCERN

Mounted a picket outside Roberts Brothers Circus urging a boycott and receiving local media coverage. Held a march in a bid to remove 'Blain's', the town's last remaining furrier at Rockingham Rd., carrying coffins and laying a wreath. Local people joined the march and were interviewed in the press. A door to door 'fur amnesty' is planned for this winter, hopefully persuading people to hand over their pelts. Meetings are held every Tuesday at Corn Market Hall, London Rd., 7.30pm, and an illustrated talk is given every third week.

FARELAND ANIMAL AID

(PO Box 38, Carlisle, CA1 3AN)

This is a local group campaigning on all issues of animal rights and they would like more members. Carlisle hunt sabs can also be reached at this address.

LANCASTER ANIMAL RIGHTS

(Students Union Building, Bailrigg, Lancaster University, Lancaster, Lancashire)

A daily vigil was kept for each of the three days of the yearly congress of 'The Institute of Animal Technology' (vivisectors), who were holding their 25th Anniversary Congress at Lancaster University. There was a heavy police presence and much interruption of everyday activities for some of the students. The vivisectors were made to feel most unwelcome. The campaign against Marineland has resulted in the Morecambe dolphinarium closing. During the pickets over 50% of the public were being turned away from the dolphin shows - some performances were even cancelled - having a devastating effect on the company's profits. There were many weekend vigils, some continuing throughout the night. When some wild dolphins appeared at sea just off the edge of the pier, people on the picket were able to direct potential customers of Marineland to watch these wild dolphins instead. A national demonstration organised by the group attracted 700 people on a march to close the place down.

Protesters outside the Marineland Dolphinarium

LEEDS ANIMAL WELFARE

A new group set up to act as a channel of communication between the entire animal rights movement in Leeds. It also runs its own campaigns and provides an information service covering animal rights and environmental issues and publishes a regular free newsletter.

LEICESTER ANIMAL CONCERN

An all night vigil was held outside the university medical science building which is hidden in secrecy. At a recent 'open day' the fourth floor of the building (where the animal experiments are carried out) was not even shown on the maps, nor mentioned, and all entrances to the area were blocked. The group have also carried out a successful publicity stunt in the town centre, arranging for people to swap their old cosmetics for cruelty-free ones, dumping the old ones in a giant shampoo bottle. A stall was also held at this event, drawing attention to World Day for Lab Animals.

Leeds and District ANIMAL FORUM

LEEDS ANIMAL FORUM

(PO Box HH13, Leeds LS8 4TD)

'Project Foxwatch' has been launched - a council hunt ban exists but a by-law is necessary to make it effective. Evidence of coursing, snaring, shooting, terrier-work etc. is being collected for a dossier and information is welcome. This project will be extended nationwide with a view to a national campaign if possible. Please write to above address. 'Project Foxwatch' began as an effort to provide evidence for Leeds City Council's by-law application to the Home Office. It may now be feasible to look upon the dossier as a permanent, ongoing record of wild animal abuse. As well as providing a report for the council, information has been used to promote a petition and to generate public awareness and obtain support from the relevant authorities.

LEICESTER ANIMAL AID

LAA are pleased to report that 'Dominion Furs' has advertised it's 'closing down' sale and 'Frock 'n' Furs' has announced that it's fur section is to cease trading. This leaves one small retail outlet for furs in Leicester (and that is operating secretly from a first floor office). LAA have organised a Living Without Cruelty exhibition, a library exhibition and made a number of local radio appearances.

LINCOLN ANIMAL AID

Organised a protest on the day of action against L'Oreal, asking the public to bring their L'Oreal products and throw them in a big bin which the group provided. Many people took part and some positive press coverage came about.

LIVERPOOL UNIVERSITY ANIMAL ACTION

(c/o Students Union, 2 Bedford St. North, Liverpool L69)

A weekly stall is held in the students union by the group, who have held an anti-McDonalds day, organised video evenings, leafletted against Boots (getting local press coverage), demonstrated against a particularly bad pet shop and also been out hunt sabbing on a regular basis.

LIVING WITHOUT CRUELTY (HASTINGS AND ROTHER)

(PO Box 5, Bexhill, E. Sussex)

The group were in the local paper with a report and photo of their demonstration against the Point-to-Point run by the East Sussex and Romney Marsh hunt. There is a weekly picket outside McDonalds' new building in Bexhill with a big banner, and the group have had an anti-McDonalds leaflet printed. Animal Aid's L'Oreal leaflet was sent to every hairdresser in the Rother district with an accompanying letter asking the hairdressers to boycott L'Oreal and also asking them if they wished to be put on a list of hairdressers not using animal tested cosmetics. In July the group held another of their highly successful Living Without Cruelty exhibitions.

LONDON GREENPEACE

(5 Caledonian Rd., London N1)

Organisers of the World Day of Action Against McDonalds on October 16th (United Nations World Food Day) and "The London Greenpeace Fayre - The Struggle for Change" on October 27th at the Conway Hall in London.

LONDON VEGANS

As well as organising various socials, catering events and book stalls throughout the London area, they also run regular meetings on the last Wednesday of the month at Millman St., Community Rooms, 50 Millman St., WC1. A packed diary of interesting forthcoming events is produced quarterly.

LOWESTOFT AND DISTRICT ANIMAL AID

With help from other local groups a sponsored walk was organised from Diss town centre to Life Science research laboratories at Occold. Money was raised for the Lord Dowding Fund for Humane Research and for Quest For A Test For Cancer. The march was preceded by a speech from a NAVS representative. A leaflet was produced showing the horrors at Life Science and telling local people what they can do to help stop the research and how to become involved in animal rights in general. The leaflet also gave the scientific arguments against vivisection.

MERSEYSIDE ANIMAL RIGHTS CAMPAIGN

A demo was held outside Gandey's circus, the circus being held at Aintree Racecourse due to a ban on council land. Members have been busy giving talks and showing videos in local schools and holding stalls at several local events.

MIDDLESBOROUGH ANIMAL RIGHTS

Local publicity was achieved when a bus driver member of the group collected a 3,000 strong petition against vivisection in a matter of weeks, many of those signing being his bus passengers.

MIDDLESEX ANIMAL RIGHTS

The group have done many street stalls, picketted Robert Brothers' circus in Edgware (which was very short of customers) and have given a talk on local radio about vivisection and attracted new members. Also took part in the Whistle Blower campaign, outside Colindale Public Health Laboratories.

NEW FOREST ANIMAL PROTECTION GROUP

(PO Box 45, Ringwood, Hants BH24 2NL)

Campaigning to end the "digging-out" of foxes by the New Forest Foxhounds. They have their own petition calling on the Forestry Commission to ban the "digging-out" of foxes and the use of terriers by the New Forest Foxhounds. A 30,000+ signature petition was presented to the Ministry of Agriculture after volunteers walked from Lyndhurst on a 100 mile trek to London.

MANCHESTER ANIMAL PROTECTION GROUP

(c/o One World Centre, 13 Paton St., Piccadilly, Manchester)

A 'meat-out' week of action was very successful with members of the group blocking the entrance to Manchester Abattoir, stopping 2 lorries loaded with pigs and sheep from entering for a time. This received some press coverage. A demo outside a new Sainsbury's against factory farming went well as did a debate arranged about BSE which the anti-meat side won easily. This debate was well attended and very informative. Still in the week of action against the meat trade 40-50 people entered McDonalds in the city centre, disrupting service. The police arrived in force and arrested a giant, plastic, talking burger for obstruction. It was later released without charge. The week ended with the world's biggest vegan cake, weighing several hundred pounds, being cut up and sold to members of the public, raising over £100 for Vegfam. There has been a demo and sit-in at 'Jindo Furs'. Also, demos against Gandey's circus, during which members dressed as clowns turned away some members of the public. An Eartha Kitt show in Manchester was picketted because of her outrageous support for the fur trade. A spectacular stunt was carried out to mark World Day for Lab Animals when two members scaled the giant incineration chimney of the university medical school and unfurled a 30 foot banner claiming "Vivisection Stinks". The stunt received national press coverage and there were also live radio interviews with the ground support team. The group also support other campaigns, and have been particularly involved with the Morecambe Dolphin Campaign.

Animal Rights activists scale the heights of the university medical school chimney to highlight the plight of laboratory animals.

MANSFIELD ANIMAL RIGHTS GROUP

(c/o Wild Oats, 31a Church St., Mansfield, Notts) Staged a successful demo/picket outside an Eartha Kitt show at Mansfield Civic Centre. A spokesman for the centre said they had sold over 75% of the tickets and yet the show was less than half full. There has been a picket of the circus and an 'interview' in the local paper on all aspects of animal rights. The group have taken a mini-bus to a number of national events. Also planned is a leafletting campaign in surrounding towns.

NORTHERN IRELAND AGAINST ANIMAL EXPERIMENTS

To mark World Day a demonstration against Queen's University was preceded by a march through Belfast to the university's biology building on the Lisburn Rd.

NORTH STAFFORDSHIRE ANIMAL RIGHTS COLLECTIVE (The Peace Centre, 56 Tontine St., Hanley, Stoke-on-Trent)

The group have been concentrating on the town's fur shops with leafletting and a sit-in and one of the shops has now stopped selling furs (he'd been attacked a few times by the ALF). This leaves only 'Jindo's' still selling fur and the pressure is continuing. A fundraising gig was hosted to raise money. The group also go hunt sabbing.

NORWICH CIWF

Much local publicity was achieved when the delivery of 1,000 'Milked For All She's Worth' leaflets aroused the wrath of the local NFU. A sponsored cycle ride raised a fair amount of money, some of which was sent to CIWF HQ.

NOTTINGHAM ANIMAL RIGHTS

Picketed Boots complex at Thurgarton on World Day, handing leaflets to the staff on their way to work. Also hold regular street stalls.

QUEENS UNIVERSITY ANIMAL RIGHTS (BELFAST)

A demonstration and all-night vigil was held outside the Medical Biology Centre, drawing attention to the heart experiments carried out there on live Greyhounds.

NORWICH ANIMALS CHARTER

(PO Box 30, Norwich, Norfolk NR1 4DT)

Helped organise the march against Life Science Research, many people were sponsored and funds were raised, the police were also sympathetic. The youth group held their own stall in the city centre. An exhibition in the city library drew many letters from the public in response. A cinema where the BUAV's cosmetic advert was being shown was leafletted and the group have arranged with the East Anglia University to show the BUAV's ad for one term at the university cinema. The 'Project Packs' made up by the group for local schools are still going well and talks to various groups continue. Regular stalls and petitions continue to pull in new members and generate publicity. A tour of the university finally happened after a long wait (over a year), the faculty were very open about their work and took the group's concerns seriously, although a request to see the Animal House was refused.

PLYMOUTH ANIMAL CONCERN

Have been in the local papers exposing the animal experiments at Exeter University after one Professor denied any vivisection was carried out there. Joined forces with Plymouth Animal Aid in a protest against the Polytechnic South West. They are lobbying doctors in Devon and Cornwall to see if they will join the recently formed 'Doctors in Britain Against Animal Experiments'.

RIVER COLLI ACTION GROUP

Hope to buy 120 acres of forest in West Wales to save a threatened colony of otters. The animals, living in tributaries of the river in Dyfed, face a fight for survival because of damage from acid rain. Trees were planted in the area a year ago, destroying rare bogland underneath. The plan is to raise over £100,000 to buy the land, remove the trees and return the area to a natural wetland site.

ROSS ANIMAL RIGHTS

Regularly demonstrate outside Perrycroft Lodge (most Sundays) and support most nearby events. Had a successful jumble sale raising over £200 for the Marine Conservation Society. A sponsored walk is also planned.

ROWLEY ANIMAL RIGHTS GROUP

Meet on the first Tuesday of every month at 7.30pm in the youth club by the Brickhouse pub, on the Brickhouse Farm Estate, Rowley Regis. All new faces are welcome.

ST. ALBANS ANIMAL RIGHTS

A "Bring Out Your Dead" fur coat collection was organised by the group, as was a CIWF library exhibition, both events drawing support from the public and achieving local publicity. The long running campaign against the London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine Field Station at Wynces Farm will soon be over. The vivisectioners are selling the land for redevelopment and moving to their London base (so they say). A special service for animals on St. Francis Day was a great success with people remembering not only cuddly pets but also the unloved animals in laboratories.

SALISBURY ANIMAL CONCERN

Protesters staged a vigil outside the gates of the Porton Down research base - there were plenty of banners and there was much shouting. They reinforced their point by performing a mock chemical weapons experiment on a dummy animal. Herbs were planted on the verge as an act of remembrance.

SHEFFIELD CAMPAIGN FOR ANIMAL RIGHTS

(PO Box 407, Sheffield, S. Yorks S1 1ED)

Took over 70 names one Saturday afternoon of youngsters wishing to join a youth group which they propose to start. Protested outside city dept. stores on L'Oreal day, asking them not to stock L'Oreal products - one of the demonstrators was dressed as a mouse. A demonstration outside a restaurant selling frogs legs was a great success after the owner agreed to stop selling them. This was reported on local radio and in local papers. An all-day show with a gig in the evening to raise funds was organised. There have been circus pickets, with attendance at the circus being low, and they also had a demo outside the Town Hall where tickets for the circus were being sold.

SOUTH HAMS ENVIRONMENT SERVICE

Produced the first green directory in SW England, bringing together information on the environment, from wildlife to recycling, listing the relevant organizations. It also lists over 70 voluntary groups such as the Devon Bat Group and Devon Wildlife Trust. It is aimed primarily at local people and hopefully it will enable them to channel concern into practical action. In loose-leaf form it can be updated with additional pages. It has been sent to schools, libraries etc.

STEVENAGE ANIMAL RIGHTS

(Box 6, Bowes Lyon House, St. Georges Way, Stevenage, Herts)

One of the most active local groups, SAR have continued to keep the pressure on Glaxo's proposed new lab. As well as holding regular meetings and information stalls in the town centre, the group have, with Broxbourne Animal Rights, produced a new anti-Glaxo leaflet, based on information leaked from Glaxo staff at the company's notorious Ware site. An extremely successful information stall at the local 'Stevenage Day' celebration was more than a little ironic as the event was sponsored by Glaxo to the tune of £5,000. In response the group displayed photos of animal experiments and a huge cheque with the words "Pay to the people of Stevenage £5,000 to allow the torture and killing of animals" and signed "Glaxo Public Deception Dept". In addition to the Glaxo campaign, SAR have been instrumental in the setting up of the Hertfordshire Animal Rights Charter Campaign.

SUSSEX UNIVERSITY ANIMAL RIGHTS

Protestors distributing leaflets outside the animal experimental dept. at the university caused a bit of a stir. When the Mayor of Brighton heard the horrific details of some of the experiments being performed, he wrote to the Vice Chancellor asking for a full investigation into two of the experiments. It also came to light that one of the researchers working at the university had been there for over a year without the Home Office Licence required by law.

SWALE ANIMAL RIGHTS GROUP

A new group who launched themselves onto the scene with an animal rights exhibition in their area. All the national societies were invited to have a stall free of charge, which many of them accepted (RSPCA, LACS, CIWF, Animal Aid etc.) This was a good idea for the beginning of a new group and over 60 people joined on the first day, with a steady stream of new people joining since. The publicity before the event was widespread, with a poster advertising the stalls, vegetarian food, videos and information, being produced by the group. The group aim to educate the public in their area with a number of planned events.

SWANSEA ANIMAL RIGHTS

(PO Box 53, Swansea SA1 1BN)

Helped to raise £20,000 for Glamorgan Badger Group to buy a plot of land containing setts which was due to be built on. The land has been purchased and will be run as a small nature reserve. Quite a few stalls have been held and there has been a sponsored walk for lab animals. A news sheet is produced with a comprehensive fixture list and the group have also got their own membership leaflet.

SWINDON ANIMAL RIGHTS GROUP

(PO Box 134, Swindon SN2 3AF)

Carry out regular street stalls and have a yearly street collection. The group hold their own demos and also take part in projects in conjunction with other groups' campaigns. They also leaflet occasionally and help raise money for worthy causes.

WEST WALES ANIMAL AID

(PO Box 2, Llandysul, Dyfed SA44 4EB)

Are conducting a 'Ban Live Exports' campaign as Welsh lamb is increasingly popular in Spain and any current restrictions will be lifted in 1992. Information sheets and petitions are available from the above address.

WINCHESTER ANIMAL CONCERN

Had a deputation to the council regarding 'Cottage Patch Kennels' (which has been known to supply dogs for vivisection). WAC have further evidence about the appalling conditions there and the sale of sick puppies. Stalls in the town centre attract great public support, especially on occasions such as World Day and anti-L'Oreal day. Coffee mornings are a regular source of income for animal rights work. The press are closely monitoring the group's meetings with the council regarding Cottage Patch and many letters sent by members get in the local papers.

WIRRAL ANIMAL RIGHTS

WAR hold regular street stalls in and around their area, as well as showing AR videos, raising money from bric-a-brac sales etc. There was a sponsored dog walk for Greek Animal Welfare. Letters are always being written to various relevant bodies and homes are often found for stray and unwanted pets.

WORCESTER ANIMAL RIGHTS GROUP

Have organised a national march through Malvern to Perrycroft kennels in Colwall in memory of the 79 beagles which suffocated en route from Perrycroft to a Swedish vivisection lab. Over £60 was collected at a street collection in connection with the group's campaign against battery units.

YEOVIL PEOPLE AGAINST VIVISECTION

Much local publicity was achieved in connection with the group's anti-L'Oreal day activities. Members entered the Boots store in Yeovil and disrupted shopping next to the L'Oreal cosmetic section in the store. They handed out leaflets and displayed placards, leaving after discussions with the police.

YORK UNIVERSITY ANIMAL RIGHTS GROUP

(Students Union, Pigeonhole G, Goddricke College, Heslington, York YO1 5DD)

Handed in a petition signed by over 1,600 of the university's students against the animal experiments being performed there. The petition was received by the Vice Chancellor. A large demo with a huge banner was held outside the university's main gates, calling for an independent ethical committee to debate vivisection. Much press coverage.

ANIMAL RIGHTS PLAY

Poor Dumb Animals - a light-hearted entertainment about hard-hearted treatment of animals. What happens to a man who tries to turn himself into a duck? What happens on a fox hunt? What did Pavlov's dog want to do? Do monkeys enjoy having their eyes sewn shut? What revenge did the hippopotamus (female) take on the scientist (male)? Easy, vulgar and outrageous answers are supplied in twelve sketches. Bring along your hard-hearted friends to learn hard truths. Lost Theatre, 450 Fulham Road (at Fulham Broadway), November 12th-24th (except Sunday), 7.30pm. Box office opens 7pm. Tel. 071 381 6151.

HUNT SABOTEURS

On a brighter note, the South Dorset's neighbours, the New Forest Foxhunt, have lost one of their most prestigious meets, at Rhinefield House, Brockenhurst. Richard Branson, who owns the hotel, has declared it a hunt-free zone (and we thought his Clean-Up-Britain campaign was against litter....)

With the unfortunate incident at the South Dorset finishing an otherwise excellent season, HSA groups all over the country grabbed a brief rest before the summer's work began in earnest. Many people imagine that just because fox-, hare- and stag-hunting end in March or April, sab groups have a holiday - the truth is quite the opposite. Landrovers and transits have to be serviced, funds raised, new sabs recruited, country fairs attended, information gathered - all in preparation for the autumn offensive.

And for the real die-hards there's minkhunting. Minkhunting was born when the otter became a protected species and otterhunting became illegal. Unfortunately, the otter hunters weren't so easily put off and just decided to kill something else instead.

At the end of March the British people were shocked by scenes of horrific violence. Our democratic traditions were rocked, our finer sensibilities battered, by such clear disregard for the rule of law. No, I'm not referring to the poll tax demo: I'm talking about an event at the South Dorset Foxhunt. After almost every other hunt in the country had packed up for the end of the season, the South Dorset were still out looking for foxes to kill - and Bournemouth HSA were still out stopping them. Obviously inspired by the poll tax riot coverage (or maybe it was the full moon) a large group of hunt supporters took it upon themselves to turn over a sab's car - with five sabs in it! Damage has come to £750 (not covered by the insurance) and any donations will be gratefully received. (Cheques to be made payable to Bournemouth HSA and sent c/o the HSA PO Box.) Amazingly, no one was seriously injured.

There are about twenty registered minkhunts in the UK (compared to roughly 200 foxhunts) and they are extremely secretive. Any known mink-hunt meet can expect to see up to a hundred sabs: hardly surprising that they don't advertise. This summer the unlucky Northamptonshire Mink Hunt have seen sabs most. On one notable occasion eighty sabs, fifteen hunt and ten police walked two miles along a river bank, and called it a day - them, not us. Other days have been spent playing Starsky and Hutch (who?) round the countryside while they attempted to lose us. Minkhunt sabbing is often less spectacular than 'traditional' sabotage, but if their hounds are in the back of a van doing a guided tour of Northamptonshire, they're not killing.

The Ytene Mink Hunt are another pack who have seen sabs this summer. Only seventeen sabs made it to a 6.30 am meet in Dorset, but the Old Bill were a bit keener - about thirty officers with numerous vehicles, including a radio car used to jam sabs' CBs. Fifteen die-hard supporters were also there, but three hours hunting proved fruitless and they packed up at 9.30 am. By the time we'd checked that they really had packed up, the pubs were almost open, so a good time was had by all, not least the mink. (Special thanks to Wolves sabs for their all-night journey!)

Elsewhere the Kent and Sussex Mink Hunt have given up Saturday hunting due to the certainty of visits from their local sab groups, and other hunts have dug themselves further underground in efforts to avoid sabs. This can lead to "blank days" for the HSA - but it also reduces the intake of new supporters, the lifeblood of any hunt.

Even as you read this, the HSA will have been tackling grouse shoots and the first cubhunts of the season - and, as always, we'll be needing your support:

As mentioned in Arkangel 2, American Hunt Saboteurs have been active against that Great American Pastime - shooting. Sadly, they failed to stop the invasion of Panama, but they have had more success against two slightly smaller targets.

The first of these was the 1989 Tule Elk Hunt. For this hunt, fifteen licenses to shoot the normally protected Tule Elk are auctioned off - giving a new meaning to the phrase 'blood money'. This money (say the auctioneers, the Department of Fish and Game), will be used to help protect the species. The irony, unfortunately, seems lost on them.

Last year twenty five saboteurs disrupted the hunt, tracking the hunters and sounding air horns as they were about to fire - thus frightening off the elk. Meanwhile wardens from the DFG and contingents of police tracked the sabs. One cunning ploy used by the Old Bill was to dress up in camouflage gear and pretend to be hunters, in the hope that sabs would spring into action and breach California's "hunter harassment" laws. This tactic wasn't altogether successful though, because the decoy hunters tried so hard to attract sabs' attention by constant firing that it was clear they weren't really hunters. By the end of the fortnight-long hunt, only one saboteur had been arrested.

More importantly, hunters had only managed to kill five elk, instead of the expected fifteen. Massive press coverage resulted, usually ranting quotes from frustrated hunters - and promises of even bigger and better sabotage next time.

The other big event tackled was the Nelson Big-horn Sheep Hunt. This operates on similar principles (or lack of them) as the Tule Elk Hunt, except that one of the hunters buys a two week headstart on the others ($40,000 in 1989) while the others pay $200 each for eight more licenses won by lottery. Harassed by police, saboteurs were unable to prevent all nine sheep from being killed. Whether anyone will want to pay $40,000 again, to be chased across the Mojave desert by sabs, remains to be seen...

The HSA exists to take non-violent direct action against all bloodsports ranging from illegal ones such as dog-fighting to supposedly prestigious ones like foxhunting and staghunting. The HSA's strength lies in its network of local groups - over 1,000 saboteurs are active every Saturday, and often mid-week as well. Both local groups and the national HSA are always in need of support, financial, moral, active or whatever.

ANIMAL LIBERATION FRONT

AVON

In March, in Midsomer Norton, a lump of stone was hurled through two large windows of 'Lakes' butchers. Damage was estimated at £1,000. Mr. Lake said "The more you say about these people, the worse it is. You can't beat them. The insurance people pick up the bills and it comes through in increased premiums".

CAMBRIDGESHIRE

Breeding pens at Interfauna in Huntingdon were raided in April. 82 beagles and 26 rabbits were rescued. The value of the animals was estimated at £29,000. Annually the Interfauna groups produce 2,800 dogs, 80,000 guinea pigs, 17,000 rabbits, 300,000 rats and 600,000 mice for vivisection. They have established production centres in France, Germany and Spain.

CUMBRIA

Several butchers windows were catapulted in Barrow on Maunday Thursday, one of the busiest days in the butchers calendar. Also in Barrow, in June, the Cumbria ALF (CALF) smashed the windscreen of a van owned by convicted badger baiter Shaun Hornby. "Murderer" and "CALF" were daubed on the van.

DERBYSHIRE

In Glossop a shop selling snares and traps and a butchers shop both had their windows smashed on the same night in March.

DORSET

A suspect device was blown up in a controlled explosion at a Thames Valley Egg lorry park. Two refrigerated lorries were also sprayed in green and blue paint with "Animal Abusers Beware". Both incidents occurred in Weymouth.

One of the wildcats being released in Scotland

DEVON

In May two Scottish wildcats incarcerated in Paignton zoo were rescued. This action was co-ordinated with a similar raid in Essex where two Scottish wildcats were rescued from Colchester zoo. After being checked by a vet all four cats were driven to a suitable location in Scotland and released into the wild.

ESSEX

Two Scottish wildcats, Angus and Morag, were rescued from Colchester zoo in May. The cats were the zoo's breeding pair and had first been brought down from the wildlife park in Mole Hill, Saffron Walden. Along with the two cats rescued from Paignton zoo in Devon, Angus and Morag were driven to Scotland and released into a suitable location in the wild.

HAMPSHIRE

McDonalds restaurants in Fareham and Portsmouth and a Burger King in Southampton came under fire attack during April and May. In early May a meat wholesaler in Fareham came under attack with lorries and buildings being daubed with paint, graffiti and paintstripper and the lorries also had their petrol tanks filled with gravel. In June, in Petersfield, £50,000 worth of damage was caused to a 'F' registration cattle truck at Rowlands cattle farm when it was set on fire. Slogans were sprayed on the farm. A week later the owner was told to stop supplying cattle for research to Wellcome Labs., at Beckenham in Kent, or retribution would follow. Incendiary devices were attached to two vans at the Russell Hume meat company in Southampton. One of the vans was extensively damaged. In Portsmouth a vehicle was set on fire with an incendiary device. It belonged to a firm which supplies machinery to the meat trade.

HERTFORDSHIRE

Windows of three butchers shops were etched, along with a McDonalds, in Waltham Cross. One window was smashed and the butcher hasn't opened since. Hairdressers stocking L'Oreal products have had their shop windows attacked and a butchers window was attacked with acid. Activists whose actions have included burning a poultry farm, firebombing a furriers shop and paintstripping a butchers van, threatened an intense campaign of economic sabotage. In St. Albans, in June, two guinea-pigs and three rabbits were taken from a hospital for the mentally and physically handicapped.

KENT

Activists raided a battery unit at Mead Farm in Edinbridge in April, the third time that this farm has been visited by the ALF. Sixty four hens were rescued and have gone to good homes. In a stencilled statement the ALF gave details of the hens' conditions and the fact that many of them were in need of veterinary attention. Vehicles and machinery were covered in paintstripper, etching fluid was poured over windows, tyres were slashed and pipes were cut. In Whitstable windows of a butchers shop were smashed and a few days later windows of a butchers shop were etched. The house of Ed Reid was covered with paint in May. Ed Reid had appeared on TV talking about dog fighting, he wrote 'Canine Gladiators' and narrates dog-fighting videos. Also in May several village butchers near Maidstone had windows shot out.

LANCASHIRE

In Preston in May the windscreen wipers were pulled off a car displaying a BFSS sticker and a Kentucky Fried Chicken restaurant had its window smashed.

LIVERPOOL

An arson attack at Aintree in April destroyed the Lord Derby Stand which was being renovated after the Grand National at Aintree Racecourse. The grandstand was also damaged. A statement from the ALF said that the action was an act of retribution for the horses killed during the Grand National and it follows a number of similar actions at Aintree. In May a pony belonging to a rag-and-bone man was rescued to "end its life of drudgery". Activists scaled a barbed wire fence and cut a chain to release the pony which is now being "well cared for". Also in May, thousands of pounds worth of damage was caused when activists poured paint-stripper over the cars on the forecourt at Georgesons car dealers in Breck Road. The head of the family business, Peter Georgeson, rides with the Holcombe Hunt and is a former master. In a three page stencilled statement the activists said "We can either accept that the blood junkies of the hunting world be allowed to continue or we can take a moral stand and defend the foxes, hares etc. involved by hitting the tally-ho brigade from all angles". In June the ALF rescued a dog from a cruel home and "cancelled" stickers were pasted over posters advertising Gandy's circus.

LONDON

Many butchers and a fishmongers had their windows sprayed with acid and had their locks superglued and slogans painted over the premises. Some of the butchers said that they'd had to spend hundreds of pounds repairing the damage.

GREATER MANCHESTER

Butchers had a hard time in March and April with many windows being smashed in Bury, Heywood, Bolton, Prestwich, Farnworth and Rochdale. In response to seven horses dying at Aintree, two windows of Ladbroke's the bookmakers in Bolton were smashed and a satellite dish belonging to Ladbroke's in Farnworth was smashed. Four refrigerator vans in Rochdale had windows damaged, tyres slashed and wires cut. The vans belonged to Entwistle Bacon Co. and damage was estimated at £1,000. In Whitefield vehicles belonging to meat wholesalers Danish Bacon Independent were damaged. Damage was caused to windscreens, tyres and locks but a spokesman for the company 'played down' the incident and it wasn't reported to the police. The windows were etched of a car in Stretford belonging to Arthur Openshaw, a member of Holcombe Harriers. Openshaw has previously broken a hunt saboteur's nose and attacked another in a racist frenzy. In May, an angling shop in Little Lever, near Bolton, had locks glued and messages painted on windows saying "Fish don't scream when you murder them" and "ALF". The following month, also in Little Lever, "Murderer" and "ALF" were painted on a butchers window in black and green paint. The owners refused to comment in case of further reprisals. Also in June, a puppy was rescued from the back garden of callous owners in Manchester and three butchers around Manchester had their windows etched. A BFSS member in Stretford had brake fluid poured over his car and in Bolton showjumping fences at a Holcombe Hunt one-day event were pulled down and sawn up the night before. £15,000 worth of damage was caused to an abattoir in Royton, Oldham. A wire fence was cut to gain access to three refrigerated container lorries which were doused in paintstripper. Sump oil was used to 'spike' fuel tanks, though the press reported it as "acid". Mirrors, windscreens and headlights were smashed and tyres were slashed. Superglue was poured into locks.

NORFOLK

In April in Colby, near Aylsham, farmer Peter van Poortvliet decided to give up his snail business after an estimated £70,000 damage was caused by fire at his breeding unit. Before setting light to the building, the 12,000 snails were removed and taken to freedom. In Thetford in May, £200,000 worth of damage was caused when broiler sheds were burnt down. In June seven reptiles were taken from "Pets Pantry" in Norwich, including an 8 ft python.

NORTHUMBERLAND

Activists claimed that they had injected a toxic substance in an ox that had been roasted for the Alnwick Round Table outdoor meal.

SOMERSET

A goat which had been kept in a kennel and never allowed out was rescued in Yeovil in March and is now in a good home.

After county councillors failed to ban hunting on council land, following a 10,000 signature petition being delivered (some councillors were reported as complaining that they were sick and tired of the issue which had already been discussed), activists issued the following statement "Any landowners allowing the Surrey Union Foxhunt on their land will be a target for ALF activists. Farm machinery, buildings, vehicles and pheasant pens will be attacked causing maximum damage and loss of profit". In early May a horse jump at Pepper Harrow was burnt down causing £150 damage. On June 8th an ALF group broke into the Institute of Cancer Research at the Royal Marsden hospital in Sutton. They took a large quantity of documents relating to the experiments being carried out there on animals.

SUSSEX

Early in April two gun shops in East Grinstead had their windows etched. In a press release the group said that it had "carried out the attack against the shops because they were members of the British Field Sports Society". A few days later gun shops in Heathfield and East Grinstead had windows daubed. In a press release issued by the ALF it was stated that the ALF would also attack breweries which allow hunts to meet at their pubs and hotels. In Hastings a fake device at the meat counter of Safeways supermarket resulted in the store being closed while the army carried out a controlled explosion. In Bexhill-on-Sea two toughened plate glass windows were smashed with bricks at McDonalds drive-in at Glyne Gap. Damage was estimated at £500. Culverwells car dealers found they'd let themselves in for more than they'd bargained for when they paid to have the company listed in blood sports publications. £20,000 worth of damage was caused when etching fluid was poured over nine of their vehicles and 21 show windows. Tyres were punctured and "This firm funds blood sports - ALF" was spray painted on walls.

153,000 snails (3,000 adults and 150,000 youngsters) were rescued from the Organic Delicatessen International unit in Hebburn in March and were released onto the banks of the river Tyne. "Meat is Murder" and "Animal Liberation Front" slogans were sprayed on the unit walls. A police spokesman said that the value of the snails could run into thousands of pounds.

YORKSHIRE

In Sheffield activists smashed four large plate glass windows at Talbots Freezer Centre as part of a campaign against the meat trade. A £600 display window at the House of Fraser store was smashed and fishing tackle shops and gun shops had locks and shutters superglued and windows smashed. A statement to the media read "The campaign will continue for the foreseeable future". Seven butchers shop windows were smashed during a week-long campaign against butchers in Harrogate in March. In Huddersfield thousands of pounds worth of damage was caused using etching fluid and airguns. Fifteen butchers shop windows and four Kentucky Fried Chicken restaurant windows were smashed and nine other windows were etched, including those of Boots the Chemist and two Wimpy cafes. "Mad Cow" was written on the window of a Dewhurst butchers shop. In May, in Sheffield, posters advertising the Hungarian State Circus were damaged, the Burger King restaurant had two plate glass windows smashed, locks glued and slogans daubed and F. Funk butcher had windows smashed with bricks. Locks belonging to Imperial Cancer Research Fund and British Heart Foundation shops were superglued in June. Also in June, in Hull, the office was burnt out and two delivery vans were totally destroyed by fire at Hedon Poultry, in two separate attacks. Alan's Butchers in Dewsbury was closed in June after the discovery of a package behind the door. An army bomb disposal robot blew up the package, which contained paper. In Bradford eight butchers windows and a Kentucky window were smashed. In June vehicles belonging to 5 butchers and one sea food company in Harrogate were heavily damaged. Two gun butts on the moors were destroyed. Dozens of vehicles displaying BASC and BFSS stickers had their tyres slashed. A fish-monger's van was paintstripped and had its tyres slashed. Three trucks on a poultry farm got the same treatment. Also in June, in Harrogate, a gun/hunting/fishing shop and five butchers shops had their windows etched and a butchers van and a taxidermist's van had their tyres slashed and "Scum" spray painted on the sides.

SCOTLAND

In Edinburgh in May £25,000 worth of damage was caused to the Bonne Chance leather shop when it was set on fire.

NORTHERN IRELAND

In Belfast and Hollywood, Co. Down, fur shops were sprayed with red paint, windows were smashed and glue was put in the locks. One of the shops, Fur Seasons, has since closed down. Butchers shops had windows broken in Belfast and Hollywood and a gun shop had its locks glued. In Antrim posters and billboards advertising the annual Game and Country Fair were torn down and cancellation notices were pasted over others. Advertisements were sent to the local press stating that the fair had been cancelled. Paint was poured over the cars belonging to the organisers of the lurcher and terrier events. Mr. Titterington, one of the organisers said "I am a biologist and as such completely against cruelty to animals, but I also enjoy shooting and recognise that this involves the killing of animals". In April L'Oreal products were removed from the shelves of 29 stores in Lisburn and Belfast after notes were found attached to them from the ALF, following a telephone call from activists. In May the windows of a butchers shop in Newtownards, in Co. Down, were smashed and in Belfast a gun shop was sprayed with paint and had its locks superglued. A fur shop was attacked when slogans were sprayed and the marble walls were smashed with a hammer. In Co. Antrim the hare-coursing club was attacked for the fifth time. Property of the club was destroyed by fire and fencing was knocked down.

WALES

In Wrexham, North Wales, in April, several shops advertising the Hungarian State Circus had their windows broken. In June a milk bottle containing inflammable liquid caused fire damage at a chicken processing plant in Park Rd., Ruabon, near Wrexham. In South Wales a "Boots Mutilate Beagles" slogan was daubed in red paint on the wall of Boots in Newport. A butcher's shop window was smashed with a brick and a rabbit and bird shooters car had superglue squirted in locks. Thirty six battery hens were rescued from Mr. Welshegg farm in Caerphilly. Slogans were daubed in red paint on the walls of a meat supplier in Cardiff. Butchers' shops were sprayed and glued in Newport and a meat processing plant was daubed with red paint on several occasions.

FRANCE

A raid was carried out at the Salvatore Hospital in Marseille while the staff were watching a football match. Thirty dogs and twenty three rabbits were rescued. The activists said that the animals had been kept in deplorable conditions.

POLAND

Activists rescued ten rats and a tortoise from a laboratory. In Gdansk in June the locks of some fur shops were destroyed. In Pita some anglers equipment was destroyed and fish were released back into the water. In Bytom a butchers' shop had its screen and lock broken and slogans were daubed over the premises.

SOUTH AFRICA

Manock Furs shop in Durban was damaged in an arson attack. This followed an earlier action when the same shop was covered in red paint. The owner offered a reward in return for information leading to catching the activists responsible.

SWEDEN

Three Djurensbefrielsefront (ALF) groups have carried out a number of actions including 'painting' foxes and mink at fur farms with red henna to make the fur useless for the fur trade and other actions have included pulling down, and sawing up, hunting platforms. Fur shops have received visits and animals have been rescued.

USA

In California a fur shop was closed after substantial damage was caused to it in an arson attack. Butchers shops and a Kentucky Fried Chicken outlet had windows smashed and "ALF" slogans sprayed. Thirty three turkeys were rescued from Swanson turkey factory farm, slogans were sprayed and equipment was damaged.

The ALF carries out direct action against animal abuse, rescuing animals and causing financial loss, usually through the damage and destruction of property, to animal abusers. ALF actions are illegal and therefore activists work anonymously, either individually or in groups, and do not have any centralised organization or address.

OTHER DIRECT ACTION GROUPS

The Suzuki Santana jeep belonging to Porton Down veterinary officer Margaret Baskerville was blasted with explosives and burst into flames as she began to reverse it out of the drive at her home in Winterslow, near Salisbury in Wiltshire, on 8th June. Baskerville escaped by diving out of the window of the vehicle. Her hair was singed and her anorak was burnt. Her work involves giving clinical advice on the diseases contracted by animals in germ warfare experiments at Porton Down.

Bristol University vivisector Patrick Headley was a target when, a few days after the Salisbury action, a similar device exploded under his Volkswagen Golf car, wrecking the vehicle. Headley, who was driving the car at the time, escaped with a cut nose but a young child nearby was unfortunately injured by shrapnel. Much of Headley's work is on the conscious reactions of sheep.

Sea Shepherd have launched two major expeditions this year. On June 1st they began their drift net expedition to the North Pacific to intercept the Japanese, Taiwanese and Korean drift net boats. Thousands of animals including porpoises, seals and whales are routinely killed as "incidental" victims of the fishing fleets. Sea Shepherd 2 was off again in July to Siberia to publicize the illegal whaling activity. Sea Shepherd have also planned to return to the Pacific this year to confront the tuna boats that are drowning dolphins. Sea Shepherd are trying to raise funds for a new, faster, ship.

INTERNATIONAL NEWS

ISRAEL

The anti-vivisection society, Animal Liberation, started a Cruelty Free campaign with a demonstration in Tel Aviv. The reaction of shoppers was very encouraging and in a few hours 500 signatures were collected for a petition calling for an end to cosmetics tests on animals. Many new members were gained and generous donations received.

Animal Liberation (Israel) open their cruelty-free campaign with a demo in Tel-Aviv

POLAND

There are now two new animal rights groups in Poland as well as three specifically vegetarian groups. The Animal Liberation Movement, which started in January, has published two hundred copies of its newsletter despite a massive rise in printing costs in the country, but is in urgent need of donations because of this. The ALM, a federation of local groups opposed to all forms of animal persecution, has organised demonstrations against zoos, animal circuses and meat shops, as well as publishing several booklets about vegetarianism and animal rights and is now preparing to campaign in schools and universities. Representatives of Polish animal welfare groups (as well as those from the USSR, Czechoslovakia and Estonia) carried out a two week tour of animal protection facilities in Britain this spring. The force-feeding of geese for pate de foie gras has been prohibited in two areas of Poland.

ANIMAL NETWORKING

SOUTH AFRICA

A new group, Animal Networking, has the promotion of holistic healing for animals as one of its main aims and publishes a bi-monthly newsletter. The Dolphin Action and Protection Group is campaigning against the pollution of the sea and damage caused to wildlife by discarded plastic items, and the Animal Rehabilitation Centre cares for and rehabilitates injured and orphaned wild animals. To mark World Day for Laboratory Animals several animal welfare groups handed in a petition to the South African parliament calling for the abolition of vivisection. In July the government gave a reprieve to 30,000 seals which were about to be killed by a Taiwanese consortium. Protests had been staged outside government offices and activists were preparing to take to sea in dinghies to confront the hunters and to paint the seals' skins green.

(Animal Networking, PO Box 1552, Honeydew, 2040, S. Africa)

SPAIN

In Catalonia, Alternativa Verda (the Green Party) has asked the Mayor of Figueres to stop all bullfighting in that city following the purchase of the arena by the council, and they are also campaigning against vivisection. The Mayor of Tossa de Mar has received over 4,000 letters of support after declaring the Costa Brava resort the first anti-bullfighting city in Spain. Because of the support he set up Spain's first international conference on the defence of animals, which was held in May and attended by people from all over Europe. In order to help the Catalan Green Party, Alternativa Verda, in their campaign to stop all bullfighting in their city, and for the arena that the council have purchased to be used for cultural and other purposes, they are urging animal rights groups and individuals to send letters to the Mayor of Figueres: Ayuntamiento de Figueres, At. Mr Maria Lorca, Alcalde, 17600 - Figueres (Girona) Spain, and also to local newspapers: Punt Diari - At. Xavi Xirgo - Figuerola, 28 Baixos, 17001 Girona, Spain, and also: Diari de Girona - Ctra. Barcelona, 29 - 17001, Girona, Spain. Please also send copies of all letters to the Manchester Animal Protection Group, One World Centre, 13 Paton Street, Manchester 1. They are forwarding copies of all letters to Madame Pilar Taberner of the Catalan Green Party.

YEŞİLLER PARTİSİ

TURKEY

The Izmir Yesiller Partisi (Green Party) organised a camp near Gokova in July as part of protests against the construction of a coal-powered plant which will threaten the Aegean coast with poisonous gases, causing acid rain and the pollution of the ecosystem. The party are also campaigning against the draining of Turkish wetlands for agriculture, which is threatening wildlife, including the rare crested pelican.

SWEDEN

A society similar to the League Against Cruel Sports has been set up to combat hunting and in April anti-vivisectionists held a demonstration at the country's largest breeding farm for laboratory dogs. The demo was organised by the Djurens Befrielse Front, which has also rescued many animals from cruel experiments. Over twenty demonstrators attended the demonstration at the farm, which is jointly owned by Astra, Leo and Kabi-Vitrum pharmaceutical companies.

SANCTUARIES

THE ANIMALS' SANCTUARY

(High Rigg House Farm, St. John's Chapel, Bishop Auckland, Co. Durham, DL13 1QT)

Takes in and cares for farm animals destined for exploitation and slaughter and provides a refuge for them, together with wild birds and others. The sanctuary is wholly dependent upon donations, the sale of its own products and articles being sent which can then be used or sold. Various buildings on the sanctuary site now need renovation.

THE DOGS HOME BATTERSEA

BATTERSEA DOGS HOME

(4 Battersea Park Rd., London, SW8 4AA Tel 071 622 3626)

Probably the best known organization for taking in abandoned dogs (and, to a lesser extent, cats). The Home was formed in 1860 and in 130 years over 2½ million dogs have been taken in. Only 15% (and decreasing) of owners bother to reclaim their dogs, resulting in an increasing burden on the Home. It is now appealing for help to build a modern kennel block at Battersea, the building of which commenced in 1989. This will provide an additional 250 modern and functional kennels. The Home has a veterinary clinic in operation and also runs kennels near Windsor. There are numerous schemes for supporters.

Bransby Home of Rest for Horses

BRANSBY HOME OF REST FOR HORSES

(Bransby, Saxilby, Lincoln, LN1 2PH Tel 0427 788464)

Formed in 1968 and rescues and homes horses, ponies and donkeys and is open to visitors. It also acts as a pound for straying animals and collects those found wandering on public roads. At the present time it cares for over 120 rescued horses, ponies and donkeys and a further 50 have been placed with private families. In 1986 it completed the building of a stable block for rescued donkeys and in 1988 it had purchased a further 20 acres of land with a large building to continue and extend its work. The Home is a registered charity and is kept going entirely by public donations. It runs various activities to raise funds (eg. adoption, Gala Days etc.) and excellent newsletters and literature are available.

CAT CONCERN

(11 Sunderland Way, Wanstead, London, E12 5HR Tel 081 530 7632, 0708 28851, 081 470 3086)

Cat Concern is a registered charity and rescues abandoned cats, attends road traffic accidents and traps/spays/doctors feral cats. Its work is not limited to cats, but any animal in distress and covers East London and Essex. It is run by volunteers who seek to find new homes for the animals and these are checked first. It carries out fund-raising activities that include jumble/car boot sales, sponsored walks and street collections.

CAT AND RABBIT RESCUE CENTRE

(Holborrow Lodge, Chalder Lane, Sidlesham, West Sussex)

Takes in and cares for cats and rabbits. Cats are neutered before they are rehomed. Rabbits are not usually rehomed as the Centre provides the freedom that would usually be unavailable in private homes. In February 1990 it was caring for 150 cats and 70 of these were too ill or nervous to be rehomed.

COTTAGE SANCTUARY

(Buckland Hollow, Ambergate, Derbyshire, DE5 2HS)

Began in 1976 and provides homes for most types of animals (dogs, donkeys, ponies, birds, sheep, goats, rabbits, ferrets). It is run by volunteers and would like to expand. New kennels are now being built.

FRESHFIELDS ANIMAL RESCUE CENTRE

(East Lodge Farm, East Lane, Ince Blundell, Liverpool, L29 3EA)

Takes in abandoned and abused animals and at the moment cares for dogs, cats, ponies, horses, rabbits and lambs and endeavours to find places for them in good homes. Due to the number of animals being taken in and the lack of funds, the sanctuary is in danger of having to close (its current financial outlay is £1,000 per week). Supporters can make a donation, sponsor an animal at the Centre, or the building of a kennel and hold fund-raising activities.

HOPEFIELD SANCTUARY

697A Green Lane, Dagenham, Essex Tel 081 590 6273

A registered charity which rescues horses, ponies and donkeys from neglect and slaughter and has been active in the local area to eliminate abuse. It also cares for and homes other animals and seeks to find good foster homes for the rescued animals once restored to health. There are various schemes for supporters and members (eg. adoption) and the sanctuary would like more funds, practical help and sponsors to continue and expand its work.

LITTLE ANIMAL RESCUE CENTRE

(7 Hillside, Aldington, Evesham, Worcs, WR11 5UB Tel Evesham 832765/831535)

Incorporates large animal rescue and conservation and also runs "the Hedgehog Hotel", caring for sick, injured and orphaned hedgehogs until they are fit enough for release in carefully selected areas. Supporters can join the Fan Club and receive a badge and newsletter and/or sponsor a hedgehog and receive a photograph and information about the hedgehog concerned.

MAYHEW HOME

(Trenmar Gardens, Willesden, London, NW10 6BJ Tel 081 969 0178)

Started in 1886 and provides emergency care and attention for abandoned animals and arranges homes for them. It is in the process of building an isolation area for infectious animals, a surgery and an area for animal food and accessories. It has also set up a classroom for the education of young people. There are various support schemes.

OLD ENGLISH SHEPDOG RESCUE & WELFARE FUND

(The Old Farmhouse, High Hameringham, Horn-castle, Lincs, LN9 6PE Tel 065 888 644)

Takes in and rehomes Old English Sheepdogs. The Fund now needs financial support for the aspects of work that arise, eg. food, kenneling, veterinary bills, medication etc. It also needs helpers to raise funds and helpers with transport to collect dogs. All workers are unpaid volunteers. Homes are very carefully checked before dogs are placed in them.

RHODES MINNIS CAT SANCTUARY

(Seathwaite, Rhodes Minnis, Nr. Canterbury, Kent, CT4 6XU Tel Lyminge 862243)

A registered charity which began over thirty years ago taking in and rehoming cats and kittens. By 1989 nearly 6,500 cats had been rehomed. The sanctuary has a vet visiting the premises to deal with animals requiring attention and treatment. Financial support is required to continue its active work and a newsletter is sent to supporters.

SCOTTISH RESCUED ANIMAL SANCTUARY FUND

(31/2, 198 Dumbarton Rd., Partick, Glasgow, G11 6UN)

Endeavouring to purchase 8 acres of land on the West coast of Scotland to provide a sanctuary for animals to be treated where necessary and then either provided with new homes or returned to their natural environment. No money is required at this stage but the Fund asks for commitments for donations, bequests, help and support.

SHETLAND RESCUE: HORSE AND PONY SANCTUARY

(Dans Farm, Ramsbrook Lane, Hale, Merseyside, L24 5RP Tel 051 425 4627)

Began in 1981 with the rescue of a horse from a local horse sale and since then has continued with its rescue work. In 1984 the sanctuary gained charitable status and at the present time cares for 30 animals. The sanctuary's policy is to provide a home for sick, neglected or unwanted horses and in some cases those where the owner is no longer able to care for them, but want a good home. No horses are ever sold and all workers are unpaid volunteers. A quarterly newsletter is issued to members.

Bert, safe now at Sussex Horse Rescue.

SUSSEX HORSE RESCUE TRUST

(Heron Farm, Ashurst, Steyning, Sussex, BN4 3AL Tel Steyning 812427)

A registered charity involved in helping and homing distressed horses, ponies and donkeys and has also been involved in the care of other animals. Pauline Grant, who runs the Trust, sold her own home to begin the Trust and moved into a mobile home in order to purchase the land on which to keep the animals. New homes are arranged and these are regularly checked and visited and no animal is ever sold. A local newspaper reported in June "Ill-treated horses lucky enough to find their way to the Sussex Horse Rescue Trust have reached a safe haven". Supporters and fund-raisers are needed to continue and develop the sanctuary at Heron Farm and the Trust runs fund-raising activities itself to achieve this. Visitors can view the centre on Sunday afternoons and there is an annual Open Day.

WILLOW TREE SANCTUARY FOR ANIMAL WELFARE

(Gainsford End, Nr. Toppesfield, Halstead, Essex Tel 0787 237828)

A registered charity and a member of the Christian Consultative Council for the Welfare of Animals. It takes in animals and has a good rehoming policy and publishes an excellent no-nonsense newsletter.

WOOD GREEN ANIMAL SHELTERS

WOOD GREEN ANIMAL SHELTERS

(601 Lordship Lane, London, N22 5LG Tel 081 888 2351)

Margaret Young Home for Animals, King's Bush Farm, London Rd., Godmanchester, Huntingdon, Cambs, PE18 8LJ Tel 0480 830014)

Established in 1924, taking in, caring for and rehoming abandoned and neglected animals. On admission to the Shelters all animals undergo veterinary checks - there are 3 fully equipped surgeries. Where homes are found for animals taken in, these are regularly visited. The Shelters run several interesting schemes for supporters and publish a newsletter for members. Its work also includes a scheme for the education of youngsters in the field of animal caring.

COMMENT

BEYOND THE PALE

by Val Graham

I am sure you will receive other letters like this over the days ahead. I have been an admirer and supporter of the ALF since its early days, taking every opportunity to speak out in defence of previous direct action, in public meetings, in print and radio debates. This brought me quite a lot of criticism during the ten years I was involved with a national society, but to do otherwise would have been hypocritical. It has always exasperated me that most animal welfare spokesmen will take any opportunity to slag off the ALF in the media, refusing to give the slightest credit for the vast increase in public awareness (and media interest) that has been generated by them. Equally annoying are those who publicly condemn, whilst privately admitting some sneaking admiration!

My standard response to those who call the activists thugs or terrorists has been "Can you tell me of one single person or animal that has been injured during an ALF action?" What am I going to say from now on? It would be comforting to think that the recent car bombs have been a devilish plot by vivisectionists hoping to totally discredit the animal rights movement, but I fear that would be clutching at straws. Nor, given the obvious planning and technical expertise needed, can we assume those involved were total morons. This leaves the chilling conclusion that they realised perfectly well that innocent bystanders could be hurt (maybe a vegan AR supporter out walking a dog?) and did not care.

If I have never been mealy-mouthed in my praise of those who risk their liberty to help animals, I cannot stay silent now. The recent bombings were sick, indefensible and crassly stupid - rather like vivisection in fact. Those who carried them out have put themselves way beyond the pale, parting company with the many decent, intelligent people who accept that bad laws sometimes need to be defied, even if this involves some force being used. Instead they have sunk to the same level as the arrogant vivisectionist who distorts the truth to justify the means used.

I have always been opposed to capital punishment (although I don't think I am a bleeding hearts liberal!) even for the vilest crime. It could be argued that those who torture animals are of no use to the world, and I would not disagree. However, I also think that people like Myra Hindley are a total waste of space, but would not wish to see her hanged. I can well understand the desire to hurt and punish those who abuse animals, to give them a taste of the pain and fear they inflict on helpless creatures, but in the end it will achieve nothing but public outrage. I drew the line when the bomb hurt the baby. Can we now expect those responsible to go the whole hog and start strapping explosives to dogs? After all, what are a few animals' lives when you are fighting for your principles?

At a time when more and more people are sympathetic to the plight of animals (partly thanks to the ALF) this stupid action may well turn the clock back years. What wonderful ammunition it will have given the animal abusers who are probably rubbing their blood-stained hands together with glee at this 'own goal'. I also wonder what kind of psychos, gun-fanatics and violent misfits will now be drawn to animal liberation. Meanwhile, non-violent campaigners will no doubt be harassed and treated with even more suspicion by the police when collecting money and leafletting. I doubt if those in prison hoping for parole will get a fair hearing either. Try as I might, I can't think of one single good thing to weigh against all the harm caused. The vivisectionists involved are now heroes and a little baby and his parents have been caused great pain and fear.

If the comments attributed to Ronnie Lee in the Sunday Correspondent are correct, I am deeply disappointed that he appears to condone - or at any rate does not openly condemn - these actions. Neither he nor John Curtin appeared to express any genuine sympathy for the injured baby, though John did say he now felt bombings were immoral. I can only hope that the group or individual involved are as horrified at the outcome as most of us, and that they will return to the kind of activities that have won animal liberationists money and support in this country, and the respect of animal groups all over the world.

Not A Game Of Cricket

by Catherine Spicer

As the father of a young lad and someone who is active in the movement, the explosion under the car of a Bristol vivisector initially focused my attention on two aspects, the possible repercussions for the movement and whether there were any permanent injuries to the child (fortunately there were none). In retrospect I realised I showed no concern whatsoever for the fate of the vivisector. I did, however, feel for the activists - they too, I'm sure, were gutted by the outcome of their action. It also has to be said that we should dispel this notion, media and opposition based, that the activists should be branded cowards. If we placed ourselves in their position of actually assembling one of these devices, transporting them and physically planting them, we can see we are talking about people who are prepared to make the ultimate sacrifice any utilitarian person can make, risk life and limb for others, people with courage and conviction. The tactics involved, though, are perhaps worth looking at. On the one hand we still cannot be absolutely sure that they intended to kill the vivisectors, though it appears likely. The problem lies in the method and possibility of injury to others. If people use such methods it is, at the end of the day, down to them and it is not up to anyone else sitting in the comfort of their armchair to tell them what they should and should not do. Rather, we can, in the strongest manner possible, draw to their attention our concern about methods that brought about what happened in Bristol. For those with an intimate knowledge of how things work in the movement, we can be sure they are people in the movement. That no one seems to know who they are is probably down to the fact that there is a growing tendency, as regards damage actions, for groups to consist of just two people, who keep to themselves and do not gossip about their work. We can be equally sure that they are not ALF activists, but people who have bypassed the ALF, presumably because they feel that the present methods being employed to fight vivisection are not quite enough to end animal abuse within the foreseeable future.

It is all too easy to become complacent about the abject misery and pain animals suffer before their untimely deaths at the hands of vivisectors, factory farmers, hunters etc. Do we wait another hundred years for the law to be changed on vivisection, only to get another vivisectors charter? As one commentator put it, the fight for animal rights "is not a game of cricket".

I have to be honest and say with experience of all aspects of the movement that it is inevitable that people within the movement will not be bound by the present limitations placed on them by the national animal rights organizations' wish to campaign through the usual procedures for reforms, or the ALF policy of not carrying out actions against the abusers personally for tactical reasons.

It may be helpful to new people in the movement if we look closely at the difference between the national groups and the ALF, so we can see how dissimilar this third emerging force is. The national organizations are political reform organizations hoping to gain reforms where possible on the way to the abolition of animal abuse at some stage in the future, whenever that may be. The problem is that after over a hundred years of campaigning to have vivisection abolished, when the law was finally changed in the eighties, not even cosmetic experiments were banned, despite public opinion polls showing a clear majority in favour of a ban. What we ended up with was a vivisectors charter. If we look at hunting, for example, and a bill to abolish live hare coursing - it was passed by the Commons in November 1975 with a majority of 117. When it went to the Lords in 1976 some of them organised against it and threw the bill out. As a result wild hares are still torn to pieces today, despite public opinion polls consistently showing a large majority against this barbaric practice. After the failure of this particular bill many people began to wonder if democracy was working for animals in this country. If we turn to factory farming and the House of Commons Select Committee on Agriculture, Report on Animal Welfare in Poultry and Pig Production - a group of MPs investigated factory farming and caused considerable controversy when their report was published in 1981. They condemned the factory farming of pigs and recommended a five year run-down programme leading to a permanent ban on battery cages for hens. Their proposals were rejected by the Government. A more recent example concerns the proposed reform by a Minister to have labels placed in fur coats that are made from wild animals caught in leg-hold traps, clearly showing that the coat is made from wild trapped animals (presumably the idea is that people will choose a coat made from fur bearing animals bred and reared in a factory farm). Even this supposed reform has been blocked by the Government, even though it was one of its own Ministers that proposed it. Not content with that, Britain is now trying to block this reform being adopted by the EEC.

Once again, those who caused the explosions were termed "lunatics", "terrorists" and "maniacs" by various spokespersons for national animal protection societies, some of whom even called for animal rights campaigners to help the police "put away" the people responsible. One does not have to agree with "car bombs" to see how this sort of reaction is unjust. If, during the war, partisans had tried to blow up Dr. Mengele (who carried out cruel experiments on the Jews) and the explosion had injured an innocent passerby, would it have been correct to refer to those resistance fighters as "lunatics" and "terrorists" and to call for them to be handed over to the authorities? If not, how can it be right to react in such a way towards animal rights activists who try to get rid of animal torturers by the same method? Only those who fail to understand animal rights theory would attempt to argue a distinction - and if people cannot comprehend the basic concept of speciesism, one wonders what they are doing as media spokespeople for the movement. As I've stated before, the French Resistance killed and injured many innocent people in their campaign. No matter how unjustifiable those deaths and injuries may have been, it is interesting to note that it was only the Nazis and their puppets who used the word "terrorists" to describe the partisans.

As somebody who opposes the use of "car bombs" (because of the high risk to innocent life) and wishes to see that particular campaign come to an end, it exasperates me to see animal rights "representatives" using words which will do nothing to stop the "car bombs" and which may even ensure that their use continues. By referring to those who caused the explosions as "terrorists" and "maniacs", movement "spokespeople" can rest assured that the planters of the "car bombs" will turn a deaf ear to anything sensible they may have to say as to why such actions are morally and tactically wrong. One only has to have a basic knowledge of human psychology to understand that if you insult people they will not be willing to listen to your views. These latest "car bomb" attacks may well have their roots in the hysterical reaction of many movement "representatives" to last year's Bristol university explosion.

My own view is that the "car bombers" are neither "terrorists", "maniacs" nor "loonies" but basically decent, caring people who have become so enraged and upset by the horrors of vivisection that they have tried to wipe out some of the perpetrators of that evil crime without proper regard as to the consequences of their actions. I believe they did not properly foresee the level of risk to passers by and that they were as saddened as any of us by the injury to the little boy. I hope now that they will reconsider their tactics so as to never put innocent life at such serious risk again.

There is little doubt that the explosion which injured the young boy in Bristol caused some damage to our movement in terms of losing public sympathy for the cause of animal rights. It is, however, the duty of those who represent animal protection societies to attempt to limit their damage, rather than make it worse, which many of them did through their hysterical statements in the media. Unfortunately several spokespersons exaggerated and harped on about the damage caused to public support, thereby undermining the confidence and enthusiasm of local animal rights campaigners, who are the people in vital direct contact with the public.

It is also very unfortunate that at least one representative of an anti-vivisection society appears to have said that "animal research in the past may have done some good". That is the sort of statement which should never be made by AR spokespersons, who should instead be pointing out the tremendous damage to human health caused through the vivisection method and the fact that an increasing number of doctors and scientists are totally opposed to animal experimentation on scientific grounds.

It is vital that the movement doesn't allow itself to be thrown onto the defensive by events such as the "car bombs". It was a tragedy that an innocent child was injured, but how many innocent animals have been injured (and tortured and slaughtered) by the human race? You couldn't even begin to count them. The horror of what happens to the animals and the evil of such practices as vivisection, should always be emphasised to the public and the media at every opportunity and should be the main focus of any press statements.

Finally it is sad that the Animal Liberation Front was blamed by the media for the "car bombs", because there is no way that they were ALF actions, being totally in breach of the ALF policy of not going out to kill or injure. Just because someone purportedly "claimed responsibility" in the name of the ALF is neither here nor there. Anyone can pick up a telephone and make a claim of responsibility on behalf of any organization whatsoever. Had the "caller" claimed they were from the RSPCA that wouldn't mean that the RSPCA was responsible for the explosions and the same applies to the ALF.

In fact there is some evidence that whoever made the claim of responsibility was not actually responsible for the "car bombs" at all. At the time of last year's explosion at Bristol university there was a genuine claim of responsibility (because it was made before the event took place) by a group referred to in the press as the "Animal Abused Society". After the explosion received press and TV publicity, somebody made a "claim" on behalf of the ALF, which was viewed by police as doubtful because of its inaccuracy. The same group of people that carried out that explosion may well have been responsible for the more recent "car bombs" because plastic explosive was used in all three attacks - and once again we have the ALF "claim" coming only after the events had received widespread publicity.

Why then should someone wish to make the ALF "responsible" for actions which it could not have carried out? It seems to me that there are three possibilities. Firstly, it could be an animal abuser or member of the authorities seeking to cause damage to the animal liberation movement. The ALF campaign to rescue animals from suffering and cause damage to the property of those involved in animal persecution has been a controversial one, but it has achieved considerable success. If people could be deterred from taking part in that campaign by associating the ALF with attempts to blow people up and with the reckless injuring of a young child, that would cause considerable relief both to the abusers of animals and to the powers that be.

Secondly, the "claim" could have come from somebody in the movement who dislikes the ALF and has allowed this personal hatred to outweigh their concern for the animals. Unfortunately, knowing the irrationality of some people in the movement, this is by no means beyond the bounds of possibility.

Thirdly, it could be someone who wants ALF activists to set about trying to kill and injure animal abusers and who hopes that the "claim" might somehow push them into doing this. But many ALF campaigners are just not into personal violence and might cease carrying out ALF activities altogether if they thought the ALF was somehow involved in bomb attacks against people. Thus any effort to put the name of the ALF to events like the "car bombs" is likely to have a negative effect on the overall campaign against animal persecution.

Hopefully, events such as the "car bombs" will not occur again, but if they did it is vital that movement "representatives", and indeed the movement as a whole, reacts in a more rational manner. Such occurrences must always be seen against a backdrop of thousands of years of vicious persecution of other creatures by the human species and we must never allow anything to divert our efforts from the vital task of bringing that persecution to an end. Let us never forget, and never cease to insist, that the real terrorists are the animal abusers.

(Editor's note - Bristol police investigating the "car bomb" actions, recently stated that there was no claim of responsibility on behalf of the ALF as far as they were aware.)

by Louise Molyneux

'Vegan': a person who uses no animal products
(The Collins Concise Dictionary)

At one time, a mention of the word "vegan" was likely to elicit the most extraordinary responses from people. Some would look completely puzzled and confess ignorance, whilst those at least familiar with the term would often launch into a fierce tirade, denouncing vegans as extreme fanatics, leading austere lives of self-deprivation, verging on the masochistic. By far the most unusual interpretation I ever heard, though, came from a rather elderly woman who quipped, "Vegans? Oh yes, dear, I never miss an episode of Star Trek"!!

Thankfully, attitudes have changed significantly and the majority no longer think of us as strange beings from another planet; prejudice and hostility having been replaced by curiosity and a certain degree of admiration. As an awareness of animal rights issues reaches an unprecedented level, so more and more people are seeking information about a cruelty-free lifestyle, and nowhere is this trend more evident than in the growth of vegetarianism. In 1986, a Gallup opinion poll estimated the number of non-meat eaters in this country at 3 million. Given the latest controversy over mad cow disease (BSE) and other hazards associated with meat eating, it is perfectly possible that this figure may have topped 5 million - an incredible one tenth of the population!

However, whilst vegetarianism is to be applauded as a first step, it is nowhere near a solution to ending institutionalised animal abuse. In fact, hard as it might be to stomach, it is a contributing factor. When suddenly confronted with a considerable void in their diets, many "nouveau-vegetarians" actually INCREASE their consumption of eggs, milk, cheese and other dairy products in the misguided belief that these are obtained without cruelty. (This was certainly true in my case: although vegetarian for only three months before turning vegan, my meals consisted almost entirely of omelettes, pizzas, yoghurts, cheese rolls etc.) By rejecting only meat, vegetarians, albeit unwittingly, are merely exchanging one blatant form of cruelty for another more insidious one.

So what's wrong with milk?

It is astonishing how few people actually associate milk with lactation and, incredibly, there are still those amongst us who believe a cow produces milk just by eating grass!

The harsh reality is that in order to produce milk a cow (like any other mammal) has to be made pregnant every year - usually by artificial insemination these days - and the inevitable result is a calf. It has to follow, therefore, that in order for the milk to be made available for human consumption, the calf must go. This "necessary" separation of mother and offspring is extremely traumatic and upsetting for both animals.

The calves, only a few days old, unweaned and unable to drink from a bucket, face an ncertain fate. Although a minority are hand-reared to adulthood on milk substitutes for use by the beef and dairy industries, most calves, because they are simply unwanted by-products, are sent straight to market. Some are raised for veal, a miserable 14 week existence, whilst others are shipped abroad - 201,306 in 1986 - to continental veal units, many expiring during the long journey.

Mark Braunstein couldn't have put it better in his article "On being radically vegan" when he said: "And what about the veal floating invisibly inside every glass of milk....There can be no quart of milk where there is no cutlet of veal. If your lips are white with milk, it is because someone else's are red with blood".

What of the dairy cow herself? Well, after decades of genetically engineering breeds of cow with bigger and bigger udders, she is far removed from her humble ancestors. She now has difficulty in walking with the great swollen sack bumping painfully between her hind legs. Many of today's "herds" are zero-grazed which means they do not even go out to grass but are confined instead inside large barns: others are permitted to graze only for a few months each year.

A cow's natural lifespan exceeds 14 years but a modern milker is lucky (perhaps unlucky) if she lives to see her fifth birthday. Reduced to the status of mere milk machine, she now produces milk by the gallon rather than the pint. Once her milk yield falls, she will be swiftly dispatched for slaughter, much of the worn-out meat finding its way into the seedy burger trade.

OK then. So what's wrong with free-range eggs?

The iniquity of the battery egg system is already well-known and rightly condemned, but not so the suffering and death inherent even in free-range egg production.

In recent years the demand for non-intensive eggs has increased dramatically; supermarkets, ever desperate to scramble aboard the crowded "green" bandwagon, are now the biggest retailers of free-range eggs, displaying them alongside their battery counterparts. This boom has meant something of a revolution for free-range egg farmers who hitherto supplied mainly healthfood shops and other small outlets. Some have retained their strict principles but, inevitably, many others have compromised conditions in pursuit of higher profits. As always, it is the unfortunate chicken who pays the price.

go Vegan!

The expression "free-range" conjures up a host of nostalgic barn-yard images of hens roaming around free, scratching the soil for tit-bits. Again, the reality is quite different. Free-range does not necessarily mean FREE - sheer economics prevent this. Even free-range hens are confined in some way, some living permanently indoors. Whilst they may at least be able to scratch their wings and turn around, the density of birds and the space they are afforded is down to the individual egg-producer.

Like the dairy cow, the laying hen's lifespan is entirely dependent on her productivity. Few farmers (even free-range advocates) can afford to be sentimental and once her egg yield drops, she too will be sent for slaughter.

There is, of course, another more fundamental problem of biology to overcome; the fact is that only female hens produce eggs, so what are we to do with all the male chicks? For the hardened carnivore this presents no problem, but for the concerned vegetarian it is something of a dilemma. At present, male chicks are killed soon after hatching - methods include gassing, asphyxiation, suffocation.

Aside from all this, can a vegetarian ever be sure that the eggs he/she consumes are really free-range? A 1986 survey by Birmingham's Consumer Protection Division revealed many instances of battery eggs being fraudulently sold as free-range - in one case at a healthfood shop! Also, how carefully does the average vegetarian scrutinise the ingredients labels of food products containing eggs? Very few manufacturers of mayonnaise, cakes, veggie-burgers etc. can boast that they use only free-range eggs.

However, whether free-range hens suffer less than battery hens or not is immaterial. The real issue is that animals are simply not ours to use or exploit; they are each individuals and value their lives and liberty as much as you and I. If you advocate the concept of animal 'rights', as opposed to animal 'welfare', then the very least you can do is live as a vegan. As a transitory period vegetarianism is, as I've already said, to be welcomed - few meat eaters having been converted overnight. However, once an individual becomes aware of the cruelty involved in the dairy and egg industries, he/she has no alternative but to turn vegan. To remain a vegetarian is to be a hypocrite and to live a lie.

So why, then, is the animal rights movement still riddled with long-term vegetarians who stubbornly refuse to budge? Perhaps someone could enlighten me in the next issue of Arkangel?

Truly Vegan?

by Linda Emptage

Following a chance remark made when enquiring about product testing, a term new to me burst into my world. It was "microbiological testing". Microbiological testing, as explained to me in simple terms, meant taking a sample of a product and placing it on a gel, usually Agar, and then watching to see if bacteria grew or was inhibited by the product. However, to feed the bacteria a nutrient is used and this is where the problem started. It would appear that at the moment the only nutrient available is what was called a "protein broth" and this broth is either derived from meat, fish or milk. I thought that this test would be confined to perhaps a few products, but as enquiries went on the size of the problem grew. Everyone I spoke to at first didn't know what I was talking about, either through ignorance as to how their products were tested or because they didn't want anyone to know what had been hidden for so long.

I thought that firms involved in providing products for vegetarians and vegans would be bound to have an alternative test. Again I was wrong, as I found out that even vegetarian stalwarts like Beauty Without Cruelty used this test for their products. How can a firm that advertises "Vegetarian Ethics in Practice" and "a company managed by vegetarians who are dedicated to animal welfare" justify the use of meat products etc. in routine batch (quality control) tests? At this stage I must thank Kingfisher toothpaste as they did point out that on investigation they found out their products were tested in this way and probably every one else's too. These words proved to be correct as we delved deeper. From discussions we had it would appear that some foods could be affected as well. Luckily, the Vegetarian Society are taking up this aspect of research by contacting various firms. Individual members of the Vegan Society are researching the cosmetics side and will be able to swap information with the Vegetarian Society, so hopefully details can be printed in the "Vegetarian" and "Vegan" magazines. A change will only come about if individuals write to the manufacturers politely letting them know that meat/milk/fish etc. products are not acceptable for routine testing of "cruelty-free" products. Even the weaker "cruelty-free" criteria demanded by the anti-vivisection societies include telling manufacturers that slaughterhouse by-products are not acceptable as ingredients, but will they demand the same standards for routine testing once these facts become clear to them?

If we can land a man on the moon, I'm sure an alternative (vegan) test can be developed. It's up to every one of us to use our buying power to influence "cruelty-free" companies and spare a few minutes to write a few letters. Every one of us can manage that. No company can function without customers. That's a simple fact of life. The animals are powerless without YOU. So far, it is only "Honesty Cosmetics" that have guaranteed they use no non-vegan testing methods so the very least we can do is to support this firm. They have proved we can buy high quality, long lasting toiletries and household goods that are so economical to use. Some people, for various reasons, are not in a position to go out leafletting, rescuing animals or campaigning in other ways but the above takes little or no effort for each and every one of us and we can all make a valuable contribution here, if only we can be bothered. It takes little effort for your views to be known, only the cost of a stamp and a few minutes of your time.

People are in prison today for their beliefs, so the very least we can all do is to write a few letters as I'm sure we can get good results, so PLEASE help to bring about yet another change for the good of the silent, suffering animals.

(Honesty Cosmetics have guaranteed they use no non-vegan testing methods. You can support this company by buying toiletries and household cleaning products from them by mail order - Honesty, 33 Markham Rd., Chesterfield, Derbys S40 1TA. Correspondence on this issue - replies to letters to cosmetic companies etc. - can be sent to Linda Emptage c/o Arkangel).

FRAME

by Helen Nelson

I admit I was rather surprised to see you mention amongst the animal welfare organizations the Fund for the Replacement of Animals in Medical Experiments. FRAME is hardly an animal welfare organization, as its members gave their support to the government's damaging (animals) Scientific Procedures Bill which, in some ways, made conditions even worse for laboratory animals. Although some of the work scientists carry out is non-animal research, FRAME does, as a matter of course, support animal experiments. In fact the Chairman of the trustees, Dr. Michael Balls, has defended animal experiments as "essential".

It's policy is that "The immediate and total abolition of animal experiments is not possible if -

Medical research is to continue and the remaining diseases which lessen the quality of human and animal life are to be overcome;

New consumer products and industrial chemicals are to be tested in attempts to identify and minimise any potential hazard to those likely to be exposed to them."

Clearly the remaining diseases we shall always have with us, and we shall never see the end of "new consumer products and industrial chemicals" until we run out of resources.

Such muddled thinking is hardly likely to appeal to those of us who belong to the anti-vivisection societies. Our aim should be to abolish vivisection altogether and either substitute non-animal based research, or encourage much more emphasis on natural remedies.

Infiltrators

by Fiona Tait
(New Zealand Anti-Vivisection Society)

I think I speak for the New Zealand Anti-Vivisection Society when I express my horror and disgust at what is taking place, not only in Britain, but all over the world - namely the failure to properly address the issue of vivisection. That failure stems directly from the inability of people to recognise their enemies.

I wish to comment about the "internal disputes" involving the national societies, mentioned in the first editorial of Arkangel. Activists are not insulted in the media by "fellow campaigners", but by imposters and infiltrators. It is not "minor differences of opinion" that lead to disputes as Ronnie Lee suggests. Of course it would be ideal if all the societies could work together in harmony - in fact the abolitionist societies are doing just that!

To quote Ronnie Lee: "It hurts and angers me to hear genuine, caring people described as 'terrorists' and 'loonies', but what possible good would it do to use insulting words against the campaigners who have made those remarks?" First of all, people who attack the ALF in the media are obviously not real 'campaigners', but create the illusion that they are. Brendan McNally only touched the tip of the ice-berg in his article titled "Who are they kidding?" At the moment, the so-called "respectable" groups and individuals are kidding all of you! It is not just a coincidence that these groups have been moving away from the issue of vivisection, with some of them even having a shot at changing their names! Arkangel reports that there is a group of concerned members of the BUAV who are worried that it has rejected its abolitionist stance to vivisection. Believe me, that happened a long time ago. Don't be fooled and taken in by infiltrated societies who refrain from attacking vivisection on medical and scientific grounds and whose campaigns revolve around the three 'Rs' (Reform, Regulation and Reduction). The threat to abolitionists from these societies is real, not imaginary.

I am angry at the way CIVIS was referred to in Arkangel: "The latest CIVIS report reveals the wealthiest USA animal societies and the high wages of their top employees as well as 'exposing' those it regards as infiltrators in the anti-vivisection movement". Is the reliability of CIVIS being questioned at all? CIVIS has made more progress than any other organization towards the abolition of vivisection with its policy of exposing the invalidity and fraud of vivisection.

I disagree with the statement made by Ronnie on page 33 (issue 1): "Thus we hold it wrong to carry out painful experiments on animals no matter what would be the benefit to humankind (if indeed there be a benefit, and many would argue that there isn't)." Firstly, all experiments cause animals to suffer. Secondly, we should ALL be arguing that there isn't any benefit, since the results from animal tests can in no way be applied to human beings. Every species reacts in a different way, as does every individual in a species. Britain is trailing far behind other countries because people are not using the greatest weapon against vivisection - the proof that it is scientific fraud!!!

I agree that we are fighting a war - a war for peace! If people genuinely want to stop vivisection, first of all they must be qualified or prepared to fight. They can only be prepared by reading the books "Slaughter of the Innocent", "Naked Empress - the Great Medical Fraud" and "1,000 Doctors and many more against vivisection", by world-famous author, medical historian and LEADER of the abolitionist movement, Hans Ruesch. Hans Ruesch's 'CIVIS' has bulletins that present evidence in great detail about how Britain has become swamped with infiltrated societies. If activists do not read all of Ruesch's material then they are doing the animals a terrible injustice, for they are unprepared for the war against vivisection.

Anti-vivisectionists have two choices. They can either follow the infiltrated societies along the road to oblivion or join the abolitionist societies who campaign against vivisection on scientific grounds.

All ALF activists should be highly commended for their courage and commitment to stopping this evil in our society. But beware, there are enemies lurking around every corner!

IMAGINE

by David Lane

Imagine: It is another time. A totalitarian government is in power. The authorities are filling newly constructed internment camps with their former opponents and families.

Government propaganda claims the internees are being well cared for, but those on the outside soon become aware of the most appalling atrocities taking place inside the camps. Accounts from guards and camp workers, stolen documents and smuggled-out photographs provide conclusive evidence of torture and mass slaughter.

Most prefer not to think about these terrible happenings, or deny the truth of the mounting evidence, but some are determined to put an end to the horror.

A number of groups and organizations spring up. Most engage in strictly legal activities such as producing and distributing leaflets and organising petitions. These groups are harassed and infiltrated by the authorities, but tolerated by a regime that wishes to promote at least the appearance of free expression.

Other groups advocate and take part in various forms of direct action. They are labelled "terrorist" by the authorities and forced to work underground. The tactics employed by the underground groups include sabotage of buildings and equipment and the freeing of as many internees as possible. Naturally, when activists are caught, the state punishes them most severely.

Imagine: Men, women and children are suffering and dying every minute. Where would you stand? What would you do?

I am going to assume that in the above scenario you would at the very least understand what motivates the activists to engage in sabotage and rescue operations. You feel their outrage at the very thought of fellow human beings suffering pain and degradation and you can quite easily imagine how some people could be driven to take direct action - even at great personal risk.

You may admire the activists for their courage. Possibly you would disagree with their tactics. You may think their methods are counter-productive and undermine the work of 'legitimate' organizations. But would you denounce or condemn the activists for doing what they believe they must do?

Of course the allegory is an obvious one. Now consider the implications:

Substitute non-human animals such as pigs, chimpanzees, rats and chickens for men, women and children. Insert British democracy and agricultural/industrial/scientific/medical establishment in place of totalitarian regime. Call the internment camps factory farms, research laboratories and abattoirs.

The scenario is no longer imaginary, but a real picture of the system in this country which kills something like 800 million animals each year for a variety of human purposes.

Now where do you stand? Is your outrage lessened? Numerically the situation is much worse, but we are only talking about animals after all, so it's not really the same is it? Harsh as this statement seems, it does actually reflect what the vast majority of people believe. Because non-human animals are suffering there isn't quite the same feeling of horror or revulsion, or of urgency.

I suggest that if we were truly to reject speciesism, as we in the animal rights movement so often claim to do, then we would see no differences at all between the imaginary human internment camp scenario and the very real non-human one. We would react in a similar way because both situations would stir similar feelings within us.

Is it impossible to accept that there are some people who feel so passionately about the continuing holocaust in our midst that they feel morally compelled to do whatever is necessary to put a stop to it?

Why is it then that when animal rights campaigners cause damage to the property of a person or organization connected with the killing and suffering of animals, their actions are condemned by other animal rights campaigners? If those who condemn believe that there is a fundamental difference between non-human and human suffering, then I suggest they are as guilty of speciesism as the wearer of a fur coat. Or would they also have condemned the sabotage of gas chambers in Nazi Germany?

If the sincerity of those who break the law is not in question, then it can only remain to question their tactics. It is proper and constructive to debate tactics, but the discussion must be calm and rational. There must be tolerance of other peoples' views, and recognition that all who work within the movement have similar aims, but a whole variety of different strengths.

We are working to put an end to all animal abuse. I long for the day when spokespersons from Animal Aid and the RSPCA appear on television to explain what drives people to put incendiary devices in department stores. I will know then that the movement is truly united.

FASCISM ANIMAL

AND RIGHTS

by Sonja Morris

The last issue of Arkangel (No. 2, Spring '90) brought into the open the ongoing debate about the presence of fascists within the animal rights movement. Ronnie Lee raised the point in the opening article and, later on, in the group news section, we find the inclusion of 'Greenwave', a highly dubious organization with fascist tendencies.

The involvement of fascists within the movement needs to be examined in terms of their ideologies and current thinking. From looking at their present day tendencies towards 'green fascism' it becomes evident that their motive is first and foremost for recruitment. The National Front has foregone its overtly racist overtones in favour of a much more subtle "Third Position" - a 'back to the land' evocation of 'Blood and Soil', itself popularised by Hitler's agriculture minister, Richard Darre. This later developed into Greenwave (launched in November 1988) after the official winding up of one of the factions of the NF.

The fascists use Greenwave to appeal to the green vote by arguing that the Left-Right spectrum of politics has been outmoded, and therefore allowing entry into the arena of acknowledged political discourse. In 'Nationalism Today', the journal of the NF, this populist recruitment attempt becomes self-evident when it states "We need to install our values into the minds of the intelligentsia, pressure group politics allow us to achieve this in a subtle and effective way".

Another intention of Greenwave is to portray fascism as being more ecological than other political ideologies. The animal rights movement has witnessed before the attempts of fascists to gain respectability through the guise of animal rights. In Bradford they campaigned against ritual slaughter as inhumane, but it is not difficult to see that this seemingly compassionate viewpoint is, in fact, an attempt to attack the Muslim population of Bradford.

There is no doubt that some fascists are capable of looking after the welfare of animals that share their house - but are also capable of pouring petrol through the letterbox of black peoples' homes around the corner.

A recent Greenwave convention in Wigan showed the true nature of this organization. The various assortment of neanderthal skinheads and (neo?) nazis were far from compassionate when attempting to injure anybody who dared to disagree with them.

Back to the debate arising from Ronnie's article, namely that of whether to tolerate fascists within the animal rights movement. Should fascists be censored from exercising their green fascist viewpoints? If we allow fascists views on green issues within the movement, then must we also tolerate their views on immigration - which, after all, when talked about in terms of population, is also an environmental issue?

The fascists who are playing the green/animal rights ticket at present are unwelcome in the movement. Their involvement is purely for their own political gain and should be seen, not so much as a minor nuisance and a tool for the press to use against the movement, but as an organ that can feed from the movement and grow to become a threat to our freedom.

If we ultimately seek the breakdown of speciesism, that is the destruction of the hierarchy between species, then fascism, through its attempt to create barriers within a single species, must be a contradiction to our aims.

OUT OF TOUCH

by David Horton
(in Australia)

I admire the courage and sincerity of a man like Ronnie Lee; his sensitivity to the suffering of exploited animals is an inspiration, that he is a practising vegan is equally admirable. Ronnie Lee is a rare man and an obviously dedicated leader in the fight to win rights for animals.

But I think his advocacy of direct action is misjudged. The violence and damage connected with direct action will not achieve anything long lasting. The public is not made up of millions of Ronnie Lees. They are not clear thinking or brave or compassionate as he is.....well, they might have been if it were not for the fact that most men and women are so badly damaged by their lifestyles and their habit of 'non-think' that everything they feel strongly about is directed by fear, insecurity and keeping up with fashionable ideas.

If Ronnie Lee ever does become the fashion they will probably make Ronnie Lee Super Hero dolls of him and sell them to the kids in department stores.

For the present though, Ronnie Lee forgets just where most people's heads are. They can't follow his reasoning, they can't accept the principles of veganism, all they can see is a crank exploding bombs to get his own way, to make a name for himself.

Direct action is a time bomb in itself waiting to explode in Ronnie Lee's face. Violence can never be overcome by impatience and force. Animal rights will never be granted through violent intimidation. They will only be granted when we have the support of fellow humans in large numbers. And before that those fellow humans must become real people again, be able to form real opinions and come together again. When they do, when they become vegans and dedicate their lives to fighting and thinking in terms of non violence for non violence then their demands will be heard and acted upon and animal abuse will stop.

In the meantime, to achieve this breakthrough in society, there is another mountain to climb. Harder even than Ronnie Lee's. Even harder to face than the decision to risk personal liberty by direct action.

This mountain is the personal hell of screaming inside yet coolly and clearly moving inch by inch towards a grasp of the present psychology behind the human attitude, a fuller understanding of what has happened to the once upright, clear thinking humans.

With this grasp alone we can approach people and turn them back into real, loving, caring, thinking men and women again, minus all that tacky short sighted violence. We need them like this because we need their support to last. We need to create a self-perpetuating stream of non violent attitude to counter the pervading "bash 'em into submission" creed of direct action. We need leaders like Ronnie Lee to help shape lots of strong, outraged, brave vegan men and women if we really want to overcome speciesism in our society. Leaders who advocate violence to get what they believe in, whichever side of the fence they are on, have had their day; those who cling to direct action as a solution are probably some of the most sincere people in our society but tragically they are hopelessly out of touch.

Badger Trust

by Mr. C.E. Parsons

I recently received copy number 2 (of Arkangel) and was most concerned to see among the listings on page 7 a section on the Badger Trust and an appeal for funds. I learn from reliable sources that this organization has an extremely suspect background and its claims are not supported by any known badger group. The technical information does not match with details of leading companies in the field such as Raid-alert as far as I can tell. I have received no reply to the enquiry letter I wrote to the Badger Trust; from what I learn I can only hope others have been similarly ignored. As a member of four badger groups, I know that this trust has had no contact with them and indeed I doubt whether it has any intention of doing so.

I am sending a copy of this letter to Mr. John Taylor, Chairman of the National Federation of Badger Groups which represents the large number, over 50, of local volunteer groups who are working to help protect badgers against the threats posed to them throughout the country. Readers wishing to help would be welcome to contact their local group where their support would not be wasted as I fear it will be at the Badger Trust. Perhaps you could give some space to the NFBG. I appreciate that with the great number of deserving groups - and I think the listings are excellent - it becomes impossible to check on all. I do ask that in this case you make further enquiries as to how its funds are administered and spent before continuing to give it publicity. I enjoy Arkangel. Long may it continue!

Editor's note: Please see the point made about the Badger Trust on page 13

GOOD AND BAD

by Robin Lane

After reading the second edition of Arkangel, I was impressed by the diverse selection of articles, reports and general feelings of those involved within the animal rights movement. The magazine, acting as a forum, gives people the opportunity to air their opinions in a way that no other magazine offers or allows. The much-debated question of violence, for instance, is an issue that can help people to accept differing points of view. The arguments from both sides, in support of and against cannot be denied in most circumstances. Of course, an act of premeditated violence (against a person) is different from an act of self defence and although most people in the AR movement would reject the former, the vast majority would accept the latter. Animals are unable to defend themselves against their abusers and so rely upon caring humans to defend them. Which category, then, does this fall into? Geoff Sheppard was right when he asked the question "would the critics of violence be so vocal in their condemnation if they themselves were suffering the same tortures that animals are suffering?" The difference is that we are not suffering the same tortures and so the individual must make their own moral decision. The recent "car bombing" in Bristol in which a baby was injured must be seen by all within the movement to be unacceptable because all bombs (which contain explosives) are wholly unpredictable and innocent people (and animals) can always be at risk. Some may argue that a war is being fought and in a war people will be injured. We must never use war as an excuse as wars are caused by nationalism and greed and result in the mass-murder of both humans and animals. Others may argue that no one is truly innocent. In my opinion a baby is as innocent as an animal, and anyway, if this were to be the case then neither are those who planted the bomb!

With regards to the article "Loose Talk" by Anon, I found it extremely disturbing, a recipe for creating a state of fear within the movement. What does Anon consider to be an "unjustified statement"? One which criticises direct action or even the criticism of their article. Surely the point of Arkangel is to allow uncensored criticism. If it refers to public criticism then Anon seems more inclined to believe the media and their own point of view. The strength of the ALF had always been as a result of people (often those who didn't know too much about one another) coming together and forming ALF groups. With so many people involved there was/is bound to be those who aren't as discreet as they should be but I believe this to be unavoidable. Often, new activists when arrested are threatened and/or physically abused by the authorities into giving information about others. Rather than punishing them after the event, it would be more useful to inform them of the possibilities of police harassment. I am aware that Anon is not suggesting that "speculators, loose-talkers, gossipers and those making unjustified statements" are knee-capped but he/she is certainly hinting at it! If people are found to be infiltrators or deliberately give information about others to the police, information should be distributed concerning these people providing the allegations are not simply rumours. Anon mentions in the article "if faced with a threat from within (the IRA) they deal with it harshly, even if there is not much evidence to back up the rumours". Do we really want to learn from groups like this?

In the article "Animal Liberation" by Ronnie Lee he suggests the world's population is reduced to 50 million. Considering that Animal Liberation is such a serious issue, statements like this are less than useful (particularly when he openly supports the pro-life argument). I can understand the inclusion of Green environmentalist groups in the Arkangel but I feel that some of those now being included are not as green as they make out. The National Front's Greenwave for instance (surely a group which openly advocates the terrorization of people because of their skin colour and/or religion should have no place in the magazine let alone the AR and Green movements). The Pro-life network, a group which denies the rights of the mother while at the same time claims to support the protection of the rights of the unborn baby and the mother, a contradiction surely if the mother did not want to give birth? The "Green" magazine carries an advert for NIREX, a nuclear waste company and LYNX, who consider it perfectly acceptable for people to wear leather all the time that people are eating meat!

Having said all this, I have always and will always support groups such as the Animal Liberation Front (providing they work within the non-violence policy). Hopefully, the groups and individuals who have openly criticized direct action in the past will now realise that the movement will not have seen the decimation of the fur trade and the reduction in the amount of animals used in experiments without it. I hope Arkangel will continue to grow in strength but please don't cause your own downfall by giving space to those groups that may ultimately destroy it.

OBITUARIES

MARIE DREYFUS

About twenty years ago at the 'Animals Fair' I met a lady called Marie Dreyfus. Over the years we kept in touch periodically. She seemed old to me then, 74 years old, but she had an insight second to none. Marie had written a book called 'Crimes Against Creation' dealing with all the aspects of animal rights. Marie had been vegan for many years when we met her and it was only in years to come that we were to realise how difficult it must have been to stick to your beliefs in those early days of veganism. They didn't falter in their belief, they didn't know if they would harm themselves by refusing animal products, but Marie and others like her seemed so full of compassion for animals that nothing could deter them. I remember this little old lady telling me so many years ago that the only answer was veganism. Although Marie wrote her book about thirty years ago so much of it is relevant today. Sadly, for those left behind, Marie died on 18th July 1990, aged over 90. She had managed to get into a nursing home that catered for her vegan views. The last quotation in her book seems to sum her up far better than I could ever try - "I shall pass through this world but once. Any good therefore that I can do, or any kindness I can shew to any living creature, let me do it now! Let me not defer it, nor neglect it; for I shall not pass this way again". Marie Dreyfus certainly lived up to that.

TONY FARAMUS

Tony Faramus died at home on 4th August at the age of 70. He was a staunch campaigner for animal rights, actively involved in protests far and wide. He was heavily committed to SEALL during its campaigns and was constantly out, to the end, in his green VW, saving foxes, hares and harassed sabs from marauding hunts. More than most of us Tony was able to sympathise directly with the maltreated animal kingdom. He had already experienced his own version of humankind's tyrannical capabilities when, as a young Jersey man, in World War 2, he had fallen foul of the occupying German forces and their collaborationist friends and had been transported to the notorious extermination camp Mauthausen where he was to spend almost five years of his life. It was little wonder that he became sympathetic towards animals subjected to similar treatment by his own British countrymen in subsequent years. For his concern he was even imprisoned by them for a month at the age of 67, whilst in poor health, for refusing to be bound over following an incident at a fox hunt. Tony's funeral service was inspirational - Farnham's main parish church was packed with a real cocktail of mourners - orange Mohican haircuts and black vested sabs, fresh back from sabbing a cub hunt, mixed freely with Tony's more sombrely attired relatives who were clearly overwhelmed by the love and affection expressed that day. ALF activists and Animal Aid personalities mingled openly, in evidence of the respect in which Tony was held. Our thoughts are very much with Tony's wife Mary, herself a very dedicated campaigner, and his devoted dog Dan at this sad time.

Editorial:

Arkangel is an independent magazine carrying news and information about all groups and activities within the pro animal movement. We do not necessarily agree with every groups' campaigns but Arkangel has a policy to cover all actions carried out to help animals, regardless of the individual views of those who put the magazine together.

This principle of no censorship follows through to the Comment section where everyone can air their opinions and debate various views and issues within the movement. Through striving to resolve our differences we can work together to bring about the end of animal abuse with a far greater effect than we can ever have while we are constantly split by internal disputes and petty bickering.

Despite the no censorship policy, we are limited with space and sometimes articles will have to be left out or, more usually, held over to a later edition. Also, we will not include anything that is going to land us in court, such as libel or incitement to break the law, and the editor reserves the right to edit such articles accordingly.

A couple of other points - firstly, this is a magazine for the pro animal movement and all contributions should be relevant to the struggle for animals. Arkangel should not be used as a forum for AR people to argue about issues which do not effect the struggle for animal protection. A number of "anti-abortion" articles were received in reply to an article by Robin Lane in issue 3 and after much debate over whether we should put them all in or leave them all out we decided to compromise and include one, 'Life is Life'. We would urge readers in the strongest possible way to please stick to issues which are relevant to the struggle for animals. Secondly, Arkangel seeks to promote harmony within our movement and to argue the viewpoints but not to aim personal abuse at the writers. The 'Out of Touch' article in this issue is an example of not very serious, but nevertheless unnecessary rudeness to the writer of the views being criticised. For healthy debate all sorts of opinions are to be encouraged and writers should not be deterred for fear of insults. It is important for us to remember also that some Arkangel readers are new to the movement and perhaps we would be more tolerant if we recall our initial naively formed opinions. There is nothing wrong with criticism of the utmost severity, but the discussion of ideas is lost while we resort to personal slugging.

ONE

"NON-VIOLENT" TYRANNY

At an Animal Aid council meeting on 24/6/90 a resolution was adopted at which the society's council urged it's supporters "not to donate funds to...the ALF Supporters Group as we have no confidence that these funds will not be used to finance terrorist actions". And in a letter to AA contacts dated 12/7/90 Animal Aid Director Mark Gold expressed the hope that "your group will pass a resolution based on the one passed by Animal Aid council as that would make it easier for us to work with you". The resolution also stated that Animal Aid would only work alongside AR groups which publicly condemned "acts which are violent".

As could be expected, all this has caused no end of trouble for the Animal Aid hierarchy with many AA contacts not being prepared to toe the line and has diverted considerable time, energy and money away from the society's central task of campaigning for the animals. On the other hand, according to a recent ALF SG newsletter, all the resulting fuss has actually led to an increase in the SG's funds.

Despite the fact that this attempt by the Animal Aid council to split the movement and damage the ALF SG has seemingly failed, it cannot be left without comment, for it is yet another example of the hypocrisy of many people in animal rights who advocate "non-violence". It also shows a considerable lack of logic and common sense on behalf of the Animal Aid hierarchy. By "terrorist" actions the AA council are no doubt referring to such things as the June "car-bombs" (despite the fact that seemingly even the police now believe that the ALF was not responsible for these) but what evidence is there that money donated to the ALF SG goes to finance such things?

According to the SG it's funds are all used for perfectly legal purposes such as helping with the welfare of imprisoned activists and the financial costs of those fined by the courts. There is no evidence to the contrary and, indeed, given the high degree of police surveillance to which it is highly likely being subjected, the SG would be very foolhardy to become involved (even if only financially) in any illegal activity. If the SG were to be funding any illegal actions, these are really not likely to be anything that the Animal Aid hierarchy could possibly regard as "terrorist". The explosives used in past animal rights "bombings" were (according to the police) almost certainly stolen and an incendiary device costs only a few pounds to construct. On the other hand, by far the most expensive type of direct action is animal rescue, with all the costs of transport, rehoming and veterinary treatment to be taken into account. So if the ALF SG were funding direct action, this is the area that would almost certainly be receiving the funds.

MAN

by Ronnie Lee

Therefore had the campaign by the Animal Aid council succeeded it could have deprived many laboratory and factory farm animals of their chance of freedom. It would certainly have added to the distress of animal rights prisoners by depriving them of the money needed to finance their visits and to make life in prison a little more tolerable.

Violence comes in many guises and in a multitude of forms. It is not solely limited to the punch on the nose and the bomb. To throw somebody (rightly or wrongly) into prison and to keep them there is also a form of violence. Yet so-called "non-violent" campaigners have often advocated that animal liberationists who are "violent" should be handed over to the police. And now we have the Animal Aid council pursuing a course of action which, if successful, would increase the suffering of AR activists who are sent to prison.

The actions of those who recklessly plant bombs in the name of animal rights should not be supported - but, even if misguided, at least their violence is directed at the torturers of animals. The violence of the Animal Aid hierarchy is aimed at their fellow campaigners.

Whether or not violence is justified against animal abusers, let us not seek to protect those abusers through the use of violence against our own people. Let all of us in the movement at least learn to behave non-violently towards each other!

VEGAN DISRUPTION

It is sad to hear that the Vegan Society has become yet another pro-animal organization to suffer internal problems and that there was so much disruption at it's 1990 AGM that the business of the meeting could not be concluded. I know very little of what the dispute is all about but what I do know is that all those involved on both sides are vegans.

How can it help the animals for the aggro to continue? Cannot those at loggerheads get together and settle the matter amicably so that the good work of the Vegan Society can go forward smoothly? Surely it is the meat and dairy industries which should be suffering vegan disruption!

The tittle-tattle, gossip-mongering and even spreading of downright lies about fellow animal rights campaigners, which exists all too frequently in our movement, is bad enough as it stands, but when such lies and gossip are conveyed to an unsympathetic outsider for publication in a book, then that is surely totally reprehensible.

Unfortunately, that is obviously what has happened in the case of a certain paperback book which was published in 1989 and has no doubt been read by many Arkangel subscribers. The book purports to be "The Story of the Animal Liberation Front", but is in fact highly inaccurate in many places and contains numerous wholly untrue allegations against a number of animal rights campaigners.

The most serious of these allegations concern Dave Nicholls who helped to start the ALF Supporters Group in 1982. The book's author asserts that Dave had been Essex organiser for the fascist British movement up until at least 1981 and that he "had led a march of some eighty skinheads through Colchester, shouting 'siege heil' and giving Nazi salutes".

The truth is that Dave Nicholls never lived in Essex and that the fascist organizer mentioned in the book was a completely different person who happened to have the same name. However, rumours that they were the same person were circulating in the movement in the early '80s, having been started by persons who disliked Dave because certain aspects of the animal protection organizations of which they were officials had been criticized in SG bulletins.

The unscrupulousness of those persons has been revealed by the fact that they were even prepared to repeat the untruths to a non-animal rights person whom they knew was a journalist researching for a TV programme on the movement. The result of this slander (which turned to libel when later published in the book) was to cause further distress to a fine campaigner who worked himself to exhaustion for the animals despite a serious diabetic condition.

The book is not only evidence of the twisted mind of it's author, but also shows the depths to which some people in our movement will stoop in an attempt to damage and discredit other campaigners with whom they disagree. And yet how can it possibly help the animals when a person who dedicated his life to their protection is treated in such a fashion?

The answer, of course, is that it doesn't. Indeed, that it can do nothing but harm the cause of animal liberation. Only when all animal rights campaigners learn to treat each other with proper consideration and respect will our movement be able to operate with the efficiency and effectiveness required to win the animals their freedom.

Note: I deliberately have not named the book as I do not wish people to buy it and so provide the author with yet more undeserved revenue. It is sad that a book harmful to the movement has gained a good deal of it's income through sales to AR campaigners.

LOCAL GROUPS

Animal Aid (London Area)

ANIMAL AID (LONDON AREA)

(PO Box 254, London, E5 8TB)

Produced a booklet called 'Strictly Peaceful' outlining it's campaigning strategy. A protest was held outside London zoo against the killing of baby wallabies in experiments. The group has started a petition for their "Fund the NHS Not Animal Experiments" campaign. A public meeting was held on this subject and over 90 people attended and coverage was aired on Sky TV. The group's newsletter 'Biting Through' reports on the group and other animal rights events. The group now has 200 members throughout London.

ANIMAL RIGHTS CAMBRIDGE

(Box ARC, Grapevine Bookshop, Gwydir St, Cambridge)

Publishing it's monthly newsletter 'ARC News' informing on campaigns and events. The group are putting pressure on local travel agents to stop selling holidays which include visits to bull-fights. They are also running their own 'Whistle Blower' campaign with their own leaflet. With the start of the new student term the group launched a campaign against vivisection at Cambridge University and will be focusing on research sponsored by charities and encouraging such groups to change to alternative methods. ARC helped a motion to be passed at the University calling for the end of animal experiments and supporting students who object to being forced to take part in such experiments.

BOGNOR AND CHICHESTER ACTION FOR ANIMALS

The group have been busy with circuses. In late July on two separate occasions demonstrators at Gerry Cottles circus were assaulted. This was reported to the police and photos of the attacks were supplied as evidence and in August two circus workers were arrested. After the assaults over 40 demonstrators picketted the circus while it was at Hayling Island. In August demonstrations were held against Santus circus in Littlehampton, despite more assaults. One activist taking photos of the assailants was attacked in an attempt to steal her camera, but the attempt was foiled by biting the man's finger (not very vegan) and it was later possible to identify the attacker to the police - he was the one with the bleeding finger. A cine film of the incident was taken and many of the people who'd turned up to visit the circus went home in disgust at the strong arm tactics of the circus employees. 60 people turned up to hear a talk given by Mike Huskisson for the Animal Cruelty Investigation Unit. The group are also raising funds to buy a van for their hunt sab group. The group's membership has now risen to over a hundred.

BOURNEMOUTH ANIMAL AID

Two demos were held against Gerry Cottle's circus at Poole and the group got the council to remove illegally flyposted circus posters.

BOURNEMOUTH AND POOLE CIWF

The group protested at Poole harbour against the export of lambs and calves to the continent, 20,000 are exported each year. They obtained good media coverage.

Bournemouth & Poole Group protest against live exports.

BRADFORD ANIMAL RIGHTS

(PO Box 253, Bradford, West Yorks, B10 0RE)
Have been demonstrating outside Bradford University against the animal experiments carried out there.

BROMLEY AND ENVIRONS VEGETARIAN GROUP

On August Bank Holiday the group had a float promoting vegetarianism, which was a great success, and leaflets were given out on the carnival route.

BROXBOURNE ANIMAL RIGHTS

(PO Box 66, Broxbourne, Herts, EN10 6LU)

One member has received a writ for libel for remarks he made about bloodsports, all of which have video evidence to support them. A shop called 'Classical Look' selling L'Oreal products has become a major target for the group after the manager assaulted members and smashed their stall. The bad publicity about this event has meant that the shops trade is now almost non-existent.

CAMBRIDGESHIRE ANTI-BLOODSPORTS

(Box CABS, Grapevine Bookshop, Dales Brewery, Gwydir St, Cambridge, CB1 2LJ)

The group's excellent newsletter is now on it's 11th issue and keeps it's members up to date with news.

CAMPAIGN AGAINST CRUEL SPORTS

(PO Box 589, Bristol, BS99 1RW)

Supports the LACS in it's aims and organises stalls, collections, displays and talks.

COVENTRY ANIMAL ALLIANCE

(Box 1, Wedge Bookshop, 13 High St, Coventry, Warwickshire)

Holds many stalls and is investigating local cat stealing with patrols to catch the thieves. Leaflets are being distributed to persuade people to keep their cats indoors at night and watch out for the cat nappers.

DALRIADA ANIMAL AID

Demonstrating against Duffey's circus in different towns. When the group arrived at one circus, a clown came out to give out pro-circus leaflets and, at another, the local British Circus Federation official turned up to defend the circus.

DARTMOOR BADGERS PROTECTION LEAGUE

Produces factsheets about badgers and their habitats. The Secretary of State for the Environment refused an appeal against the refusal of Teignbridge District Council to allow permission to build a housing estate, which would have destroyed prime badger habitat on the edge of Dawlish. This decision was helped greatly by the League's opposition to the building plan. The group has badger sett patrols and is building up information on the location of badger setts all over Dartmoor.

DARTMOOR LIVESTOCK PROTECTION SOCIETY

Focusing on live export of animals and the results of the 1992 changes. Raises money for fencing to keep animals away from road black spots and it's annual report lists these areas.

DEVON WILDLIFE TRUST

Have asked the district council to join them in producing an education service and environmental records centre for wildlife conservation and a comprehensive system for the management of Devon's natural resources.

DEVON & SOMERSET ASSOC FOR DEER PROTECTION

Has it's own leaflet which explains it's stance and opposition to the hunting of deer and gives information on poaching and practical advice on what can be done to combat both.

DRAGON'S LAIR ANIMAL AID

Had many stalls at different events during the summer and also organised an Autumn Fair in Cardigan, money from which will go towards funding the group's activities.

EAST LONDON ANIMAL RIGHTS

(PO Box 216, Forest Gate, London, E7 9RB)

Has a meat-free diet campaign which is going well and is holding stalls in connection with this. They have drafted a pledge for the public to sign. In September a vegetarian meeting was held with speakers, film and vegan food. 70 people attended and the response from them was very promising.

FURNESS ANIMAL RIGHTS MOVEMENT

Organise regular benefit gigs to raise funds. A local hotel which held fur sales has now stopped, following a demo by the group. The group have just bought a van for hunt sabbing but are in need of donations to complete repairs on it before it is roadworthy.

GOSPORT AND FAREHAM ANIMAL AID

Lobbied MPs over live exports and attended demos at Portsmouth docks. In April a 600 signature petition was presented to the Licencing Committee calling for the closure of Cottage Patch Kennels. On 10th October the group joined the demo at Wickham Research Laboratories where wreaths were laid. Whereas in previous years local media had chosen to ignore such events, on this occasion good radio and newspaper coverage resulted. Afterwards members of the group went on to Cottage Patch Kennels where conditions were so bad that the animals held went down with Parvo Virus. A bottle of disinfectant was tied to the fence along with a note asking the proprietors to clean the place up. A letter of complaint about the drainage at the kennels has been sent to Winchester City Council.

HACKNEY AND ISLINGTON ANIMAL RIGHTS GROUP

(Box 17, 198 Blackstock Rd, London, N5)

Organised for an animal rights video to be shown in the high street window of their local Body Shop as part of the anti-L'Oreal campaign - this got them on the front page of the local paper. The group have started a campaign to close a zoo in a local park where animals have been injured and killed by thugs due to insufficient protection. In September the group leafletted outside the local Kentucky Fried Chicken takeaway and in October a public meeting was held against McDonalds and over 40 people turned up. On anti-McDonalds day several McDonalds were picketted.

HARROGATE ANIMAL RIGHTS CAMPAIGNERS

(PO Box 135, Harrogate, North Yorkshire, HG1 5AX)

In July a protest was held outside Hazleton laboratories to coincide with a presentation of the Queen's awards for Export Achievement. The group made it's own awards to Hazleton for 'Outstanding cruelty and exploitation and in recognition of the misery and pain of the 10,000 animals sacrificed each year in the laboratory.'

HEATON ANIMAL WELFARE SOCIETY

A new society set up in March 1990 and already on the third issue of their newsletter 'Animals Matter'.

HERNE BAY AND WHITSTABLE ANIMAL RIGHTS GROUP

(PO Box 50, Herne Bay, Kent, CT6 7PY)

Helped organise a demo at the Eastern docks in Dover against live exports. This was preceded by a march. Over 100 people attended.

HUNTINGDON ANIMAL CONCERN

A street theatre was held outside the main gate of Huntingdon Research Centre on the 31st July to coincide with the killing on that day of all the beagles in a toxicity test at the laboratory. The theatre involved over 60 people wearing beagle masks and others acting as vivisectors. On August 4th a march to Huntingdon Research Centre took place - over 1,000 people attended, marching the 6 miles to the centre where they listened to speakers including Sarah Kite and Chris Fisher of the BUAV, and were able to buy refreshments from Norwich Veggies Catering Campaign. The march received coverage on radio and TV and in local papers. The group had a two-day stall at the Riverside Fair in Bedford which raised over £170 and gained many members and another stall was held at the Ely Green Fair. The group is constantly being asked to look after all kinds of rescued animals, some injured and old, so they are looking for land for sale or rent within 5 miles of Huntingdon where a caravan could be sited and the animals looked after.

LAKELAND ANIMAL AID

(PO Box 83, Carlisle, Cumbria, CA1 3AR)

The group has been campaigning against McDonalds and has had good press response.

LEICESTER ANIMAL CONCERN

Produced the first issue of it's bulletin which includes reports on the group's visit to a 'free-range' farm where the conditions were little better than a battery farm. The group also attended the march to Huntingdon Research Centre and a lengthy report is in the bulletin.

LIFE BEFORE PROFIT

PO Box 110, Liverpool, Merseyside, L69 6AU)
Organised a talk with video on 'Alternatives to Fur and Leather' and had a Christmas Cruelty-Free Eat-In.

LONDON GREENPEACE

(5 Caledonian Rd, London, N1)
On October 27th the group held it's annual fayre, including many animal rights stalls. There was an 'Animal Liberation' workshop where ex-ALF activists gave their views on the future of the movement. Vegan food was supplied all day by Veggies Catering Campaign.

LONDON VEGANS

Holds regular meetings with speakers on subjects such as 'Veganism and Christianity' and 'Veganism and the Green Movement' and 'Lifestyle: A commitment to personal change'. Stalls have been held at various fairs and the catering for the Sutton Environmental Fair was provided on August Bank Holiday.

LOWESTOFT AND DISTRICT ANIMAL AID

(PO Box 22, Lowestoft, Suffolk, NR33 8LA)
Publishes a regular newsletter. Raised money at two local fetes in June. In July they held a leafletting day in Lowestoft town centre as part of the National Day of Action against L'Oreal, along with a bin where people could dump their L'Oreal products. An information sheet has been sent to local hairdressers asking them to boycott L'Oreal. Another leafletting and collection was held in Great Yarmouth and there is hope of starting a group there soon. A fundraising pub crawl was held in the town. In August an anti-bullfighting demo was staged and information sheets were sent to travel agents to assess their concern. Protest and leafletting against Gerry Cottle's circus was also held.

MAPG

MANCHESTER ANIMAL PROTECTION GROUP

MANCHESTER ANIMAL PROTECTION GROUP

(13 Paton St, Picadilly, Manchester)
Held a display outside travel agents with a bull and a matador to try to persuade travel agents to give out anti-bullfighting leaflets to those going to Spain on holiday. The group also gathered outside the Portland Thistle hotel in Manchester, where grouse was on sale, protesting at the start of the grouse shooting season. During a demo outside Jindo fur shop, members of the group walked into the shop wearing fur coats which had been splattered with blood. The group continue to receive much media coverage with all their activities. A street collection raised £430 and £100 was donated to a local animal sanctuary.

MIDDLESEX ANIMAL RIGHTS

Took part in an all-night vigil outside the National Institute for Medical Research at Mill Hill in May and have had a leafletting campaign against the lab. A local fur shop is closing down after extended protest and a campaign has been started against a local school where the animals are kept in bad conditions. A demo against the BFSS was held at Syon Park, leaflets were given out and a banner demo was held inside the grounds where hunting hounds were displayed. A lot of the public that were present either left or joined in with the demo.

MORECAMBE DOLPHIN CAMPAIGN

(PO Box 63, Lancaster, LA1 4GD)

Thanks to the group's well planned campaign, the dolphinarium which was Rocky the dolphin's prison has now closed down. The group also wants Marineland to hand over it's turtles, sea lions and alligators. The campaign has a newsletter which has vital information for those who wish to help, such as lists of addresses - available from the above address and please enclose a SAE.

Rocky the dolphin . . . set for retirement

NORWICH ANIMAL CHARTER

(PO Box 30, Norwich, Norfolk, NR1 4DT)

During the summer the group managed to have a stall nearly every weekend at local fairs. As part of their anti-fur campaign a petition of over 6,700 signatures was presented to the local Euro MP Paul Howell. The group has had stalls in the city centre and leafletting sessions with it's new pig leaflet, and a life size pig in a crate is being constructed to illustrate the message even further. The group is visiting every zoo in the region and is compiling a detailed report on each.

Newsletter of Norwich Animals Charter

PORTSMOUTH ANIMAL RIGHTS

(Box D, Time for Change, 167 Fawcett Rd, Southsea, Hampshire, PO1 0DH)

The group has been campaigning for several months against the export of live horses from Portsmouth Continental Ferryport. The group has produced it's own horse postcards and they organised a demo and over 40 people attended. Demos have been held against circuses which have entered the Portsmouth area.

ROSS ANIMAL RIGHTS

Organised a 'Cruelty-Free' education day with films, books, leaflets and sales goods. Took part in the Greenpeace 1990 whale walk.

SALISBURY ANIMAL CONCERN

Members protested outside Chipperfields circus where animals are used.

SHEFFIELD CAMPAIGN FOR ANIMAL RIGHTS

(PO Box 407, Sheffield, South Yorkshire, S1 1ED)
On the 'Glorious 12th' a demo was held on the Peak Moors against the start of the grouse shooting season. A video evening and sponsored walk were held in August as well as an anti-fur demo in Chesterfield. Regular stalls and meetings are held and a youth group has been set up.

SOUTH HUMBERSIDE ANIMAL RIGHTS CAMPAIGN

(PO Box 6, Scunthorpe, South Humberside, DE17 1HW)
Supplied information for a TV programme which exposed how salmonella illness was being caused by Unigate broiler units. In July a stall was held in connection with their campaign against the advertising of battery eggs. Donations from a stall they held in September were given to a Badger Group to buy surveillance equipment.

STEVENAGE ANIMAL RIGHTS

(Box 6, Bowes Lyons House, St. George's Way, Stevenage, Herts, SG1 1XY)
Still going strong with the Glaxo campaign. The Whistle Blower leaflet that they produced was photocopied by Glaxo and given to every member of their staff at their Ware site. The group's campaign to persuade people not to work for Glaxo has had some success - a secretarial post went unfilled at the lab and an estate agent refused to find accommodation for Glaxo engineers. The group holds a monthly picket on the first Monday of every month to welcome Glaxo employees to work. SAR's interesting newsletter is now on it's 12th issue.

SOUTH MIDLANDS ANIMAL AID

(3c Hanover St, Bromsgrove, Worcs, B61 7JH)
Formerly Bromsgrove Animal Aid, the group has changed it's name to reflect the fact that the majority of it's members come from a wider area. Public meetings are now held over a wider area too and attract between 30 and 50 people. The group held a Living Without Cruelty exhibition in August which attracted hundreds of people and got good press coverage.

SOUTH YORKS BADGER GROUP

Built more than a dozen reinforced badger setts throughout the county and badgers are beginning to re-establish themselves. Infra-red cameras are also in use. These setts are a counter to badger diggers and there have been three prosecutions.

SOUTH LONDON ANIMAL AID

(PO Box 594, London, SW9 8QG)
As part of the Whistle Blower campaign the group has held two demos outside the Institute of Psychiatry and the Kings College Medical School. The group has started a campaign against the pet trade with it's own leaflet which encourages people not to purchase animals from pet shops and breeders and to go to sanctuaries instead. The group is working to get local councils to strictly enforce the licensing laws regarding pet shops, which they do not appear to be doing at the present time. The group staged a demo at Covent Garden against an 'entertainer' there who tried to get passers-by to be photographed with a snake. The man was arrested and appeared in court because his documentation was not in order. He was charged with causing an obstruction.

SWANSEA ANIMAL RIGHTS GROUP

(PO Box 53, Swansea, SA1 1BN)
In June the group held a stall on Swansea Promenade to raise money to print more leaflets for their campaign against dog-fighting. In August the group held a 'Choose Cruelty-Free' week in which the BUAV exhibition bus visited the city. The event was very popular with local people, the bus was full all the time and 2,000 people signed petitions against cosmetic testing on animals. Leaflets were given out and a collection was held. Also a public meeting was held on cosmetic testing, with a talk and a video. A fund raising walk for lab animals was organised in a local park, an animals charter was presented to the local council in the Autumn and a tour of talks in schools, with videos, leaflets and T-shirts, is in progress.

SURREY AND HANTS ANIMAL RIGHTS COUNCIL

organised a picket in Petersfield Square to highlight a farm breeding animals for laboratories because the farmer wants to expand his operation.

SWALE ANIMAL RIGHTS

Succeeded in their campaign to persuade the local council to ban circuses with animals on council land. A well attended Open Day raised funds and the offer from the local mayoress to open the event was rejected by the group because of her associations with bloodsport enthusiasts. SAR Press Officer Angela Walder appeared in the local press arguing with the local MP Roger Moate about his hypocrisy over animal rights issues.

THANET ANIMAL RIGHTS

In August a demo was held against Cottle's circus and their performances were very poorly attended.

WARWICK ANIMAL RIGHTS

(Students Union, Warwick University, Coventry, CV5 7AL)

Produces a lengthy and interesting mag called 'WAR' which covers all aspects of animal rights. Available for 10p plus a large SAE.

WINCHESTER ANIMAL CONCERN

Campaigning to end live horse exports before trade barriers in Europe are lifted in 1992. They are distributing leaflets and are lobbying the local MP. Hundreds of people have signed their petition.

Wirral & Cheshire Badger Group

Registered Charity No. 513984

WIRRAL AND CHESHIRE BADGER GROUP

(PO Box 19, Warrington, WA2 8TG)

The group is a registered charity and produces a quarterly newsletter which gives information on helping badgers and also gives the car numbers of known baiters and diggers to look out for. The group holds regular displays around it's county region.

WORCESTER ANIMAL RIGHTS

Goes street collecting once a month. In June the group made donations of £50 to the ALF Supporters Group and £40 to a local animal sanctuary. A protest against Gandey's circus was held and 'cancelled' stickers appeared on their posters. 75 shop owners were persuaded to remove their posters. In August the group attended the Huntingdon Research Centre demo.

ANIMAL BIRTH CONTROL

ANIMAL BIRTH CONTROL

(2 Festing Buildings, Southsea, Hants, PO4 9BZ - 0705 736691)

The aims of ABC include campaigning for pet registration, the passing of legislation for compulsory neutering for animals at risk, licensing for all dog breeders and the implementation of neutering clinics with the backing of local councils. A bi-monthly newsletter is published keeping members informed of all events surrounding the society's aims and is hard hitting in some of its comments on other groups. All donations to the society are used for the purpose of setting up neutering clinics. Administration is not funded by public money. ABC runs many fund raising efforts and had a very successful stall during National Pet Week at the Animal Antics Day at Staunton Park, Havant, where nearly £200 was raised and much interest shown in ABC'S aims, leaflets and newsletters.

AFTER YOUR BLOOD

Long-standing Vegan Society member Harry Bonnie maintains a list of vegan blood donors prepared to give blood when required. If you wish to be on the list send your name, address, telephone number, blood group and type to Harry Bonnie, 20 Stephenson Rd, Hanwell, London, N7 1NW.

ANGLICAN SOCIETY FOR THE WELFARE OF ANIMALS

(10 Chester Ave, Hawkenbury, Tunbridge Wells, Kent, TN2 4TZ - 0892 25594)

Aims to keep the christian and church community informed of the abuse of animals and to organise action against it.

ANIMAL AID

(7 Castle St, Tonbridge, Kent, TN9 1BH - 0732 364546)

A joint video with CIWF called "Meathead" has been distributed with no commentary but with music by artists including Lene Lovich, Finitribe, MDC and Jazz Butcher. There is some excellent footage shot by animal activists featuring scenes of factory farming. Anti-L'Oreal information stalls were on display at the venues of all the UK tour dates of singer Belinda Carlisle.

ANIMAL AID & ADVICE

ANIMAL AID AND ADVICE

(49 Sirdar Rd, London, N22 6QS - 081 889 9714)
Aims to encourage responsible pet 'ownership' and neutering of cats and dogs. The society also rehomes homeless animals.

ANIMAL CONCERN (SCOTLAND)

(62 Old Dumbarton Rd, Glasgow, G3 8RE - 041 334 6014)

The group's new campaign is called 'Target 2000' with the aim of seeing the end of animal experiments in the UK by the year 2000. The group has produced leaflets and petitions to back up this campaign. Animal Concern is expanding its work to cover campaigning against bloodsports and now has a voluntary anti-bloodsports campaigning officer. A picket was mounted at the office of American Express as part of an international day of action against the promotion of fur coats in the Amex members magazine. Strathclyde regional council is being approached to change its policy on supplying halal meat to schools - the animals are brought from Bradford metropolitan council. The group is advising a boycott of the Third Eye arts centre in Glasgow due to its use of animals - a crab was enclosed in a very small tank, an 'artist' sat on stage clothed in living snakes and one python got lost in the building. A campaign has been started to get airguns put on the firearms legislation. Members have been picketing hunt balls and point-to-point meetings.

ANIMAL CRUELTY INVESTIGATION UNIT

(PO Box 8, Halesworth, Suffolk, IP19 0JL)
Formed in June 1990, the group's aim is to investigate animal abuse and if possible see offenders prosecuted. Where the laws are too out-dated the evidence will be used to encourage parliament to create effective legislation. Failing all else it aims to see those who abuse our fellow creatures vilified in the media. No wages are paid - money comes from selling successful investigations to the media or national organizations. One of the group's first investigations was into Professor Feldberg and his assistant John Stean, vivisectioners at the National Institute for Medical Research. Since then they have both voluntarily handed in their licenses to experiment on animals.

ALF SUPPORTERS GROUP

(BCM 1160, London, WC1N 3XX)

The newsletter now covers information about all activists imprisoned for animal rights actions, not just ALF, now that Support Animal Rights Prisoners (SARP) has closed down and the SG has taken on its important work. Due to the recent upsurge in ALF and related actions and the inevitable resulting arrests, the SG's funds are stretched helping to pay fines, court costs, the travelling expenses of prisoners' visitors, and paying for books, cruelty-free toiletries and other prisoners' needs, and they are currently appealing for more donations.

ANIMAL WELFARE AND ANIMAL WARFARE

John Curtin, ex-ALF activist, and Robin Webb, RSPCA council member, have been touring the country with a very popular public debate, arguing the tactics of the ALF and the RSPCA. The debates have been organised in different areas by local animal rights groups.

Animal Welfare Trust

(Tyler's Way, Watford By-Pass, Watford, Herts, WD2 8HQ - 081 950 8215/0177)

The Trust has boarding kennels near Watford and this is its headquarters and rescue centre. It has a large gift catalogue which is important for raising funds. Another aspect of its work is Pet Concern which helps to provide financial assistance towards boarding fees for the pets of senior citizens while they are ill. There is also an emergency pet care scheme for all members, offering short term care for pets in an emergency.

ASSOC FOR ENVIRONMENTALLY CONSCIOUS BUILDERS

(Windlane House, The Pump Field, Coaley, Glos, GL11 5DX)

Have designed an Owl Brick and Box which keeps bad weather out yet gives owls access to a nest box in the loft space of houses to which it is fitted, as part of their efforts to halt the decline of the Barn Owl due to the decline in traditional barns for nesting. Entrance brick costs £25 and nest boxes cost £35, both available from the association.

BARN OWL TRUST

(Waterfleet, Ashburton, Devon)

Volunteers have begun building a new aviary block at the charity's HQ. One aviary will be used to house a pair of disabled Barn Owls that the Trust is looking after and which are now breeding.

BRITISH . DIVERS

MARINE LIFE RESCUE

BRITISH DIVERS MARINE LIFE RESCUE

(10 Maylan Rd, Corby, Northants - 0536 201511) In August a team of seven with a van and an inflatable dinghy went to the Faroes with funding from the LACS and Care for the Wild. They found what had long been suspected but till now had remained unproven, that dolphins are being killed in the Faroes outside of the official recorded numbers. BDMLR can mobilise a dolphin or seal rescue operation at very short notice. They also have a mobile display, sometimes including their special sea-life rescue inflatables, which goes to public events.

BRITISH Hedgehog

PRESERVATION SOCIETY

BRITISH HEDGEHOG PRESERVATION SOCIETY

(Knowbury House, Knowbury, Ludlow, Shropshire, SY8 3LQ - 0584 890287)

Issued press releases and information just before Guy Fawkes night urging people to check their bonfires for hedgehogs as the animals choose such places to hibernate. The group's new 'Hogalogue' is out, listing many useful and amusing items which members can buy to aid in the society's fund raising.

(16a Crane Grove, London, N7 8LB - 071 700 4888)
The BUAV conference 'bandwagon' attended the Green Party conference in April where an exhibition stand had some impact and a talk was given at a fringe meeting. A joint campaign with PETA against L'Oreal has brought a great deal of publicity and interest from the public. Recently the BUAV has been more active in the political arena and a full-time political researcher has been employed. A parliamentary bulletin is published three times a year to be sent to MPs and political contacts. New posters, leaflets and postcards have been produced featuring a rabbit drawn by a 'Spitting Image' senior designer and model maker as part of a European campaign against cosmetic tests. The BUAV has forged links with other European anti-vivisection groups to collect 2 million signatures demanding an end to the tests. Euro-wide advertising, publicity events and political lobbying are also playing a part in the campaign. The BUAV has published a book called 'Secret Suffering, Inside a British Laboratory', Sarah Kite's account of the time she spent working undercover in Huntingdon Research Centre. The book is available from the BUAV at a cost of £4.95 plus £1 p&p. On 19th August the BUAV held its 'Walk for Laboratory Animals' which comprised of national walks in 14 areas around the country as well as over 100 locally organised walks. The theme of the walk was the BUAV's campaign to end cosmetic testing in the European community and the sponsor money will bring over £60,000 to the organization.

CAMPAIGN AGAINST LEATHER AND FUR

(Box 17, 198 Blackstock Rd, London, N5)
The group has extended its work to include wool, meat and silk industries and now produce ten different stickers at a cost of 100 for 50p. There is also a new poster opposing the meat industry and other posters are in the pipeline.

CARE FOR THE WILD

(1 Ashfolds, Horsham Rd, Rusper, West Sussex, RH12 4QX - 0293 871596 Fax: 0293 871022)
The Marine Turtle project is working in the small town of Skala, on the south eastern tip of the island of Kefalonia, part of Greece. Here Loggerhead turtles are studied by a group of biologists. The turtles are being disturbed and harmed by tourists and the project's leaflet gives guidelines to prevent the impact of visitors. A special fund has been launched to investigate the use of elephant skin for shoes, bags and wallets.

CARE FOR THE WILD DEFENCE FUND

(1 Ashfolds, Horsham Rd, Rusper, West Sussex, RH12 4QX - 0293 871596 Fax: 0293 871022)
A non-profit making company founded to exert pressure and undertake lobbying which charities are not permitted to do. The aims are similar to the registered charity Care for the Wild, to fight cruelty and exploitation of wildlife by all legal means and to make the public aware of the problems faced by wildlife and the suffering that they endure. After the defeat of the 'Protection of Badger Setts Bill' the Fund are increasing their efforts to support badger protection groups with funds and equipment and to form more groups. The Fund is selling a book called 'The Rose Tinted Menagerie' by William Johnson, about dolphinariums and circuses, which have been investigated with painstaking detail. The book costs £8.95 including p&p.

THE CATS PROTECTION LEAGUE

(Brunel House, Newton Abbot, Devon, TQ12 4PU)
Celebrates its 60th anniversary with a book called 'A Passion for Cats' which includes advice and information for cat care and other cat related issues. Each section is by a different author and there is a forward by Desmond Morris. Royalties go to the League and the book is available from them for £9.95 plus £1.28 p&p. The Truro and District branch of the League has also published a booklet by their president, Helena Sanders, called 'Too Many Cats' about her experiences in cat rescue work. It costs £2.95 plus 50p p&p. All profits go to the Truro group.

CELIA HAMMOND ANIMAL TRUST

(13 Tonbridge Rd, Hildenborough, Kent, TN11 1BH)
A member has left £186,000 in his will to the Trust which will be used to establish clinics offering a cheap neutering service for strays.

CHICKENS' LIB

(PO Box 2, Holmfirth, Huddersfield, HD7 1QT)
A new campaign called 'Turkeys Against Christmas' is aiming to draw attention to the cruelty involved in turkey production and it will continue after Christmas. The group wants considerable improvement in conditions and special attention will be focused on a report on pre-stun shock, an accidental shock not strong enough to render unconsciousness. The first success of the campaign has been the end of the annual 'Heavy Turkey Auction' organised by the British Turkey Federation. A new leaflet for Christmas included a recipe for a festive nutroast.

THE CHURCH AND THE ANIMAL KINGDOM

Rev. James Thompson, St. Clements Publications, 14 Cluny Square, Buckie, Morayshire - 0542 32312) A booklet called 'The Bible, The Church and The Animal Kingdom' is subtitled 'A serious indictment of christendom'. It's written by the Rev. James Thompson and is aimed at all denominations of the christian church, making an argument for all churches to have more involvement in animal issues. The booklet costs £2.49. The author has written others on the subject of the church and animals and has also produced his own leaflet condemning bloodsports from a christian point of view.

COMPASSION IN WORLD FARMING

(20 Lavant St, Petersfield, Hants, GU32 3EW - 0730 64208/68863 Fax: 0730 60791)

The society's Agscene magazine has just celebrated its 100th issue. A video called 'Meathead' has been produced with Animal Aid. The petition on the Status of Animals in the EEC has reached over half a million signatures. The society is calling for the export of live animals for slaughter to be ended under the treaty of Rome. The call was supported by MPs and celebrities. CIWF's youth group, the Farm Animal Rangers, has produced its second magazine.

CRUSADE AGAINST ALL CRUELTY TO ANIMALS

(Humane Education Centre, Bounds Green Rd, London, N22 4EU - 081 889 1595)

Publishes its magazine 'The Living World' quarterly. The Humane Education Newsletter (HEN), aimed at educationalists in Britain and Europe, has been launched. A new leaflet, 'The case for a GOOD dog warden service' argues for a warden scheme which would benefit the dog population and the community as a whole. The leaflet is part of the 'Better Deal for Dogs' campaign and bulk orders are available. Crusade has part-funded two investigators from the Environmental Investigation Agency who went to Japan and detailed the plight of dolphins and porpoises in Japanese waters. The society wants the International Whaling Commission to protect all species of whales. The headquarters of the Crusade is the Humane Education Centre which is the only centre of its kind in the UK, possibly in the world, which has the specific aim of promoting humane standards of behaviour in the treatment of animals.

ELEFRIENDS

(162 Boundaries Rd, London, SW12 8HG - 01 682 1818)

In Tanzania they now have the first Eletruck to repair vehicles involved in the fight against ivory poachers. The ex-MOD Bedford truck has been converted into a mobile workshop to repair other trucks and machinery. The Girl Guides are helping Elefriends to raise funds and the society has launched a group for children between the ages of 5 and 11.

(208-9 Upper St, London, N1 1RL - 01 704 9441)

In June the EIA published a report of the killing of dolphins, porpoises and small whales throughout the world. They appealed to the Japanese prime minister to stop the mass killing of Dall's porpoises, which are being hunted to extinction in Japanese waters. An in-depth report has been produced on the trade in wild-caught birds for pets and it supports a resolution of the European parliament to ban the trade.

FIGHT AGAINST ANIMAL CRUELTY IN EUROPE

(19a Stanley St, Southport, Merseyside, PR9 0BY)

Mainly campaigns against the live export of horses and farm animals from England to Europe. Urges people to write to their MEP about the changes due in 1992 when even the few protection laws there are will be dropped.

FRAME

(34 Stoney St, Nottingham, NG1 1NB - 0602 584740 Fax: 0602 503570)

The Anniversary appeal of the Fund for the Replacement of Animals in Medical Research has proved very successful, with donations coming from companies and individuals. The total so far stands at £229,000. The three largest donors, at over £25,000 each, came from the Body Shop, The Maurice Laing Foundation and Unilever plc. A survey on the use of primates in labs published by FRAME and the RSPCA condemns most of the research as poorly reported and with little or no concern for the distress and suffering caused, and reports that three quarters of lab primates have been trapped in the wild.

GREENPEACE

-071 354 5100)

A list has been drawn up of resorts for people to avoid because of damage caused to wildlife by tourism. Greenpeace is leading a study of bottle-nosed dolphins in Cardigan Bay as part of their efforts to protect the animal and they intend to build up a photographic record of all the dolphins in the area to get an idea of their numbers. A free festival was held on Clapham Common in July as a publicity and fundraising event.

Humane Information

HUMANE INFORMATION

(PO Box 47, St. Leonards-on-Sea, East Sussex, TN38 0FT)

Established in September 1990 to publish factual and objective material on animal rights issues. Their first leaflet 'Are You Concerned About The Exploitation Of Animals?' explains why ordinary people have felt compelled to intervene directly on behalf of exploited animals, something not usually addressed in other educational and campaigning literature. Further educational material is planned (a leaflet on captive animals is in hand) and more funds are required to continue to produce the literature, which so far has been heavily subsidized.

HUNT SABOTEURS ASSOCIATION

- 0602 590357)

Marketing Designer Ware Vegan Boots, ideal for hunt sabbing and other animal work, for £36.30. After its recent problems the HSA is now on a sound footing and has started giving out loans again to local sab groups to help pay for equipment. The HSA youth group 'Foxcubs' is re-vamping its sales goods - the group is for children aged 7-14. See 'Hunt Saboteurs' section for information about hunt sabotage.

HUNT SABOTEURS INTERNATIONAL

(PO Box 148, Belfast, Northern Ireland)

A new organization with two aims - to act as a centre for the collection and distribution of information and resources for anti-hunting groups and, secondly, to establish a network between groups internationally, encouraging action and co-operation. The HSI also hopes to concentrate on stopping fur imports. The organization has been set up as a decentralised body without hierarchical structures or formal membership beyond a federation of those groups who wish to be a part of it. Regional contacts are required and a contact list is being compiled. The HSI asks for support from sab groups and individuals.

INTERNATIONAL DOLPHIN WATCH

(Parklands, North Ferriby, Humberside, HU14 3ET)

A non-profit organization for the study and conservation of dolphins. One project set up at Cambridge University recorded 12,000 dolphin sightings and the information will be used to measure changes in dolphin populations and to find out if conservation measures are working. IDW sells a video called 'Bewitched By A Dolphin' which is a true story of a young bottle-nose dolphin called Simo. The video is 50 minutes long and costs £14.95 plus £1.05 p&p. The group also sell three books, 'Follow A Wild Dolphin', 'The Magic of Dolphins' and 'Tale Of Two Dolphins', all by Horace Hobbs, prices vary.

INTERNATIONAL LEAGUE/PROTECTION OF HORSES

(Overa House Farm, Larling, Norwich, Norfolk, NR16 2QX - 0953 717309/717882 Fax: 0953 717411)

The latest campaign of the International League for the Protection of Horses is against the changes which will come in the transportation of horses when the 1992 EEC laws come into being. The League has offices and representatives in many overseas countries where problems are often worse. These include France, Mexico, New Zealand, Greece, Israel, Australia and Morocco. In Britain the League has four rest and rehabilitation centres with over 800 animals under care and protection. There is a quarterly newsletter for members which gives up to date information on the League's work and its centres around the country and abroad.

INTERNATIONAL WILDLIFE COALITION

(PO Box 73, Hartfield, East Sussex, TN7 4EY - 034282 5482)

Still fighting the slaughter of seals off the coast of Canada and has discovered that the same happens on an island called Jan Mayen, above Iceland. A project called 'Whale Patrol' has been started and it's first aim is to get a patrol vessel which can operate offshore for extended periods. The cost of the vessel will be between £85,000 and £125,000, with a full-time crew of three. After the initial costs the project will cost over £200,000 per annum. The vessel will be used to prevent illegal fishing practices which will harm whales and to educate fisherman about whales. The group campaigns against ivory, kangaroo slaughter and the fur trade as well.

THE JEWISH VEGETARIAN SOCIETY
AFFILIATED TO THE INTERNATIONAL VEGETARIAN UNION

(853-855 Finchley Rd, London, NW11 8LX - 081 455 0692)

Has a dining room at it's headquarters where you can get a three course meal or a snack. It also has a take-away service. The society produces a quarterly magazine for it's members which keeps abreast of news and current events. There is a JVS representative in most western countries and membership is open to everyone.

KARMA BADGES

(18 Richmond Rd, Oxford, OX1 2JL - 0865 53769)
Produces badges for animal rights groups and campaigns. All profits from the sale of badges are put to animal rights work. Has now moved to the new address above.

LABORATORY ANIMALS PROTECTION SOCIETY

(16 Thistleworth Close, Osterley, Middlesex, TW7 4QQ)

Still campaigning to get the silver spring monkeys at the National Institute of Health in the USA to be released to animal activists.

LEAGUE AGAINST CRUEL SPORTS

(83/87 Union St, London, SE1 1SG - 071 407 0979)

Five men who tortured and killed three badgers were imprisoned in September. David Shaw, Trevor Limb, Mark White, Shaun Williams and Darren Leach dug out badgers and set dogs on them, during which a terrier was badly injured. A LACS investigator infiltrated the group and video taped the incident. The thugs received 3 months each imprisonment and were banned from keeping dogs for 2 years. LACS brought the prosecution under the Badger Protection Act and the Protection of Animals Act. Following an extremely successful appeal for the Alfoxton Sanctuary, two open days attracted over 600 visitors. Four hunters who were found guilty of causing an affray after an incident with the LACS sanctuary manager have failed in their appeal. They were each fined £100.

LYNX

(PO Box 300, Nottingham, NG1 5HN)

In October a Lynx fashion show was held with support from leading designers. Three Lynx T-shirts have gone on display at the Victoria and Albert Museum. Lynx organisers have received writs for libel from the Swales Moor Mink Factory for daring to call it a 'Hell Hole'. The solicitors issuing the writs do the same for fox hunts against saboteurs and others who act against bloodsports. Lynx has issued writs for libel against Ann Mundell, the chair of the animal welfare committee (!) of the Fur Breeders Association who has claimed that Lynx incites violence. Lynx is opening an office in Los Angeles, USA, and has set up a 'US Campaign Fund' to help support this. A '60 Minutes' programme is being screened in the US about the society in the UK.

NATIONAL PETWATCH

(PO Box 16, Brighouse, West Yorks, HD6 1DS)

Have received a number of threatening and abusive letters. And one of the group's investigators was told 'Quit or we'll finish you off'. Please give as much support as possible to help National Petwatch in their fight against the trade in stolen pets for fur and laboratory use.

(51 Harley St, London, W1N 1DD - 071 580 4034/ 631 0612 Fax: 071 436 2367)

A stall was held at the first Green Consumer exhibition in London in May and in Birmingham in June. The video 'Suffer The Animals' was shown continuously and the NAVS publicity figure rabbit called 'AD' made personal appearances. NAVS representatives got a good response at the Birmingham show when they pointed out to the organisers the inappropriateness of the stands that were present exhibiting live animals such as toads and tortoises and a falconry display was removed and the stall was cancelled after objections from NAVS staff. On the first day thousands of schoolchildren with their teachers attended and a great number of the new 'Animals Defenders Teachers Resource Pack' were distributed.

NURSES ANTI-VIVISECTION MOVEMENT

Hillcrest Cottage, 2 Hillcrest, Uppertown, Bonsall, Derbyshire, DE4 2AW - Wirksworth 4664)

Founded to bring together those in the nursing profession committed to the abolition of animal experiments. It acts as a publicity and information resource centre for individual members. Some nurses, due to organizational pressure, find it hard to openly express their views and the NAVM gets letters and articles published under its own name.

OPERATION FUR FACTORY

(PO Box 87, Rochdale, Lancs, OL16 1AA)

The group now has a full list of all the fur farms in England and is constantly updating the list. It is appealing for any information on any fur farms, old and new, in order to keep files up to date. A copy of the list is available from the PO Box.

ORGANIC FARMING AND WILDLIFE PROTECTION

(High Rigg House Farm, St. John's Chapel, Bishop Auckland, Co. Durham, DL13 1QT)

Calling on people to stop buying newspapers due to the immense waste involved - over 17 mature trees for one small van load of newspapers alone.

THE OTTER TRUST

(Earsham, Nr. Bungay, Suffolk, NR35 2AF - 0986 3470)

Promotes awareness of otters and maintains otters in semi-natural conditions for research and education of the general public. Aims to breed otters for introduction into the wild and supports field studies of otters to collect factual data to help in conservation.

PAGAN ANIMAL RIGHTS

(23 Highfield South, Rock Ferry, Wirral, D42 4NA)

Produces a quarterly magazine which aims to promote the links between animal rights and paganism and campaigns against all forms of animal abuse.

PLANTS FOR A FUTURE

(The Field, Higher Penpoll, St. Veep, Nr. Lost Withiel, Cornwall, PL22 0NG - 0208 873554)

A vegan project which aims to demonstrate the wide variety of useful commodities such as food, fuel, medicines etc. that come from plants rather than animal exploitation or environmental destruction. Hoping to soon become a registered charity. Welcomes help from anyone interested in self-sufficiency and living in harmony with the environment.

RSPCA

(Causeway, Horsham, West Sussex, RH12 1HG - 0403 64181)

In August an International Conference on Animal Welfare and the Environment was held at Oxford Town Hall. The society mounted spot checks with Department of Transport officials on vehicles going to Hertford cattle market. Road blocks were set up and all livestock trailers were stopped - the first time such an operation has been mounted. A police spokesman said that there were offences on all the vehicles stopped and summonses are to be issued in some of the worst cases. The South Devon branch has received planning permission to build a £250,000 centre to include kennels, cattery and admin block, as well as a wildlife reserve and education resource centre. The RSPCA has launched six cartoon characters to combat animal cruelty and will appear in books, magazines and on TV. The characters are led by a bionic tortoise called Neil Shellstrong and include Princess Meow, a reformed alley cat, Barf, the dog with real muscle, Brains, a hyper-intelligent goldfish and Polygon, the crazy parrot who can mimic anything.

RSPCA WATCHDOG

(44 Kingsley Rd, Horley, Surrey, RH6 8RH - 0293 786166)

Two more members have been elected to the RSPCA council supported by Watchdog. The group is campaigning against bloodsport participants being given RSPCA membership and it played a part in preventing a hunt member being invited to open a new RSPCA kennels in North Yorks. It is also campaigning against Princess Anne being invited to give awards at RSPCA events and is trying to get improved treatment of animals at RSPCA kennels.

ROYAL SOCIETY FOR THE PROTECTION OF BIRDS

(The Lodge, Sandy, Beds, SG19 2DL)

Held a conference on marine wildlife where it asked the government to examine fishing policies and to set up a coastal management to have control over fishing and prevent sea birds getting caught in fishing nets. In a survey published by the RSPB half the members of the public that were asked said that the government was not doing enough to protect marine wildlife. The society has bought a 175 acre area of grazing marshes near Woodbridge, Suffolk, for £120,000, and is to turn it into a nature reserve. The RSPB is calling on European Community governments to stop the massacre of millions of 'protected' birds, especially goshawks, buzzards and turtle doves, by enforcing legislation against the indiscriminate killing of migratory birds in Southern Europe. It has also asked landowners and bird watchers to look out for one of Britain's rarest birds, the stone curlew, so it can be protected against farming accidents. Many are killed by farm machinery.

SWAN SONG

PO Box 3, Beccles, Suffolk, NR34 0DF)

Formerly Swan Rescue Service Europe, the organization has a new name as well as a new address. Dedicated to the caring of swans and campaigns against actions that endanger them (eg. fish hooks, lead fishing weights). It aims to provide sanctuaries and information about swans and swan welfare. It also campaigns against other forms of animal abuse. Merchandise and a newsletter are available.

TEACHERS FOR ANIMAL RIGHTS

(29 Lynwood Rd, London, SW17 8SB)

Has an information pack for student enquirers which lists some of the major organizations in the animal rights movement and has a list of pro animal books. It also lists things that school pupils can do to aid animals and prevent suffering. It has a separate information pack for teachers.

TRUST FOR THE PROTECTION OF REPTILES

(College Gates, 2 Deansway, Worcester, WR1 2JD - 04868 7550)

Founded in 1989 and became a registered charity in 1990. It's prime objective is the protection of reptiles and their natural habitats. As part of their aims the TPR is actively involved in a) conducting investigations into the problems of reptile welfare and conservation and then co-ordinating campaigns to end exploitation, b) maintaining communication with influential organizations and individuals, c) funding non-harmful field and other research, d) education, in particular through dissemination of it's own scientific and popular publications and the reports of others, to authorities, scientists and the public and e) offering consultancy services. The Trust has recently published a book with financial aid from The David Shepherd Conservation Foundation called 'Reptiles - Misunderstood, Mistreated and Mass-Marketed'. The book is by Clifford Warwick and has a forward by Tom Regan and is available from TPR for £2.30. The book debunks myths based on superstition and ignorance and catalogues some of the atrocities that reptiles are subjected to which are so horrendous that they have had confirmed snake "haters" feeling outraged.

TURNING POINT

(PO Box 45, Northolt, Middlesex, UB5 6SZ)

The magazine continues as the leading independent animal rights campaigning magazine and is now on it's 19th issue. It is appealing for donations from groups and individuals to help it to continue. Subscriptions are £5 a year. The mag has also produced it's own T-shirt with the slogan 'Smash the Shackles - Ban Animal Circuses', with a photo of a chained elephant from Mary Chipperfields circus. The cost is £6 for a large T-shirt and £6.25 for extra large, plus 50p p&p.

VEGAN BUSINESS CONNECTION

(Whole in the Wall, 23 Wellfield Court, Bangor, Gwynedd)

After 2 years of discussion the Vegan Business Connection has been formally constituted by Plamil Foods, Whole in the Wall (Vegan Wholefoods) and Wholesome Trucking. Full membership is open to vegan businesses with at least one vegan proprietor, associate membership is open to strict vegetarian businesses with at least one vegan proprietor. For a copy of the constitution and an application form send 50p in stamps.

VEGAN SOCIETY

(7 Battle Rd, St. Leonards-on-Sea, East Sussex, TN37 7AA - Tel and Fax: 0424 427393)

In the process of approaching all companies listed on it's database, concerning microbiological testing, where meat, slaughterhouse products and milk are used in product testing. It is also encouraging the development and adoption of a non-animal microbiological test. Investigations continue in liaison with the Vegetarian Society UK Research Section. The Vegan Society recently introduced a new range of merchandise including a colour poster, a 'Vegans Go All The Way' T-shirt and humorous cards.

WHICH?

The Which? Guide to Planning and Conservation (published by the Consumers Association and Hodder and Stoughton £8.95) says that protesters must become more professional to beat developers wanting to build on green sites and gives examples of the successes of campaigning groups. It also recommends taking pre-emptive action to deter builders, such as creating nature reserves or leisure sites on wasteland.

WORLD SOCIETY/PROTECTION OF ANIMALS

(Park Place, Lawn Lane, London, SW8)

Moved to it's new address in October. The anti-bullfighting poster has been displayed at airports around the country. The society's conservation programme in Africa is sponsored by Sheraton Hotels and aims to supply two land-rovers and other supplies to strengthen anti-poaching units of the Nigerian Conservation Foundation in the Yankari Game Reserve. The Soviet Union is targetted this winter for an anti fur campaign.

ZOO CHECK

(Cherry Tree Cottage, Coldharbour, Nr. Dorking, Surrey, RH5 6HA - 0306 712091)

Launched the 'Eden Lost and Found' project at the National Garden Festival to help abused and neglected chimpanzees and protect and conserve the wild chimpanzee population in it's native habitat. A survey of European zoos has helped to bring about a European Commission directive which demands improvements. The Thomson and Cosmos holiday firms are no longer featuring Zoolandia on Tenerife after a feature on the horrors of the zoo in a recent Zoo Check newsletter. Zoo Check now are investigating public complaints about zoos in Greece, Crete and Cyprus. The organization has a new logo and an expanded team of workers.

The ALF carries out direct action against animal abuse, rescuing animals and causing financial loss, usually through the damage and destruction of property, to animal abusers. ALF actions are illegal and therefore activists work anonymously, either individually or in groups, and do not have any centralised organization or address.

Slogans daubed on one of the Simpson vehicles, among them 'Meat is Murder.' (1196).

CHESHIRE

In July an attack on a sausage factory in Stockport caused an estimated £20,000 damage. Seven delivery vans had their tyres slashed and windscreens broken and were daubed with the slogans "Meat Is Murder" and "ALF". A week later the company were still having to use hire vans. Two cars from Lomas Foods received similar attention. On 16th September the Northern A4 ALF cell raided Adlington Poultry Farm, a battery unit near Stockport. After drilling through walls and cutting locks to gain access, and then dealing with seven security cameras, the activists rescued eighty-two hens, smashed hundreds of eggs and painted slogans.

DERBYSHIRE

On 8th July £2,500 worth of damage was caused to grouse shooting butts in Glossop. Cancellation stickers were stuck over posters advertising Jay Miller's circus, in Glossop, because the circus uses animals.

DORSET

An incendiary device was placed under the premises of a saddlery business near Dorchester belonging to members of the South Dorset Hunt. The device was defused by an army bomb disposal team. In August the Wessex Fly Fishing School near Tolpuddle was destroyed by fire caused by an incendiary device, along with two anglers' cabins on the River Frome.

ESSEX

On 1st July five vehicles belonging to a farm in Ashingdon which sells eggs had their tyres slashed and windscreens smashed.

HAMPSHIRE

A furriers car in Portsmouth was paintstripped. In Fareham Fish and Leather shops were paint-bombed. In July Town Mayor Chris Evans found that the front doors had been glued up when he arrived to officially open the new McDonalds in Basingstoke. On 7th August damage was caused to buildings and vehicles during an arson attack at a Mattessons meat depot - one lorry was completely destroyed. Also in August graffiti was sprayed on a Portsmouth meat wholesale factory. As part of the campaign against L'Oreal four different stores selling L'Oreal products had goods tampered with and warning labels attached. On 9th August two butchers' windows were smashed. On 16th September a fire was started at a Portsmouth meat factory in Horndean, which destroyed the roof and the plant room. A storage area was severely damaged and smoke entered the chiller, ruining £4,000 worth of meat. Overall, £50,000 damage was caused by the fire. Locks on the meat chiller were broken and "Pig Killers" and "ALF" were painted on the factory wall. Slogans were painted on road signs protesting against the Hampshire Country Sportsmans Day, a BFSS event.

HERTFORDSHIRE

On 13th August all the front windows of a Little Chef in Radletts were smashed and "ALF" was painted on the remaining glass.

HUMBERSIDE

In July there was an arson attack on two vans belonging to Hedon Foods and later in the month a hoax bomb was left on a ramp of the main loading bay and "ALF" was daubed over walls and on one of the firm's vans, which had had all its windows smashed. The police had the suspect device blown up in a controlled explosion. On September 29th a fire was started at the plant.

LANCASHIRE

The ALF visited the home of convicted badger digger Keith Simpson in July and removed seven terriers - three of the dogs were badly mutilated and all of them needed veterinary treatment before being rehomed. Locks and a door had been smashed to get to the dogs. In court Simpson had also been found guilty of ill-treating his dogs. In a press release the ALF warned of further action against Simpson and co. The following month a return visit was made and Simpson's car was paintstrippered, the front windscreen was smashed and all four tyres were slashed. In July in Bury all the tyres of a van belonging to Openshaw Fishmongers were slashed and four articulated pig transporters belonging to Danish Bacon Independent were attacked, thirty tyres were slashed, windscreen wipers were removed, wiring was cut, bodywork was paintstrippered, sump oil was poured in the fuel tanks and the meat freezers were turned off. In Bury £2,200 damage was caused to windows of Dewhurst and Bennets butchers' shops and two other poultry shops were painted with graffiti.

MANCHESTER

A large mirrored window at Stretford McDonalds was catapulted on the 12th July.

NORTH YORKSHIRE

In March a butcher's shop in Dewsbury was broken into, blue liquid was sprayed over the meat and equipment and £1,000 in cash was taken.

NOTTINGHAMSHIRE

On 3rd November six ALF activists broke into the beagle unit at 'The Priory', Thurgarton one of Boots the Chemist's vivisection laboratories. Despite the security fences, cameras, lights and patrolling security guards, the group rescued eight young female beagles. All are now in caring homes having been treated for mange and having had their identifying tattoos removed by a sympathetic vet. The press release that followed this raid warned that this was the start of a campaign of mass destruction by the ALF which will only end when Boots stop abusing animals. The police warned vets not to handle the rescued animals.

OXFORDSHIRE

A brick thrown through a window of Aldens butchers in Oxford caused £1,300 damage.

SHROPSHIRE

In July a man convicted of cruelty to dogs received a threatening letter. He drove, with the letter, to the police station to report the incident but was under a driving ban which had one more week to run. On his way home from the police station he was stopped by the police, fined £325 by Wolverhampton magistrates and banned from driving for 4 months.

SOMERSET

Vehicles belonging to Chipperfield Bros circus were damaged when the circus visited Bridgwater in July - one car was paintstrippered and others were sprayed with paint. Damage was estimated at £600.

SUFFOLK

A fire at Whepstead Chicken farm on 3rd July devastated the farm building.

SUSSEX

In August acid was thrown over cars at the Noah's Ark garage in Cowfold and slogans were painted on windows, and the Bentall Country Sports shop in Horsham was also damaged with paint - both companies are trade members of the BFSS.

WARWICKSHIRE

On August 18th in Nuneaton, Betteridge Butchers had slogans sprayed on the metal covers of the front windows and the uncovered upstairs and side windows were smashed.

WEST YORKSHIRE

On 24th June three butchers had their shop windows smashed in Huddersfield. Damage to one of the premises alone was £1,000. A window of a fishery was smashed, valued at £400. On the days leading up to the Glorious Twelfth five gunshop windows were smashed and the locks were glued up and slogans were sprayed. On 23rd August eleven butchers windows were smashed.

WORCESTERSHIRE

Posters advertising Gandey's circus were defaced and others had 'Cancelled' stickers stuck across them when the circus visited Lower Wick in July.

NORTHERN IRELAND

In September the greyhound racing track at Dungannon was fire bombed. The fire destroyed the hare and control box, the refreshment rooms, Grandstand, tote building, bar area and general office. Damage was totalled at a quarter of a million pounds.

CANADA

For the third time in two months Paul's Poultry was painted with slogans which read 'Meat Is Murder' and 'ALF is watching and there is no place to hide'.

GERMANY

At four mink farms hundreds of mink were released and an empty mink farm near Minden was destroyed. In the most recent raid in the Duren district, 6,000 mink were liberated when over 2,700 cages were opened. Though many mink were recaptured over 4,000 remained free.

The liberation also messed up the farm's breeding programme and the owner, who was not insured, lost an estimated £75,000. This was a second blow to him because at the end of 1989 he had to close his fur shop in Euskirchen because of a decline in business. At the beginning of 1990 slogans were painted on a slaughterhouse in Peine.

HOLLAND

The Dutch ALF (Dierenbeurijdingsfront) rescued rabbits from the flower bulb investigation lab in Lisse. They were being injected with various substances to show the presence of viruses or bacteria in ornamental plants. The group also broke into an animal feed testing lab at Barneveld, taking large amounts of documents and a computer. Five activists were later arrested in connection with this action. Thirty-four beagles were rescued from an experimental animal breeding centre in Zeist and twenty-three dogs were rescued from the Rijks university labs in Gronigen. The animals were in bad condition and were definitely former pets.

USA

The ALF rescued six rabbits scheduled for Draize eye irritancy tests at the Dawson Research Corporation in Florida.

HUNT SABOTEURS

The HSA exists to take non-violent direct action against all bloodsports ranging from illegal ones such as dog-fighting to supposedly prestigious ones like foxhunting and staghunting. The HSA's strength lies in its network of local groups - over 1,000 saboteurs are active every Saturday, and often mid-week as well. Both local groups and the national HSA are always in need of support, financial, moral, active or whatever.

As mentioned in Arkangel 3, sabs from all over the country joined up for hits on the opening of the grouse shooting season. None of the "target" moors were shot, and sabs were present in such numbers and with such skilled organisation (as we say in the trade) that several extra moors were sabbed as a bonus.

Meanwhile, down in the south, sabs were finishing off the season's minkhunts. Things got progressively worse for the Ytene MH, with less and less support and more and more sabs. Their meet at Puddletown attracted about 10 of the former and more than 60 of the latter: not surprisingly they went straight home. The Devon and Cornwall MH had the misfortune to meet sabs from Torquay and Exmouth: sabs took their hounds immediately, and went on to outmanoeuvre the hunt all day. And sabs from Bath and Bristol caught the Four Shires MH on an invitation meet courtesy of the Ytene MH. The hunt proceeded to take hounds along the riverbank at a pace much too fast for hunting. Not surprisingly they went home with no kills. The last minkhunt of the season was yet to come, however. After a good morning with the Surrey Union FH, North Downs sabs went in search of their local beagle pack - but they found the Wealden MH. Never ones to be choosy, they started sabbing them instead. Rather unsportingly the minkhunters packed up and went home.

Grouse shooters blockaded!

'Howl'

Cubhunting started on August 7th in the New Forest, and 35 bleary-eyed but enthusiastic sabs were there to greet the hunt. The New Forest "boys" were there too, fully kitted out with CB radios and lumps of wood etc. Sabs were not to be deterred, however, and the day finished with the hunt in complete disarray. As August progressed, the hunt became increasingly desperate in their attempts to have a few sab-free meets before the proper season. First they tried changing hunting days, but to no avail. Then they tried hunting in the evening instead of the morning, but again without success. Eventually they gave up on trickery and "normal service" was resumed. Meets were attended by sabs numbering anything from two to thirty or more, and New Forest HSA say that it's been their best cubhunting season yet.

By early September most of the other hunts in southern England had started cubbing. Several packs weren't out on Saturdays (I wonder why) but this cunning ploy only meant that they were visited mid-week instead. The unlucky East Sussex and Romney Marsh FH were sabbed every time they ventured out of their kennels. Police in West Sussex had a collective brainstorm in September and decided that sabbing is illegal and arrested every sab they could find. Subsequent bail conditions specified that defendants could not attend hunt meets - these have now been overturned, and most charges have been dropped. Numerous civil actions against West Sussex police are now pending.

Elsewhere the Old Surrey and Burstow were dealing with sabs in their own time-honoured fashion - with sticks, boots, fists etcetera. One sab was taken to hospital and a member of the hunt has been arrested. The next week over 80 sabs showed up at the kennels with roughly the same attitude as Our Boys in the Gulf: let's kick ass. Unfortunately the hunt heeded the advice of the police and didn't come out.

Up in the East Midlands the Lincoln group was starting a season that would see every hunt in Lincolnshire visited before Christmas. The Burton FH at least didn't appreciate this attention. After a particularly successful morning (for sabs, not hunt) hunt supporters' tempers finally snapped. With the immortal words "Let's have these bastards" the assembled bloodsports fiends re-enacted the Battle of the Somme. The sabs made a tactical withdrawal to their vehicles and disappeared before anyone was hurt. One irate supporter hurled his thermos flask (!) at a departing car, denting the door panel. Well, it takes all sorts...

In the West Midlands several new groups have been set up, and sabs have been out regularly against their local hunts (as well as travelling all the way down to the Ytene MH). The favourite this year has been the Albrighton, whose new master David Parker is currently recovering from a heart attack. Sabs say it was nothing to do with them, but rumour has it that the next one will be!

Up in the Northwest the various Cheshire packs have been suffering from their usual trouble - too many sabs. Hunt staff at the Cheshire Forest FH have started carrying CBs about with them, because they're so used to having to look for hounds (who can have taken them?). Either that or the hounds have become so disobedient that they've had to instal radio controls in their heads... Meanwhile the local police have calmed down considerably, after the recent fiasco where sabs were accused of "terrifying sheep". Instead they're directing their efforts more sensibly at the ultra-violence merchants from the North Staffordshire FH. And finally, a request for sympathy for the poor huntsman at the North Staffordshire Moorland Beagles. He was so overwhelmed by sabs' presence that he boxed up and went home, his eyes filled with tears.

Groups in Oxfordshire have been as active as ever, with the Old Berkshire FH being the most common victim. They've also managed to take in a variety of other packs, of course: the Bicester with Whaddon Chase provided one of their sabs with a split head - "very messy, but about time she was blooded", to quote the group themselves.

Meanwhile, further Southwest, the Bath group has attended nearly 50 different meets, taking in between 25 and 30 separate packs. The Duke of Beaufort's FH as usual have seen quite a lot of sabs, as have local hare hunts. Sabs came across one of the whippers-in from the Clifton Foot throwing beagles across a small river. Ever helpful, sabs tried to do the same to the whipper-in. But since they're only weedy vegans, they only got him halfway. (Sadly, he could swim.)

Readers of Arkangel may recall that the bloodsports fraternity actually gave up a day's hunting in November to encourage their members to attend the National Trust hunting votes. This left sabs with nothing to do - or so they thought. However, one enterprising group realised that the various packs owned by public schools would still probably be out. They found the Eton College Beagles, and got stuck in. The hunt packed up within 15 minutes and called the police. Over an hour later (when the police had arrived) they tried again. But by then more sabs were arriving, and they soon gave up for good.

And speaking of giving up for good: three cheers for Mr Goschen, whose pack is folding at the end of this season - admittedly Mr G himself died last year. Perhaps the only sensible hunter is a dead one.

Overpaid, Overfed, Oversexed, and Over There (Thank God).

In October of 1990, American hunt saboteurs went into action against bow hunters. They chose Wisconsin as their venue because it is one of the most popular areas for bow-and-arrow hunting. Also, it has just passed a hunter harassment law - the 36th state to do so - and the sabs hoped to provoke a court case which would have the law ruled unconstitutional. The hunters, however, knew what they were up against, and didn't show up. It was only a brief respite for Wisconsin's deer, though, the gun season will have started by the time Arkangel goes to press, and American sabs will be out there sabbing it.

Sea Shepherd

The Sea Shepherd ship, the 'Sea Shepherd 2' was subjected to a sabotage attack on its engines in June causing £40,000 damage. After a superhuman effort the vessel was able to set sail only two months later and proceeded to the north of Hawaii where two Japanese drift netting vessels were rammed on August 13th. The collisions disabled the drift netters net retrieval cranes and four other drift netting vessels fled the area.

The Dolphin Rescue Brigade, part of Sea Shepherd formed to "actively interfere with the capture of dolphins and whales for public display", went into action in the Bahamas on June 27th.

Five members cut down over 300 feet of fencing and released over ten dolphins which were part of a swim-with-the-dolphins attraction at Great Guana Bay. Ludwig Meister, 'owner' of the dolphins, claimed that five were recaptured or returned of their own accord, and that they must be happy or would not have returned, to which Ben White of DRB responded "So don't rebuild the fence, then see how long they stay".

In August the group were in the Gulf of Mexico and successfully obstructed the capture of a mother and baby bottlenose dolphin by Gulf World amusement park. Despite it being illegal to capture those animals, the three DRB members involved have been prosecuted. Their defence centres on the right of concerned individuals to interfere with the commission of a crime.

OTHER DIRECT ACTION GROUPS

In September Vegans for Animal Liberation caused £2,200 worth of damage to Bennett's and Dewhurst's butchers shops in Bury's Princess Parade. Windows and doors were smashed and "VFAL" was painted. Slogans were also painted on two other poultry shops nearby.

On 4th April locks of fur shops in Amsterdam, Den Haag, Rotterdam and Utrecht, in Holland, were glued up by a group called Louse in the Fur.

Twenty shooting stands were hacked down in the district of Donnersberg, Germany, by a group called the Forest Ants who said in a statement that they "would not tolerate animals in the woods being butchered". In Offental the Autonomous Animal Protectors pulled down eight hunting platforms with a chain attached to a powerful car. In Hossbach the group rescued four guard dogs from a mink farm and in Lambach-Wels they destroyed twenty hunting platforms with chainsaws.

SANCTUARIES

ANIMALS AT RISK SANCTUARY

(341 Ashcroft Rd, Luton, Beds LU2 9AE)

The sanctuary, run solely by vegans, seeks funds for isolation pens. Any donations gratefully received.

BRIGHT EYES ANIMAL SANCTUARY

(Beagh, Ballinamallard, Co. Fermanagh, Northern Ireland BT94 2AS - 0365 81 8885)

Established in December '89 by Patrick Nolan, it is the only animal sanctuary in the west of Ireland and it's work is especially difficult because it operates in a farming community which has little regard for animal rights. At the sanctuary the animals come first, Pat lives in a caravan while the animals occupy the cottage. There are now about 50 permanent residents but there are always others being rescued, neutered and rehomed. No healthy animal is ever 'put down'. Funds are desperately short and the sanctuary is asking for donations or support of their long-term sponsorship scheme which would guarantee a regular income.

CENTRAL ANIMAL RESCUE

Has neutered two colonies of cats and has rehomed over 50 'pets'. At present they have only two foster homes and many more are needed for the amount of animals being dealt with.

THE DONKEY SANCTUARY

THE DONKEY SANCTUARY

(The Slade Centre, Sidmouth, Devon, EX10 0NU) Has employed a full-time farrier to deal with donkeys feet in the UK and Ireland. A new site has been bought at Wood Farm and donkeys are already being homed there - this land is especially needed as the number of donkeys received at the sanctuary is on average 10 a week. A sanctuary set up in Lamu, Kenya, is going well.

FRESHFIELDS ANIMAL RESCUE CENTRE

(East Lodge Farm, East Lane, Ince Blundell, Liverpool L29 3EA)

Runs a sponsor scheme - £5 to sponsor a cat, £10 for a pony. Buildings can also be sponsored - £500 will equip, heat and light a kennel. A plaque on that kennel records the donor's contribution. The centre is in need of blankets and jumpers for animal bedding as well as newspapers, plastic and metal buckets for animal feeds, dog collars and leads and plastic dog beds. Further to the inclusion of Freshfields in the last issue of Arkangel, we would like to make a correction and point out that the centre is not in danger of having to close, and we apologise for any concern that may have been caused.

HEAVENS GATE ANIMAL RESCUE CENTRE

(West Henley, Langport, Somerset TA10 9BE - Langport 252656)

Clifton Financial Management Ltd are sponsoring the centre to the tune of £500 a month for staff wages as the sanctuary say it has become hard to survive on voluntary help alone. The centre is cutting back on animals on-site till proper finances can be worked out and work on buildings is done. Normal work on rehoming animals, and home checks, will continue. A bi-yearly newsletter is produced.

HOPEFIELD SANCTUARY

(697A Green Lane, Dagenham, Essex RM8 1UU - 081 590 6273)

Has moved onto a new site which has more space and stables so that all the animals can come in at night, particularly important for those that are old and those needing special treatment. A newsletter is produced.

THE PHYLLIS HARVEY HORSE AND DONKEY TRUST

('Tethers End', The Ring Rd, Weetwood, Leeds 16) Set up over 25 years ago primarily to care for horses and donkeys but many other animals have been taken into it's care, neutered and rehomed. There are at present over 350 animals in it's care. Animals can be sponsored - for £5 a year sponsors receive a certificate and a story about the animal adopted. The trust is always in need of clean newspapers, towels and, most of all, blankets.

SANCTUARIES HELPERS LIST

(29 Castle Rd, Whitstable, Kent CT5 2DZ)

Sanctuaries that would like to receive visitors and/or helpers can write to Chris at the above address for inclusion on a nationwide list.

WILDLIFE HOSPITAL TRUST

(1 Pemberton Close, Aylesbury, Bucks HP21 7NY - 0296 29860 Fax: 0296 437373)

Founder Les Stocker was awarded the Rolex Award for Enterprise with the title 'Laureate' for his work with the trust and other related projects. He was also awarded a Rolex chronometer and 50,000 Swiss francs which he has chosen to use to set up a reference library at his new teaching hospital. The trust is appealing for BP Life-style vouchers, hardcore, corn, indigenous plants and seeds, goats colostrum, building materials, stationery, microwave oven (for heating orphan feeds) and stainless steel bowls. The trust asks people not to kill injured road casualty toads but to get them to the trust for care. They also encourage people to take pliers with them on country walks to cut up snares that they encounter. The trust receives many animals whose injuries result from snares. The trust has now set up 'Tiggy's Club' for under 16s.

FRANCE

There is now a small, but growing, vegetarian movement in France where up until recently very few animal protection campaigners have been vegetarians, and anti-meat eating banners were in evidence at a Paris demonstration against animal abuse in June.

L'Action Vegetalienne (Vegan Action) is a new French organization opposed to all forms of animal abuse and which supports both direct action and more traditional forms of campaigning. It's bi-monthly bulletin is available in English as well as French as are it's leaflets.

(Action Vegetalienne, 2 allée Louise XVI, 59600 Maubeuge, France)

The magazine "Quelle" removed all fur goods from it's mail-order catalogue for autumn/winter 90/91 and now sells only artificial furs.

There has been a very good reaction from the public in France to a series of programmes about animal abuse presented by Brigitte Bardot, who said that following the programmes "hunters have sent me their hunting licences, tourists have burnt their ivory bracelets, doctors have supported me in my battle against vivisection and the sale of horse flesh in France has fallen by about 30%".

MADAGASCAR

Conservation International has secured a $5 million debt-for-nature swap with Madagascar to finance an inventory of endangered species. Most of the native plants and animals on the island are at risk from logging and slash-and-burn farming.

MEXICO

The Mexican government has warned the country's zoos, notorious for animal smuggling, that any elephants imported in violation of the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species will be confiscated. Fuerzas Ecologicas de Liberacion Animal (Ecological Animal Liberation Forces), one of the country's most active animal protection groups, have recently introduced stunning equipment to the Guadalajara slaughterhouse, got a federal ban on poisoning wildlife and organized protests against hunting and circuses.

GERMANY

The District Court in Frankfurt made legal history by finding a vivisector guilty of cruelty to animals. The court fined the experimenter DM800 and ordered her to make a donation to the local animal welfare society after she seriously injured laboratory rats while force-feeding them at the Frankfurt Centre for Anaesthesia and Resuscitation.

In 1989 sales of fur in Germany dropped by just on 19% and in 1990 the largest German mail-order company "Otto Versand" removed all fur products from it's catalogues. In Frankfurt, the leading fur store Gerson announced in August 1990 that it would be closing down at the end of the year. The owners stated that the closure was almost entirely due to heavy losses suffered as a result of animal welfare campaigns. The Minister President of the state of Hesse refused to accept the title of patron of the International Fur Fair which takes place in Frankfurt every year.

3,000 experimental dogs will be saved every year because of a special doll, representing a seriously injured person, invented at the University of Munich. Doctors will now be able to practise emergency surgery on the doll instead of on dogs.

(Gaia - Autumn '90)

The first demonstration by animal protection campaigners from East and West Berlin took place on Sept 8th. The State Government of Hesse has adopted a 20-point animal protection plan which includes the reduction of animal experiments, opposition to the keeping of fur animals in cages and to cruel conditions and methods in circuses, better conditions for farm animals and more support for wildlife and domestic animal sanctuaries.

SWITZERLAND

Swiss organizations campaigning for a new referendum calling for the total abolition of animal experiments in Switzerland succeeded in collecting more than 100,000 signatures from the public within a period of 6 months, which were handed in at the Federal Chancellor's office in Berne at the end of October.

In response to protests from animal protection groups the US Navy has suspended its plan to use bottle nosed dolphins to guard a nuclear submarine base near Washington. The dolphins would have been fitted with nose-mounted guns and explosives to kill enemy divers. One trainer said "When they were supposed to ram us with the guns, they either swam away or put their snouts on our shoulders, very affectionately".

Experiments on dogs at Chicago's Cook County Hospital have reportedly been suspended after a long letter-writing campaign. Fort Wayne, Indiana, has banned leghold trapping at the request of the Indiana Fund for Animal Education. At the urging of the Texas Humane Information Network, Texas has passed laws requiring exotic pets to be licensed by the State Dept. of Parks and Wildlife, which may discourage their acquisition, and requiring riding stables to be certified by the State Dept. of Health, which is to set care and sanitation standards for the horses. The number of cows on farms in New York State has fallen to 776,000, the lowest level since 1930. In settlement of a California Superior Court lawsuit, Doktor Pet Centres Inc. has agreed to set up a $50,000 fund to make restitution to people who bought sick puppies, to donate $100,000 to Californian humane societies and to hire a veterinarian to inspect Californian Doktor outlets. George Bush has signed a bill requiring new US tanker ships to be double-hulled, to prevent oil spills. The New York state fair scrapped a planned balloon launch after NY Governor Mario Cuomo became worried that sea turtles and waterfowl might choke on fallen balloons.

Evans, once the USA's no. 1 furrier, has reported losses of $13 million in 1989, and 1990 was also a year of record losses for the furriers with nearly half the stories in fur trade publications being about bankruptcy. Two of the USA's leading catalogues, Lands End and Spiegel, also no longer sell fur. After PETA, the Lake City Humane Society and the local Sierra Club filed complaints with Columbia County Florida, the local authority's plan to eradicate beavers in the area was halted. After PETA wrote to the organizing committee of the 1990 Goodwill Games at the Huskie Stadium in Seattle, plans to release 500 doves while a pyrotechnic show was in progress were shelved. Following complaints by AR campaigners about the Yellville, Arkansas, "Turkey Drop" in which live turkeys are dropped from airplanes at the town's annual autumn festival, the event's sponsors cancelled the cruel spectacle. After a letter-writing campaign to Western Illinois University about its use of live turtles in teaching, the university has agreed to adopt non-animal anatomy and physiology teaching methods and to permanently stop all turtle experiments.

The Farm Animal Reform Movement co-ordinated vigils, protests and vegan dinners for the homeless in over 120 areas to mark World Vegetarian Day and World Day for Farm Animals (Oct 1st and 2nd). Activists in Pennsylvania persuaded 7 local restaurants to stop serving veal and a vegan shopping mall fair at Fort Myers, Florida, attracted 2,000 visitors.

FARM President Alex Hershaft and several supporters block the entrance to the U.S. Department of Agriculture to protest the Department's sanction of factory farming.

The Dept. of Veterans Affairs has ceased funding research on the use of monkeys to assist quadriplegics. Los Angeles, California, has banned animal sacrifice after over 300 incidents of the practice were reported in the city in 1990. The Equity Group, a meat supplier to McDonalds, has laid off 54 workers, reportedly because of falling hamburger sales. Florida has barred commercial fishermen from using aircraft to spot schools of mullet. In October, In Defense of Animals won a court injunction against the US Navy's plan to poison squirrels at the Concord, California, Naval Weapons Station - IDA argued that the Navy's chemical bait could also kill endangered kit foxes and salt harvest mice.

PRISONERS & DEFENCE FUNDS

BRAMPTON THREE

On 28th October two men were arrested in Brampton, Cambridgeshire, on suspicion of ALF activities. A number of incendiary devices were found in the vehicle driven by one of them. The next day another man was arrested in Coventry and all 3 have been charged with having explosives and have been remanded in custody. Mike Shanahan, HD2664, Barry Horne, HD2665, Gari Allen, HD2670, HMP St Loyes, Bedford.

RONNIE LEE

Still serving a 10 year prison sentence after being convicted in February 1987 of conspiracy to cause arson, conspiracy to commit criminal damage and conspiracy to incite others to commit criminal damage - all in connection with Ronnie being the Animal Liberation Front Press Officer. Ronnie Lee, VO2682, LB2 Clyde, HMP Channings Wood, Denbury, Newton Abbot, Devon TQ12 6DW.

FRAN TRUTT

Sentenced in the USA to 10 years in prison, suspended after 32 months, and 3 years probation. Fran was accused of planting a pipe bomb in November '88 near the parking area of the Chairman and Chief Executive of US Surgical Corps where live dogs are used to demonstrate surgical stapling techniques. Fran Trutt, 199 West Main St, Niantic, Connecticut 06357, USA.

NEIL THEOBALD

Arrested on 27th September and charged with arson and criminal damage in connection with incidents in Portsmouth and Southampton in June when vehicles belonging to a slaughterhouse equipment firm and a meat wholesale firm were set on fire. After being remanded in custody in Winchester jail, Neil was released on bail in December.

MARTIN MASTERMAN-LISTER

Charged with arson after a horsebox, used to transport horses to a foxhunt, was set on fire in Hampshire on 25th September. Currently on bail.

SIMON RUSSELL

Faces eight charges of making and possessing explosives after two incendiary devices were found when police searched his home in Tunbridge Wells on 18th July. After being remanded in custody in Canterbury jail he was released on bail in October. The case will be heard at Maidstone Crown Court on 18th March.

DAMAGE RESULTS

Pleaded guilty on 5th November to damaging egg lorries in Weymouth to the tune of £12,000. One of the 5 also pleaded guilty to planting a hoax bomb. He was ordered to carry out 240 hours community service, the others were ordered to do 120 hours community service each. All were ordered to pay £86 each towards court costs.

JOHN CURTIN AND TIM O'DONNELL

Committed to trial charged with the burglary of 82 beagles and 26 rabbits from Interfauna lab animal suppliers in Cambridgeshire.

US ARRESTS

Three men have been charged in the States in connection with the ALF break-in at the Oregon University 4 years ago when over 150 animals were rescued.

BOOTS 43

43 people face charges of conspiracy to commit burglary, criminal damage and public disorder following an inspection by the Animal Liberation Investigation Unit of the Boots vivisection lab at Thurgarton, Notts.

Obituary

RICHARD E. (RICK) KING

Rick King, dive team director of the Sea Shepherd Society, died of a heart attack on 1st May 1990. Rick King provided Sea Shepherd with a wealth of diving experience and knowledge. His early diving experiences were in the '60s as a US Navy Aquanaut and part of the Mercury Astronaut Recovery Team, a unique group of divers responsible for safely recovering astronauts after their space capsule 'splashed down' into the sea. For recovering astronauts Gordon Cooper and Walter Schirra, Rick was accorded a personal thank you from President John F. Kennedy. While Rick campaigned fiercely against the destructive coastal gill nets that are still allowed along the California coast, he also used his artistic talents to educate young people through colouring books, cartoons and lectures. His unique ability to paint underwater (to closely simulate colours as they appear in their natural environment) has been featured on TV programmes - he used a special non-toxic paint so as not to poison the fish that occasionally nibbled at his submerged palette. Rick often said how privileged he was to be part of Sea Shepherd. The privilege, say Sea Shepherd, was theirs.

BADGER PROTECTION

We are introducing a new section to Arkangel to include articles giving advice and information which will hopefully be of some help within varying aspects of animal work. In this issue our article looks at work involved in helping to protect badgers.

This article deals with what's involved in being a member of an existing Badger Group, and includes some ideas on how to set up a group if there isn't one already in your area.

So - as a member of an existing Badger Group, what does an ordinary member get up to? Most groups find it practical for members to look after a particular sett or group of setts. That way, duplication of effort is avoided and you achieve good consistent coverage. Let's say you've got two setts to look after. The first thing, and this is absolutely vital, is to complete a full written sett survey report when you start looking after it. This involves a very full written description of the sett, it's OS grid reference, possibly a drawn plan and as much detail as possible. Include things like the number of entrance holes, and signs of current use. This will include:-

- 1) Dung pits - Small, shallow trenches dug near the entrances, used as a toilet area. Droppings will be in evidence.
- 2) Bedding - Badgers regularly change their bedding and will drag out old grass, bracken, hay or straw and leave it in piles near the entrance holes.
- 3) Tree trunks - Check tree trunks near the sett. These are often used for scratching, and will have long claw marks on them.
- 4) Paths - Near the sett you should be able to trace the paths often used by the badgers.
- 5) Hairs - If the paths cross under fences, especially barbed wire, and round each entrance hole, check for trapped hairs. Keep them in a jar, labelled and dated.
- 6) Actual observation - This is a bit trickier but without doubt is the most rewarding. Keep a written note of how many badgers, whether adult or cubs. Photography will probably be difficult, as badgers usually come out at dusk. But do photograph all the above mentioned other signs of habitation.

Apart from all this, you should of course keep a very keen eye out for snares, traps and any signs of digging. Depending on where the sett is located, get used to what vehicles regularly use the area. Learn their registrations, and familiarize yourself thoroughly with regular walkers in the area, farmers, workers, neighbours. Discreetly find out their attitude to badgers. If it's positive, enlist their help. Don't trespass on private land. Apart from farmers wielding shotguns, you could be in real danger if the land forms part of a shooting syndicate and you accidentally wander into the middle. Landowners such as the National Trust, Forestry Commission, local Nature Trusts, and some local councils will often employ specialist wardens to look after their land and wildlife, and it's worth getting their co-operation.

So why should you write a miniature "War and Peace" on your local badger sett? If (a big if!), the sett is ever dug, a digger's defence will usually be that he is legitimately digging for foxes. The morality of this is another question, but unfortunately it is perfectly legal.

WARNING:- Foxes do sometimes take over dis-used badger setts. Also, if the sett complex is very large, they will inhabit a "wing" of it if there are badgers at the other end. Foxes are always distinguishable by the smell round the hole, and will often leave piles of bones lying around the mouth of the hole they're using. Again, try looking for hairs/footprints round the hole mouth to help distinguish which animal is living in what hole.

You have to be prepared to stand up in court and be an expert witness to testify that the sett is used by badgers and, more to the point, was in use by badgers at the time that the diggers went there. This is where your magnum opus comes in. If you supply your notes, photos, hairs etc. and records of regular visits, you stand a real chance.

This is very much a last resort and you should be aiming to stop digging wherever possible. Go out to the sett(s) as often as possible. You should be looking out for groups of men with dogs, shovels and, possibly, long poles. Most terrier men keep their dogs in boxes when travelling by car. Assuming you see or hear something suspicious, what should you do?

Local police forces vary in the importance they attach to diggers. To be fair, some police men are very keen and will be extremely helpful. Others may not. So try the police and also, if possible, get the RSPCA Inspector out as well, using their emergency phone no. Well-prepared members make a point of getting to know both local police officers and RSPCA Inspectors. This helps if it comes to the crunch. Take as much detail as possible. The reason for getting the RSPCA in is that sometimes they will bring a private prosecution if the CPS doesn't bother.

Now, should you confront the diggers and/or immobilize their vehicles? This is very much a personal decision and depends a lot on the number of men involved and whether you are ready for a potentially violent situation. If you think you know the vehicle involved, letting the tyres down will prevent them making a quick getaway, and isn't too disastrous should you have chosen the wrong vehicle. Other quick methods include a potato in the exhaust. Again, how much further you go depends on you and the circumstances.

The other threat to badger setts comes from fox hunts. Hunt terrier men will block setts to prevent the fox running to ground, and are not always too efficient about unblocking them again afterwards. If there's hunting in your area find out when they meet near your sett, and make sure the sett is OK. Also, if a fox should run to ground in a badger sett, it is against hunt rules, but does happen, that terrier men will have a go at digging it out. If you see this happening, threaten to report the hunt concerned to the MFHA. Contact LACS for further advice on this aspect.

Apart from all this practical side, most Badger Groups meet about once a month. They often organise slide shows, and walks for new members to show what a badger sett looks like and advice on how to tell it apart from a fox earth etc. Usually members have a pretty good idea of diggers in their area and keep a sharp eye on them. Another important function is to monitor planning applications to make sure nobody's going to build a bungalow on top of a sett. This happened recently in our area and we organised a very successful campaign to save the threatened sett. Eventually the land was bought by BP for the Badger Group and is now going to be fully protected.

If there is no Badger Group in your area, what about setting up your own? You may wish to affiliate to the National Federation of Badger Groups, who organise lots of very interesting and informative conferences, day schools etc. They also act as a national pressure group. Their address is 16 Ashdown Gardens, Sanderstead, South Croydon, Surrey, CR2 9DR and the tel. no. is 081 657 4636.

Other organisations worth contacting for help and advice:-

Local council - They may be landowners and could have badger "tenants". Find out their countryside policies, attitude to foxhunting over their land etc. All these issues may be important.

Local Nature Trusts - Will probably be your best source of help. May have registers of existing setts, manage nature reserves, help you with lots of aspects.

National Trust, Forestry Commission, Nature Conservancy Council - May have protected land in your area, and almost bound to have staff whose job it is to look after wildlife full time. Good contacts and may be very helpful.

LACS - As already mentioned, will give advice when foxhunting/badger digging overlap.

RSPCA - Can be very helpful. WARNING - Support can be patchy. Get to know the Inspector working in your area and form your own conclusion. In public will distance themselves from direct action. However, in private, some Inspectors can be extremely good. The RSPCA also has a unit of full time staff who often work undercover to infiltrate badger-baiting rings. Also bring prosecutions.

The Press - A two-edged sword, this one. Most people will have formed their own opinion of some tabloids treatment of animal rights issues, but they can be of great help. Your local press can be very useful for the more "cuddly" Save A Badger story. It's worth appointing one person to speak to the media.

WARNING - you could become a target yourself for diggers, some of whom are very tough characters. So obviously, I wouldn't recommend this job for the "nervous disposition" or for someone living alone.

Lastly, infiltration of badger diggers and their cronies. Can provide lots of pure gold in terms of information - but don't do it if you are already a known animal rights campaigner. You will be recognised, as diggers become more defensive about their activities and make a point of checking out the "opposition" so to speak. The same goes for hunters, shooters etc. One BASC representative recognised an animal rights supporter after one meeting a year earlier. This is not untypical. You will also need to be fairly convincing, in terms of owning terriers, going rabbiting, eating meat etc. Hardest of all, having to bite your tongue listening to people plan a weekend of fun for them, but torture for an animal.

This has obviously been a fairly broad coverage of what's involved but should give a pretty good idea of what Badger Groups get up to.

The last thing to mention is the sheer magic of watching a family of badgers at play near their sett on a nice evening in the summer. This makes all the wet winter mornings, trudging through mud in your wellies, worthwhile.

FOOTNOTE: It may well be that the best way to protect badgers is for there to be sufficient surveillance of their setts that the diggers and baiters are deterred by the virtual certainty of detection. It is also probably the case that members of the public who might not initially be interested in other animal rights/protection issues could be willing to take part in badger protection work. Thus it would seem a good idea for local AR groups to get involved, at least to some extent, in badger protection, either by joining an existing Badger Group or setting up their own.

Private Eye

A RETORT

by Neil

Upon reading Arkangel 2, I feel a retort is necessary on certain articles of the 'comment' section of this magazine. If I may quote an extract from John Robins piece 'Beyond Non-violence', "...activists are being naive over the issues of incendiaries, bombs and contamination of 'food' stuffs. All the philosophy and soul searching in the world cannot justify setting into action situations....which put at risk fire-fighters, security/cleaning staff, bystanders and animals which live in or on targeted premises". Try as I might I cannot find any of the above "risks" relating to 'contamination of food stuffs'. As I understand it, all contamination scares have been so conducted to minimise the risk to the consumer - if the state delay acting on information given, in the hope that a consumer may become 'poisoned', the fault can hardly lie with the activists. Fortunately all these activities have been carefully thought out beforehand so that, even taking into consideration the state's desire that someone dies just to discredit the movement, there has never been and never will be, a fatality from this kind of action.

On the point of view of incendiaries I refer back to my article in Arkangel 2 - so if you haven't got a copy this is as good an excuse as any to buy one.

By stating that he has never condemned activists who have caused damage to research, fur or factory farming establishments, whilst condemning those who use other 'more extreme' actions, does Mr Robins not realise that more often than not these are the same people, people who after long hours of soul searching and debate have decided upon what lengths they are prepared to go to in order to achieve their goals.

By stating that these words are not his but the reaction of the public on the street and the majority of animal rights supporters, he is falling into the trap of many animal abusers, the disinformation of the general public. From stories related to me, the majority of local animal rights groups and members of the public, who have been reliably informed about the facts of such actions, have supported these methods wholeheartedly.

By defending his condemnation of the ALF by stating he was misrepresented by media editing, he brings to the fore the argument - why is someone who is so naive about media tactics being allowed to 'represent' the AR movement in the national press?

By requesting that the "bombers", if I may be allowed to use the highly emotive media word, listen to their critics' arguments, may I also add that in doing so that they weigh up their critics' arguments against the successes of these campaigns. Then, and only then, should they assess if their actions are counter-productive or not.

I agree with Nick Newbury's comments that every action in the cause of animal liberation is a valid and important act, but when one section of the movement starts to attack another, there must be room for a justification of those actions - this is the only way that members of the movement as a whole will be able to make their own minds up about the various issues and tactics involved.

Nick, however, does make strong comments on the 'violence towards people' issue. The defence of his article lies in the attitude that animal rights is solely a moral issue. This does unfortunately have many flaws. Firstly, not every human animal holds the same morals, therefore by equating Animal Rights to just a moral idea leaves a loophole for all those of differing morality than ourselves to justify their actions. Secondly, what is a 'moral'? Morals change as times change. At certain periods in history it was morally acceptable to hold human hostages to further one's aims - such as against the Paris commune of 1871, however nowadays the holding of hostages in the Middle East is equated with terrorism. Morals change with time, therefore by equating Animal Rights to a solely moral argument allows the prospect of Animal Rights, as we know it, being a non-issue in the future. The basis for a belief in Animal Rights must lie in logical, philosophical and scientific discussion. Then and only then can the issue of Animal Rights be a long lasting and attainable belief. By furthering this argument therefore it is logical that at some stage in the struggle certain sections of the movement may feel violence is necessary in achieving their aims, and as long as the ends that these people are hoping to achieve can remain justifiable, the means of achieving those ends must also be just.

In Nick's hypothetical reaction to the killing of a vivisector he mentions that the police would conduct raids on local groups and the state would bring it's full weight to bear on the movement with increased arrests, surveillance etc. He also mentions the possibility of an activist being sent down for life. Nick - where have you been? As long ago as 1985 the police made up fictitious allegations in order to arrest over 20 members of the animal rights group at Keele University - no one was charged but box loads of literature and information on legal campaigning were seized and photocopied. The Sheffield case of 1987 was a result of an intensive surveillance, bugging campaign. The possible repercussions that Nick is speculating on have been going on for years - the state could hardly crack down any harder on the movement. The decision, however, on how far to take the struggle can only, and will only, lie with the individual. Everyone has the right to their own point of view. Don't degrade others for acting for what they believe in.

The Guardian

SENTIENTISM

by Richard D. Ryder

(Author of "Victims of Science" and

"Animal Revolution: Changing Attitudes to Speciesism")

I am against violence done to humans on the same grounds that I am against violence done to nonhumans; it causes suffering. Causing suffering to humans in order to prevent suffering to nonhumans is as wrong as causing suffering to nonhumans allegedly to prevent suffering to humans. Both are speciesist.

If people feel impelled by conscience to break the law gently, that is one thing, but violence against persons (lawful or unlawful) is quite another. If the conscientious break the law, they know they will have to face the consequences. But violence always risks causing suffering. And pain is evil.

Most animal rightists are very interested in ethics. Unlike some of our critics we have a heightened sense of right and wrong. We do not, however, accept the old unthinking moral values of the past - for example, that it is good to experiment on animals, hunt them, farm them, eat them and so on. We question the basis of ethics and pose to ourselves the two perennial puzzles of morality: why should we be moral and what moral code should we follow?

The first question is really a matter for psychology. What is moral capacity and why do we have it? All human societies have rules of conduct covering such things as property, human life, family organisation and truth telling. However great the diversity of such rules (one culture, for example, may condone polygamy and another condemn it) the fact remains that rules of some sort always exist; morality seems rooted in human nature. I suspect that this is because the considerable brain development of our species makes our behaviour highly flexible. Unlike an insect whose range of behaviours is probably very limited, our own range of possible actions appears to us to be almost unbounded. If someone insults me while driving I can either ignore the insult, retaliate by flashing my lights, make a rude gesture, shout back one or more of a hundred different terms of abuse known to me in a myriad possible alternative combinations, report the incident to the police, write a letter about it to The Times or smile indulgently, and so on. How does one select from such a repertoire? The answer is morality. A strict upbringing and the moral conditioning that went with it might prohibit a large proportion of the possible reactions and in so doing reduce the anxiety and personal disorder associated with conflicts of choice.

Severe legal, and indeed, possibly lethal complications are also avoided socially. I am not saying that the human species is the only species with a moral code. It is surely true that the parents of many species teach their young that certain behaviours (biting mummy's ear or paw, for example) are wrong. Different societies of the same nonhuman species can have different cultures just as ours do. But human moral codes are probably far more complex and diverse than most not only because of our large brain (no larger, proportionately than that of the whales) but also because of the complexity of our language.

What I am saying, then, is that the capacity for morality helps us to make decisions. We do not have to think so much in a crisis. This can accelerate reaction times and, generally, it reduces anxiety. Almost certainly it also helps create a cohesive society in which individuals tend to react in the same way to events. Maybe there is some survival value in morality.

The second question is "How do we choose a morality?" Are there objective criteria for right and wrong or is morality just a matter of taste? Well, personally, I cannot accept that right and wrong are out there waiting to be discovered like archeological remains. But I can try to base my conduct on some sort of rational programme like, for example, being consistent or following rules that are, as R.M. Hare says, universalizable, eg. that if somebody holds that it is wrong to inflict suffering solely for financial gain then this rule should be applied consistently, not just to relatives and friends, but also to foreigners and those of other races and species. Secondly, I can listen to the inner voice of conscience - not the sense of guilt which has been conditioned into me since childhood - "Don't do this, don't do that, you naughty little boy". No, I am referring to the genuine voice of conscience which is based upon empathy - the ability we all have to perceive that others are suffering. This capacity is, I suspect, innate and can be found in all children from infancy. They know that the other animals can suffer rather as humans do. They are right. In the past adults tried to brainwash the children, just as they themselves were brainwashed by their own parents, into believing that the other animals were entirely different. This allowed children to grow up as speciesists without constantly feeling the discomfort of guilt about their exploitation of other species.

So what I am saying here is that as I know that pain is bad from my own point of view I believe it is bad for other sentient beings too. I make that essential altruistic jump. How far I jump has, in the past, been conditioned by my familiarity with others, my fear of them and my own needs for security, territory and food. Gradually, the moral circle has widened from family and tribe to include strangers and then those of other races. Now we must include those of other species. Morality is all about altruism.

One of the great problems in ethics, in my opinion, has been due to the confusion of two quite different things: theories of behaviour and moral codes. Of course all sentient creatures seek contentment and try to avoid pain - that is a fundamental law of all theories of behaviour. But morality is not about what we tend to do naturally, it is about doing what we think is right. Morality may go against our natural impulses very considerably and may be opposed to our own personal interests. Sometimes our sympathy for others will make it easy for us to act morally but sometimes this sympathetic motive will be weaker than other drives motivating us in the opposite direction; it is in these latter circumstances that my rational cognitive sense of right and wrong must strive to overcome temptation. Basically, morality is about how I treat other sentient beings. It is about whether I cause pain or pleasure; about whether I do to others what I believe pleases them. As Confucius said - "What you do not want done to yourself, do not do to others".

How then do we define "others"? Surely we must define others to include all sentient beings - human, nonhuman and even the machines of the future if we have grounds for suspecting that they are conscious. This is what I mean by sentientism. It does not allow the trading-off of the pains and pleasures of one group against those of another. The weakness of the utilitarian trade-off model is that it allows, for example, the intense pleasures of a sadist to outweigh and justify the agonies he inflicts upon his victims. Surely consciousness or sentience is limited to the individual; it is not transferable to others. You thus cannot aggregate across individuals. Each individual sentient therefore is sacrosanct; this is sentientism. And I believe it is the greatest moral challenge of the millenium.

VIOLENCE

IS VIOLENCE IN THE PURSUIT OF ANIMALS' RIGHTS MORALLY JUSTIFIABLE?

by Robin Webb

(a member of the RSPCA's National Council and former Assistant Director of Animal Aid)

"VIOLENCE": 1) The exercise or an instance of physical force...
2) Powerful, untamed or devastating force...
3) Great strength of feeling...
(Collins English Dictionary, 2nd edition, 1986)

Much has been written by individuals, local groups and national societies, particularly during the past year or so, about violence in and by the animals' rights movement. Although open discussion is healthy, as in the series of public debates between myself and John Curtin, some of the attacks on direct action have caused deep divisions. This can only detract from any progress we may have made for our fellow creatures had we not channelled precious energy into arguing with each other. Let us then pause, stand back, and take a calm look at what we mean when we argue the validity or otherwise of using violence and what we actually define it to be.

The use of what some in our movement term 'violence' is usually outside the (political) law. The RSPCA clearly cannot condone the use of unlawful acts in pursuance of its aims while its front line of defence for non-human animals is the inspectorate, working with and within the law. To support breaking the law would destroy the credibility of this vital force - how could inspectors try to enforce the law, however inadequate the law may be, if the Society that employs them excuses actions contrary to such principles? However, although the RSPCA itself works strictly within the law it confines criticism of those who choose differently to condemnation of "actions of animal rights groups that endanger life". When the policy was adopted it was made clear that the actions referred to were premeditated ones. This offers clear guidance and highlights how vague the stated policies of some other national societies seem.

One example of attempted clarification causing yet more confusion through lack of proper thought was the article 'Policy on Violence' in issue 5 of 'Animal Aid Campaign News'. Paragraph 1 of the piece made it clear that violence should, from Animal Aid's point of view, be taken to mean "the threat or actual infliction of physical injury to a sentient being". An admirable and acceptable definition. However, paragraph 2 then condemns the Animal Liberation Front for "actions which are violent, OR (my emphasis) which threaten or endanger life". We are therefore back to a situation where, in Animal Aid's view, a violent act may be something other than that which endangers life.

So, where should our movement stand? We usually make quite clear when arguing the rights of non-human animals that there is a moral law which transcends the political law. Space prevents me offering evidence to support such a philosophy so may I ask you to accept it based on Professor Tom Regan's 'The Case for Animal Rights' and similar works.

If we therefore believe that human and non-human animals share a claim to individual rights and that the higher moral law should prevail then we must also believe that violence is violence whether it is performed within or without the political law. For example, capital punishment would not be condoned even within a legal framework.

Before going further let us address the argument on whether or not damage to property may be classed as violence. It has been put to me that one cannot be violent to property as property does not have feelings. Here I am assuming that the reader accepts that one sentient creature cannot 'own' another sentient creature and therefore no sentient creature can be classed as 'property'. It has also been claimed that, for example, breaking down a door constitutes violence as someone may be standing behind or near the door and thereby suffer injury. Both points of view appear to have certain merits.

In the former example we should consider that whatever good an inanimate object - battery cage, leghold trap, stereotaxic device - is doing the human user it will be having an adverse effect on the non-human used in conjunction with the inanimate object. If the property (inanimate object) is used to inflict or support the infliction of distress, suffering or death then we have a clear moral duty to free the sentient creature from such inflictions so long as other sentient life is not harmed. Similar moral concern cannot be extended to inanimate objects; therefore the destruction of such objects is morally justifiable.

The latter argument against, for example, breaking down a door does not appear to have similar moral justification. Let us consider that, unless already injured, a human could move away from the door and a non-human animal would be disturbed by the preceding noise and also move away. Thus it is unlikely that harm to a sentient being would result from such damage. Further, if one refrains from such acts the result could be additional or continuing suffering. If, as discussed earlier, there is no moral difference between lawful and unlawful violence then even a joint RSPCA/police raid on an illegal dogfight which necessitated breaking down a door would be open to condemnation. Surely this cannot be right?

In my opinion, arson does not fall under the classification of 'damage to property' but rather 'actions that endanger life'. The ALF is proud of its claim never to have harmed human life but arson has, almost undisputedly, taken life, whether it be mouse, rat or spider. One cannot check every nook and cranny of a department store or broiler shed; the presence of a small creature is not so obvious as that of a human and they do not understand fire alarms and emergency exits. If one does not or cannot take at least as great a care to ensure that spiders are not present as one does to ensure the absence of humans then that is not only endangering life but also practical speciesism.

So is damage to property violent? If so, is all damage to property violent? If only some damage to property is violent then where should the line be drawn? The latter two questions should be clearly answered by those who condemn damage to property as violence.

My feeling is that damage to property does not constitute violence as our movement understands it. Whether premeditated damage to property can be justified as a tactic to achieve animal liberation is, however, a separate argument for another time.

Violence against the individual is a much clearer situation. If we are in the movement because we subscribe to the Schweitzerian ethic 'Reverence for Life' then violence against human and non-human animals must be equally abhorrent to us. If we consider it morally wrong to harm a non-human animal to benefit a human then it must be also unacceptable to harm a human animal to benefit a non-human. Therefore, premeditated violence against any sentient creature must be inadmissible. To me this is quite straightforward and does not require further clarification.

So, premeditated violence against a sentient individual is wrong but what about spontaneous violence and self-defence? Three illustrative situations would be

* a person using a hedgehog as a football doesn't stop when requested to do so...

* a walk in the woods reveals a badger digger about to kill a badger by using the spade as an axe...

* a group of youths stoning a swan turn on you when you try to intervene...

Here we are talking about the harshness of the real world, not some cosy armchair philosophy. Is anyone seriously going to condemn you for using 'physical force' or 'great strength of feeling' to prevent what is happening? If so, does such condemnation equate to tacit support for the act you were trying to prevent? It is certainly unfortunate that Animal Aid consciously removed the word 'premeditated' from its resolution denouncing the use of violence. At what point on the scales of moral justice does pacifism become violence by consent?

In conclusion I believe that * damage to property does not constitute 'violence' as understood by the animals' rights movement...

* premeditated violence against a sentient individual or group of sentient individuals is contrary to the moral arguments which are the foundation of the animals' rights movement...

* both spontaneous violence and self-defence, wheresoever they occur during the pursuit and protection of animals' rights, are at least understandable and in most cases fully justifiable.

Even if you don't agree with me let us keep the debate open, friendly and constructive. Never forget that the real enemy is animal abuse in its many forms and guises - beware also the 'enemy within' that tries to divert our energies from the real fight. Never forget the immeasurable violence that our own kind inflicts daily on those creatures with whom we share this world. Never forget Genesis ch 6 v 6 "And it repented the Lord that he had made man on the earth, and it grieved him at his heart..."

Not the IRA way

by Fenland Fox

I am writing in response to "Anon's" article in issue 2. I believe that the animal rights movement - specifically with direct action groups themselves, are facing problems with 'big-mouths' and informers, and yet we must deal with these people rationally.

I was appalled by the suggestion that we could actually learn from the IRA, or does this person conveniently forget the horror of Hyde Park?

I can recall the pictures of the horses shuddering on the road, their whole bodies wracked with the pain of the nails, the blood and the tears now seemingly forgotten. This was no mistake and the murders were quickly claimed as a success; the IRA revelled in the glory with no 'regrets'.

I rather think these people are our enemies, they're certainly not friends. Even the way they deal with so called offenders is alien to our movement, human liberty goes hand-in-hand with animal liberation, and yet a closer look at their 'methods' of working would maybe change "anon's" mind.

In Catholic West Belfast the youth of the area were previously press-ganged into stealing cars so as to build the barricades for the common battles against the police and the army.

When the cars weren't needed the youths continued Joy Riding to escape the pressures of high unemployment, not forgetting daily harassment by RUC, Army and the IRA. These young men now face knee-cappings, beatings and attacks on their homes. The IRA are a law unto themselves, they run extortion rackets, control much of the loan-shark operations and have killed people purely on the basis of their religion. The romantic images of a peoples' army have long gone, this is minority rule of the people - fascism at its worst.

Anon seems to also understand that 'unjustified' statements make people legitimate targets of such violence. maybe he would rather see discussion magazines such as Arkangel censored, and those with adverse views could be dealt with IRA style (the same organisation that is armed by Gadaffi who himself lives in camel-skin tents) - or as Anon suggests we should follow their lead.

Don't get me wrong. I despise informers and loud-mouths and have seen the damage they can do to people who are active - the feelings of insecurity and being seen as some kind of idiot by unsuspecting friends or relatives. However, I believe in justice, not in dangerous extremism and talking to these people, coupled with the threat of action and excluding them from your life will do far more good than straight mindless violence - everyone's gut instinct. So come on, the IRA does not have its 'camp in order', it does nothing for the movement to take their stance. Potential activists and the public will only be frightened off by a movement that should strive to embrace everyone, not to devise punishments for those who 'fall out of line'.

Where Have They Gone?

by The Caterpillar

By far the thing that most bothers me about the movement is the large turnover of activists, from demos to sabs to the ALF. More so than the internal bickering between the 'wets' and the 'militants'. All of us know people who have dropped out, and always the people who seem the most committed.

It saddens me that those people made a difference on their own, but one hell of a difference if they were all still active.

Sure, everyone becomes 'war weary', especially when you are so involved that you live and breath animal rights, when each thought is concentrated on the next action or planning another one.

This is obviously not a bad way to live when animals need your help so desperately.

I became inactive for a while (it's called getting caught), but even after that period I was reluctant to get back into the 'swing of things', on any level of campaigning.

But no matter how I tried to fill that void in my life I couldn't live with the guilt by sitting back and letting our fellow creatures be tortured and murdered.

Hopefully those people will return. That way the movement will grow rather than just renew itself every few years. Just imagine a hundred sabs in each town and a dozen ALF cells in each county. How far would Animal Liberation be then?

Where have they gone???

Abusers know the score

by Nancy Phipps

Re: Mark Gold's article in 'Outrage', August/September issue, may I ask Mark Gold, are you real? When you look at photographs of animals in factory farms, vivisection laboratories, slaughterhouses etc. doesn't your blood boil? Because if it doesn't, then it bloody well should. It is good to feel anger. It is good to feel hate when the object of your hate is someone who inflicts pain on innocent creatures. I wonder if someone tortured or killed someone he loved whether he would act in such a passive way. I remember a few years ago listening to a speech in which Mark Gold said quite nice things about Colin Blakemore. How mealy-mouthed can you get?

He also makes the claim that only a minority of people support the ALF. Well, I've news for him. It is not a minority. Ask the ordinary people in the AR movement if they support the ALF and it is an overwhelming yes. It's alright for people being paid by BUAV and Animal Aid to express what they consider to be the view of the grass roots of the movement, but they're completely out of touch. Because ordinary people who are in AR also wholeheartedly support the ALF. And whilst I do not agree with bombs (mainly because innocent bystanders could get hurt) nevertheless if I heard that an animal abuser had been killed, I personally would say good riddance. I feel just the same way about child molesters, rapists and 'The National Front'. They are all scum.

As for alienating the public from our cause, that's a laugh. The selfsame week the bomb went off under the car at Bristol, we were collecting at our stall which we have every Friday and the support that week was terrific. We collected over £79 that particular week. Our usual amount is about £20.

Mark Gold states that he is totally opposed to violence. May I ask him in all sincerity what he would do if he came across someone beating a child or an animal in the street. Would he be content to stand by and do nothing?

I'm proud to say I belong to the ALF Supporters Group and although I have very little money to live on I shall continue to pay my subscription for as long as I am able. I was also amused to read that he called the 'Arkangel' a nasty little mag. Well he would wouldn't he? And what's the matter with reading about 'direct action'. As for saying no-one bothered to condemn the bombing of a child, we in the movement are committed to defend the helpless ones in our society, so we're hardly likely to condone a child being hurt.

So if Mark Gold has nothing constructive to say, let him shut up. As long as the government insists that foxhunting, factory-farming, vivisection and other such atrocities are admissible, then we must fight against the cruelty in whatever way we are able. Animal abusers know the score. If they want to take that risk, then so be it. At least they have the choice. The animals don't.

CENSORSHIP

by Simon Russell

Since it's inception Arkangel has received correspondence on many issues and a commonly touched upon point is what readers consider should and should not be printed. The policy of the magazine as I understand it is to print any article in the 'comment' section concerning the progress and tactics of the AR movement, regardless of the points made and regardless of who wrote them. This policy extends to the other sections of the mag so that news of group's activities will be included all the time their stated aims are to help animals. This approach has shocked and outraged some people who are used to the sanitised mags put out by animal rights organizations. To print what people in the movement want to say, no matter what, is just not the done thing. Many do not want to read about the activities and views of societies and individuals that they oppose. The would-be censors fall roughly into two categories, those that would exclude certain animal organizations because they disagree with what they're doing and those that would exclude any political views that contradict their own.

As far as the first point is concerned, a much heard argument is that FRAME should not be included because they say that animal experiments are not going to go away till we have accepted alternatives and, worse, that some experiments may even be necessary. Yes, of course it's rubbish, but some people do actually believe it. Once, when you were very first getting into the movement, perhaps you believed it. Having these views and working within them doesn't necessarily make you an infiltrator - definitely not my idea of an animal rights campaigner but, nevertheless, I'd say the same about a lot of other welfare/protection/conservation groups. Where would you start censoring and who would you end with? Arkangel is different because it attempts to cover anything and everything within the broad spectrum of animal protection, and to criticise certain individual groups being publicised misses one of the fundamental reasons for the magazine's existence. Furthermore, isn't it better to know what these groups are doing?

The second point is more difficult because it mixes ethics with priorities. One of the most sensitive subjects appears to be Racism, more sensitive than Speciesism ironically - drink milk and say that veganism's too extreme and you'll get criticised by other group members for being Speciesist, display a colour prejudice and you'll probably be expelled from the group completely. Just that alone is Speciesist, making the human issue more important than the cow and calf issue, and Speciesism is as Fascist as Racism so I don't understand the double standards. Anyway, I go on anti-Nazi/Fascist demos to prevent them marching, which is a form of political opposition and not censorship. But the idea that if you publish their points of view, you must be a supporter of their views, or in any case are promoting their cause, is rubbish. Let them write, let them damn themselves with their own pens. Every time they open their big mouths they put their jack boots straight in it. They won't go away by ignoring them. Know your enemy in order to fight them better. If you disagree with this then perhaps you'd better get 'Searchlight' to stop printing. If those who produce Arkangel left out all the views that they personally disagreed with then not only would the views from the right wing not be heard but an awful lot of other stuff would be left out too. The point of letting everyone have a say, in order for people to read each others ideas, discuss them and understand how people in the movement think, and sort out the problems that it has, that would be lost and one of the fundamental principles of the magazine and very reasons for its existence would be destroyed.

As for those who say that you cannot at any price work with a right wing person, again where do you draw the line? I consider the police right wing by the nature of their job. That wouldn't stop me helping them to nick badger baiters if I could. When we go on anti-Fascist demos do we check that those we are marching with are all vegan? No, we don't. Why is it OK to march against Fascists alongside Speciesists but shouldn't march against Speciesists alongside Fascists? It's inconsistent, illogical, bizarre and Speciesist and does nothing practical or constructive to help the victims of either Fascism or Speciesism.

Censorship through the ages has been used by the authorities against those they are scared may gain support, hence the suppression of the ALF Supporters Group. It doesn't work. You can't kill an idea. In the 'comment' section of the last Arkangel Robin Lane referred disapprovingly to some groups - Greenwave (Fascist), the Vegan and Vegetarian Pro-Life Network (anti-abortion), Green magazine (carries an ad for a nuclear waste company) and Lynx (inconsistent on the leather issue). Fair enough to criticise, the mag welcomes it, but Robin concludes his article with "I hope Arkangel will grow in strength but please don't cause your own downfall by giving space to those groups that may ultimately destroy it". Succumbing to pressure to bring in censorship and not give them space is what would destroy it. Let's give everyone a right to their say. Only by openly debating all viewpoints can the movement properly progress and attempt to resolve our problems and move forward in the struggle for the animals. Surely the best and most ethical ideas will always win through.

'You're quite right. They are trying to kill you.'

LEAVE OUT THE POLITICAL COMMENT

by Paul

I was saddened by an article in issue 3 of Arkangel called 'Fascism and Animal Rights'. I was especially disturbed by the statement that fascists are not welcome in the animal rights movement. Animals do not care whether someone is a fascist or a communist, only that someone is friendly towards them or cruel towards them. Who does this person think they are to tell people they are not welcome? Who does she speak for? Certainly not for me. It is not the purpose of the animal rights movement to make moral judgements on people's political beliefs.

Does this person realise that by picking and choosing who can join the movement they will be cutting animals off from people who may really care about them, people who might risk prison to save them? Does she realise she is probably sentencing some animals to death because of her attitude? Let the blood be on her hands.

I would like to make a suggestion to the people who put Arkangel together to try and resolve this problem in the future. It is that you print a statement at the front of every issue saying something like people of all political persuasions are welcome to contribute to Arkangel but articles or letters containing any political comment will not be printed. I hope you will give this some serious thought, you see I believe that if someone truly feels for animals political arguments will take a back seat.

"RIGHT TO REPLY"

Anon

As a Third Positionist I would like to make a few points concerning an article entitled "Fascism and Animal Rights" written by Sonja Morris which appeared in Arkangel (No. 3). They are,

- 1) The Third Position is not fascist.
- 2) Greenwave has nothing to do with the Third Position Movement in this Country, it is part of some other organisation.
- 3) It has obviously not occurred to Sonja Morris that some Third Positionists risk losing their livelihoods and liberty on a regular basis taking Direct Action against animal abusers.
- 4) Third Positionists will not be bullied out of the Animal Rights Movement.

To a more serious aspect of the aforementioned article, the subject of censorship of people's views. From time to time I have spoken with people who have expressed the very same opinion, they all belong to the "you can have free speech as long as you say what we want to hear" brigade. Whilst they are happy to erode the Civil Liberties of others they are always quick to react when it is applied to them. The trouble with people like Sonja Morris is that they always let THEIR politics cloud their vision.

FASCISM ANIMAL

A SERIOUS ERROR

Anon

I would like to point out a serious error made in Arkangel no 2. On page 12 there was a small article about a newly formed ecological group called Greenwave and their magazine Green Dawn. The fact is that this group is run by fascists and is a splinter group of the National Front, jumping on the green bandwagon to further its own ends. I am sure the idea of a fascist group being given credibility in an animal rights magazine is totally abhorrent to most people. Thankfully I don't expect to see 'Greenwave' mentioned in Arkangel again, as they have now changed their name to 'The Third Way' and make no secret of their racist views.

Regarding Ronnie's comments on his article One People, where he says that NF members, passive or active, should be allowed to join animal rights groups, I have to say that I find his ideas offensive. Presumably this means that we should join ranks with people who go out beating up innocent Asians and petrol bombing their houses. If that's the case we might as well invite child molesters, baby batterers, rapists and vivisectioners to join our group too! The suggestion that they should have the inconsistencies of their views tactfully pointed out to them, in the hope that they will change, is naive. Anyone who has such strong racist views and a deep hatred of black people, knows exactly what they are doing when they join the NF, they are proud of their views and nobody is going to change them in a million years. It is like asking a Terrierman to be kind to foxes.

We know from past experiences that fascists have tried hard to get in on the animal rights movement, and people who have spoken out against this have been open to threats and intimidation. In fact they have already got one foot in the door and I am sure they are grateful for Ronnie's sympathetic remarks. Whether he likes it or not, even though he is not racist himself, I'm sure the NF already regard him as an ally.

Even if a fascist did genuinely care about animals (and I accept that there may be a few), their presence in an AR group would cause so many disruptions, resentment and possible bad publicity that it would surely do more harm than good. If they really care they will stay away to avoid damaging the reputation of animal rights. The animals are not being deprived of helpers because if they are genuine they will carry on helping animals as individuals regardless and nobody is going to stop them. Fascism, whether against humans or non-humans, should be exposed and got rid of wherever it occurs without exception.

by Patrick Harrington

I was very interested as both a vegetarian and former member of the Official National Front to read the article by Ronnie Lee in Arkangel (Spring 1990). ONF members were banned from a number of animal rights groups and so the AFA statement fits into a pattern of such attempts.

The first point that I should like to make is that many Nationalists see this as an attempt to prevent the most ideological opponents of Socialism from being involved with animal rights campaigns. I do not believe that such issues are the monopoly of the extreme-left (however much some would wish it).

Second, the interest in animal welfare within Nationalist circles is very strong. Of seven places on the National Directorate of the group of which I am now a member, Third Way, three are occupied by vegetarians. If we are prevented from campaigning in existing groups be assured that we will create our own.

Third, I do not accept that I am a racist. I do not believe that one race is superior to another. Nor do I hate people of a different race or culture. I am a Separatist because I believe that the only stable basis of a state or legal system is a Nation (a people) which is homogeneous. I really don't see how my views on this subject "contradict" my views on animal rights. I have never read any article putting forward a reasoned argument on this point, such comments are expressed as asides since, in my view, they would not bear further examination. Perhaps your readers feel more comfortable just accepting such things. The alternative might be to think about racial issues rather than just condemn 'racism'.

RITUAL SLAUGHTER

by Sylvia Noble

Having campaigned for several years against mushrooming ritual slaughter of Britain's livestock, I am amazed at the article by Sonja Morris 'Fascism and Animal Rights' in your latest edition of Arkangel. Although no accurate figures can be obtained, it is possible that in excess of 20 million animals per annum go to their deaths outside Britain's Humane Slaughter Legislation under our iniquitous religious exemption clause. Not only does each passing year see more and more animals being ritually slaughtered but tens of thousands of tons of meat from ritual slaughter is being passed unlabelled onto an unsuspecting indigenous public thereby denying them their right to freedom of choice.

I have received your past three editions of Arkangel and whereas every other aspect of barbarity towards animals is fully covered along with successes in relieving animal suffering, no reference has been made to Britain's ritual slaughter problem, nor as far as I can see, any outright condemnation or campaigning. Lord Houghton of Sowerby, who has openly condemned this barbaric practice for many years, is shortly to introduce a Bill which will hopefully draw essential publicity and the necessary public support.

In a recent article in Farmers Weekly, David Massel of the Board of Deputies of British Jews said that the British public had no strong feelings in the matter of ritual slaughter. The powerful Jewish lobby have fought tooth and nail to prevent the banning of the diabolical casting pen in which cows are turned upside down as in a cement mixer so their heads crash on the floor and fully conscious have their throats cut. The methods of restraining animals for ritual slaughter cause great distress and although the Government's own Farm Animal Welfare Council have called for a total ban on ritual slaughter for animal welfare reasons, the Government has chosen to ignore all appeals for fear of the powerful Muslim and Jewish lobbies and their vociferous supporters, but has thankfully been shamed into accepting the banning of the casting pen or 'Weinberg Pen' as it is called after it's inventor.

Ritual slaughter of livestock is opposed to and condemned by every animal welfare society in the country including the British Veterinary Association and is banned in Sweden, Switzerland and Norway.

Professor John Webster, Britain's leading cattle expert, is profuse in his condemnation of this practice and in his book 'Understanding the Dairy Cow' he writes, "what is so distressing for a cow is she is CHOKING TO DEATH ON HER OWN BLOOD". The Jewish Chronicle reported plans for shechitah slaughtered venison some time ago and although I have written to my MP (Jewish) and the MAFF I have received no satisfactory reply as to whether deer are currently undergoing ritual slaughter here in Britain.

You are obviously doing important and necessary work against animal suffering in the face of a seemingly indifferent establishment. Surely therefore, people like myself who think it is disgraceful that animals should be made to suffer because ethnic minorities fail to overcome their superstitious and outmoded dietary regimes and scandalous that successive British Governments should compromise the principles of the majority electorate to the extent of introducing a dual legal system should possibly qualify for the title of 'fascist'.

I am proud that people of my own race cared sufficiently to introduce a method of rendering animals unconscious before they are bled to death and am disgusted that British Governments give Jews and Muslims living in Britain the right to disregard the law and slaughter animals by stone-age customs. You call for a national acceptance of vegetarianism and I wish you well in this, but until this is finally achieved, humane pre-stunning of animals before slaughter is the best we can do in this far from perfect world'

FRAME

Anon

Is FRAME an animal rights organisation and as such should be included in a list of such organisations? What is FRAME's position qua animal experiments? FRAME's stated belief is that the current scale of live animal experimentation is unacceptable and must not be allowed to continue and as is revealed in its leaflet "Medical Research Needs Alternatives Not Animals" it accepts that "the immediate and total abolition of animal experiments is not possible if Medical Research is to continue and the remaining diseases which lessen the quality of human and animal life are to be overcome and if new consumer goods and industrial chemicals are to be tested in attempts to identify and minimise any potential hazard to those likely to be exposed to them". Since diseases of some type or another (and new diseases such as AIDS and those which will no doubt follow through the introduction of new organisms into the environment, and the genetic engineering of plants and animals - see The Bio Revolution, Cornucopia or Pandora's Box, Peter Wheale & Ruth McNally Pluto Press) will always be with us, and whilst industry continues producing new industrial chemicals and drugs, FRAME will continue to attract funds from a public which believes that FRAME is totally opposed to all animal experiments. However, the leaflet makes it clear that FRAME believes in the efficacy of animal experiments (but note the reference to attempts), and therefore the necessity for them. The head of research at Eli Lilly, who led the team which produced opren, and at the time a member of FRAME, stated publicly that animal experiments must continue - even whilst opren was being discredited.

Michael Balls, as Chairman of the Trustees of FRAME, in a talk given to the Anglican Society for Welfare of Animals at one of their AGMs stated that he believed "human beings matter more than animals" and that "some animals matter more than others". He also stated that "one animal experiment of immense medical significance does not justify all others" (but was unable to identify on being questioned one animal experiment of "immense medical significance" that could not be challenged) and that "one unacceptable experiment does not mean that all others are equally deserving of condemnation". He went on to say that if a purpose has reasonably been judged "necessary" scientists must try to ensure that the proposed experiment will be "well designed", the minimum of animals used and the least sentient species. Is this not "animal welfare" rather than "animal rights"? FRAME in one of its newsletters poured scorn on the whole Choose Cruelty Free movement as soon as the RSPCA and IFAW joined in, clearly recognising that this movement was gaining respectability and success.

In the same article it was stated that "there are no alternatives to alternatives", but since animal experiments are unscientific there are no alternatives, since an alternative to something means that the alternative must match the original, in this case the animal unscientific model.

Scientists themselves have admitted that there are no non-animal alternatives to a large proportion of experiments currently carried out. The RSPCA leaflet "Alternatives to Animal Experiments - Are There Limits?" lists numerous diseases which scientists believe require animal models and adds "In such cases if animals were not to be used, the only 'alternative' would be not to do the experiment". Clearly this is not the view of FRAME.....

Whilst we humans continue to suffer diseases and to accept the necessity for "new consumer goods and industrial chemicals" according to FRAME there will always be an opening for scientists looking for alternatives whilst others continue to use the animal models.

Dream On...

by Jamie Hepburn

(HSA Chairman)

What a lot of nonsense the 'Sabs Dispute' piece was (One People, Arkangel 3)! One of the main problems in that dispute was that the now-removed members of the Executive Committee consistently refused to listen to the opinions of the active membership. They also tried to expel other committee members who disagreed with them; they tried to convince the membership that the EGM called to remove them was cancelled; and finally they refused (and continue to refuse) to hand over various items of HSA property.

There is a vast difference between personality clashes or minor differences over policy and the vast abuse of power that these people indulged in. You can no more end such a dispute "amicably" than you stop a dig-out by discussing the rights and wrongs of foxhunting with terrier-men. The HSA is now safely back in the hands of the active sabs, and my only regret is that we didn't chuck them out years ago.

Not Single Issue Politics

by Janet Payne

Some children, probably most given half a chance, are on a far higher intellectual plane than given credit for, and succumb to the lack of stimulation at school and the pressures of sexual stereotyping, so lose their special qualities and gentle ways. This is especially true of boys, where sexism is already in operation, by the contempt shown for those qualities more usually attributed to girls. Yet it is a joy to be in the company of a child with an aura about them, that is strong enough to be almost tangible. It should be nurtured, not quashed. But of course, in the relentless fight to control, the greatest enemy of the Establishment is individuality. This goes for any society, but particularly pertains to the doctrine established here over the past decade. I truly fear for the future.

The summer months in this country have shown a phenomenal number of upper-respiratory infections and hospital admissions due to asthma. I don't think you can afford to dismiss this as simply due to the weather having been dry and hot, it is far more serious than that and atmospheric pollution is undoubtedly to blame. We have to now take charge of our own destiny, because for as long as we live in a society which permits the nuclear industry, to make Leukaemia the biggest killer of children under five, a few thousand consumptives are going to pale into insignificance by comparison.

In joining an Animal Rights group and becoming active in any sphere, be it direct action, petitioning, leafletting etc., we can effect changes to the far reaches of society. All evil is intertwined, and until we recognise this there will never be the changes we wish to see with regard to the animal kingdom. This is why the media are so ready to discredit the movement, and Direct Action in particular, because the heightened awareness of the public to the suffering of animals has a domino effect. It draws our attention to the other evils that the perpetrators of these crimes also participate in. For as long as the vast majority of people have no real sense of priority above the superficial THEY (vivisectors et al) are safe. But those barriers are being broken down, too slowly as far as any Animal Rights Supporter is concerned, but significantly enough for some companies to be re-thinking their policies. It's not that the majority of people are deliberately bad, in the style of our more prominent world leaders (!) - but having the type of people in high office that we have, running the world, is it any wonder that their example in lack of moral values reflects on down throughout the population, while our every institution is infected by them? Those who set themselves up as anti-Establishment (eg. the Animal Rights movement) are only a threat to the individuals whose sole interest is in the personal profit afforded by their own legislation, they are not a threat to the community as a whole - as the media would try and have us believe, and sadly are unwittingly supported in the task by the less radical Animal Rights organisations. "Divide and conquer" has been a ploy that has worked in keeping people (and animals) oppressed throughout history, and it is working today within the Animal Rights movement. There cannot be a single individual supporter who does not respect the dedicated work done over the years by 'Animal Aid', 'BUAV', 'RSPCA' etc. etc. But, sadly there has never been any real change to the law, which has truly had the interests of animals at its heart. All that has happened are the offers of minor concession, which ensure the continuation of the profitability of evil. The Animal Liberation Front have come along, hungry and impatient for change, and have effected some of that change, by economic sabotage and non-violent direct action. No different than "Greenpeace" but without the same media support or deserved respectability.

By all means let the mainstream Animal Rights societies condemn individual actions, if as individuals they disapprove, but let it be coupled with the offer of constructive criticism, and praise for a common cause, not just allow themselves to be tricked and coerced by the media, into directly supporting the very institutions we all wish to see join slavery, child labour etc. in the annals of our shameful history. Outside of the immediacy of specific targets for direct action, if everybody worked to the best of their ability, in every aspect of their life, conscious of the good of all as being the aim, the Establishment would have to toe the line.

Ultimately our spending power, and the choices we make as consumers, are the things governments listen to. It simply isn't good enough to be vegan or vegetarian - though it's a very good starting point - when we are buying products from a company with a record of, say, international arms dealing. We don't need official sanctions, we need to find a sense of priority and compassion, because then we would automatically refuse to buy South African produce, we would refuse to buy the cash crops that hold the Third World to the ransome of International debt and starvation. If we all refuse to buy Nestle products it would be abundantly clear that we disapprove of their powdered milk being responsible for killing thousands of babies in the Third World. If we didn't eat fish there would be no seals or dolphins shot at, or caught in the drift nets by no means restricted to the Tuna industry. If we didn't eat meat, aside from the millions and millions of creatures subjected to the inherent barbarism, that so dehumanises us, there wouldn't be the pollution of our land and waterways, and there would probably be enough Tropical Rainforest left so as not to have disrupted the climate.

One can go on ad infinitum, without even having to refer to the overtly despicable, such as the arms trade, but the point is, we do nothing because the Establishment has brainwashed us into thinking there is nothing we can do. It has all become too big, too global for us to comprehend, and that is yet another government safety net. But it is precisely because it is global that we must try to do something, because if we don't, the Animal Rights movement in all its formats may just as well pack up and stop trying. That would be a tragedy because our level of consciousness and selfless lifestyle puts us into a position of responsibility because of high media profile, to draw to public attention the fact that Animal Rights should never be accused of being single issue politics. We should be as involved in starting and participating in selective consumerism, because an effective boycott will always be more powerful than a ballot box. By voting you are ironically showing approval for all these global crimes, but in refusing to deal with shameful companies or regimes you are knocking the balls out of their economic structure. Eventually they have no option than go with public opinion. The average (non AR) member of society if asked would be in unison in condemning the type of injustices referred to here, yet will do absolutely nothing about it. We must convince them that we really are powerful and that those with the vested interests work very hard, and largely succeed, in convincing us otherwise. A classic example was the call for sanctions against South Africa - according to Margaret Thatcher they don't work and "anyway it's the blacks that would suffer" being typical of the feeble excuses. Yet the moment the latest conflict occurred in the Middle East, with characteristic xenophobia, ruthless sanctions ensued. It may be a simplistic analogy, but in all truth, what is the difference between the economic strangulation of Iraq or South Africa, or Nestle or L'Oreal?

So, I reiterate, if we all did as much as we possibly could in our day to day lives the effect could be phenomenal. This is why we must nurture the children, particularly those that have that obvious extra spirituality about them, and they in turn can then go on to nurture others. We should not continue to poison them by destroying all potential so their main qualification will be in perpetuating the contamination of this planet. We can gather the momentum to effect the changes all decent people would like to see come about. Let us ask ourselves why else the standards in education have been all but destroyed by this government's policies. Could it be in part because if people can't read and write they are automatically at a disadvantage and lacking in social development and communication skills, and without these skills they are less equipped to question or to mobilise against their oppressors?

So it's not that most people are wicked on purpose, it's just that by doing nothing they condone the wickedness of others, and evil is perpetuated by, and results from, their own thoughtlessness and ignorance. Somehow we who care must break down these walls, because ultimately their apathy is inexcusable, as information is readily available which enables us to make informed choices, especially as almost without exception there are alternative choices we can opt for. Not investigating to seek confirmation that as little of detriment will come from our actions is as much a sin as deliberately ignoring badness when it is more blatantly obvious.

The situation we find ourselves in has gone on for so long and is all too acutely illustrated by the treatment meted out to animals, that when one delves into one's own actions, the realisation that the level of corruption and evil has such a knock on effect as to permeate absolutely every aspect of one's life, comes as quite a shock. Until this revelation our stagnant and brainwashed minds are secure in complacency, brought about by our perception of change as being an overt threat at worst, and at best not worth the effort. So many times I've heard "What can you do?", "It's a drop in the ocean" or most recently "Do you think Heinz are bothered because you no longer buy their products?" Well, I say I can do something, because if enough individuals make the effort to vote with their pockets it will work. (And as a direct result of organised boycotts Heinz have seemingly now dispensed with their involvement with drift net Tuna fishing.) So we make choices, but all too often we choose to do wrong and then proceed to justify our wrong doings. There is no doubt it is difficult to implement, and no one can have a 100% clear conscience, but to do one's utmost is giving 100% of what you can. In the drive towards such behaviour en masse, surely individual shortcomings can be absorbed for the greater good?

For this reason, as long as we have a modicum of our all but eroded freedom of speech, I for one will shout, because it means that the Multi-Nationals and corruptions of government haven't quite got control of everything yet. Until the smack of '1984' and 'Thought-Police' in our midst succeed in disassociating us all from our quest for truth and peace, I anticipate us having the momentum to swim against the tide of apathy. The bottom line is, if we don't regain our affinity with the ecology of this planet, and hence achieve true and lasting liberation for all animals, there quite simply is no hope. In the meantime we must console ourselves with the fact that the greatest social changes throughout history have been brought about by the campaigns of minorities. The difference here is that we are on a very short span of borrowed time, and if the fundamental truth of this continues to evade us we will forego our last chance to make amends and will all be guilty of an unprecedented act of genocide. Let us fight to destroy society as we know it, before we destroy society in its entirety. In saving animals we also save ourselves. We have the choice.....

Green Magazine

Life is Life

by Neil Theobald

In issue 3 an article was written by a certain Robin Lane entitled 'Good and Bad'. In his article comments were made implying that the AR movement and anti-abortion are a contradiction to one another. What I would like to know is why he suggests this. Actually, I would say that the AR movement and the pro-abortion movement are in fact a contradiction. The whole idea behind animal rights is to end the destruction and torture of our fellow beings and to destroy the speciesist attitude as it exists today. So, tell me, how can a person support this idea and yet support the mass destruction of humans? That, after all, is what abortion means - the mass slaughter of totally innocent unborn people.

Let's talk about rights. Every sentient being, in my opinion, has the right to live free from pain, torture and suffering. This is the general belief of most, if not all, people in the AR movement. So, therefore, surely the rights of an unborn child come under this belief. Don't forget, once a woman is pregnant, we are talking about two beings. Two human beings with rights of freedom as mentioned above. So, with that in mind, surely the mother who is one individual, has no right to kill her unborn offspring, another individual, no more than a butcher has the right to kill a cow or pig.

Contrary to what Robin Lane implies, I, as an anti-abortionist, support the rights and freedom of every individual. It is why I'm against the deprivation of life to unborn people as I am against the deprivation of life to animals. It is why, despite a mother's suffering or emotional stress and inconvenience, I will not condone abortion. It is why, despite the urgent medical quest for cures for cancer or peoples' inconvenience of changing their diet, I will not condone the torture and killing of animals, likewise. After all, tell me, what suffering could a mother go through that will justify a killing? Perhaps if a mother was in a life-or-death situation, second thoughts could be had, but also then second thoughts could be had about the animal tested drugs that keep people on the edge of a life-or-death situation.

When it comes down to it, the core of the pro-abortion issue is mothers' rights versus child's rights. Does the mother have a right to kill the child, or does the child have the right to live no matter what the mother's situation? Pro-abortionists argue that the mother's rights are superior to the child's rights. This contradicts the theory of non-speciesism, so how can pro-abortionists be strong AR supporters? I believe in all individuals' rights, and it saddens me when people who claim the same say that they support abortion. Especially as that pro-abortion stance means the brutal killing of millions of tiny, young developing human beings. I would like to know if half the pro-abortionists have actually seen an abortion take place. Do they know what the process and the result looks like? Have they witnessed the death of an embryo? Just like the meat eating public are blind to the functions and process of abattoirs, people seem to be blind to the actual slaughter of the abortion business. Like the German people were blind to what went on in the Nazi extermination camps.

Whoever is reading this, I ask you to bear the message behind the AR movement when questioning about abortion - "LIFE IS LIFE". No matter what a mother goes through, is it really worth taking another individual's life? It is a question only potential mothers are qualified to answer. If these potential mothers believe they do have the right to kill to end whatever misery they face, then so be it. But, they are guilty of speciesism to remain their part in the AR movement. Perhaps you will still say a woman should not suffer, even if that does mean having an abortion. If that is the case, then why should we bother pestering animal abusers? Vivisectionists then, shouldn't suffer, just because they kill beings.

But I believe animal abuse must stop, and abusers must suffer. Therefore I believe mothers must tolerate suffering instead of killing unborn children, because I'm not speciesist. Remember LIFE IS LIFE. Liberation is our quest. Human and Animal. I am not sexist, and I am not trying to provoke splits in the AR movement. I am just trying to provoke thought on principles. I rest my argument.

A sense of perspective

by Seamus Burke

The ALF has not got a policy of infanticide, but for the industries of animal abuse it is a daily ritual. After listening and reading various people's reactions to the events in which explosive devices were placed under the cars of two vivisectioners, it seems that all sense of proportion has been lost. Violence is an emotive term defined differently by different people at different times. It is hard to think clearly about it when some people in the Animal Rights movement are only too willing to raise their hands in horror and can't get their statements of condemnation out fast enough.

Unless we want to fall into the trap of speciesism, then how can the fact that a child was injured accidentally get us so much more worked up about things than the many millions of animals that are not only injured brutally and deliberately, but murdered all the time?

The struggle for Animal Rights should come before any personal likes or dislikes amongst ourselves, so I don't want to waste time slagging off anyone, but I do think that Mark Gold's article "Animal Rights and Violence" which appeared in the August/September issue of "Outrage" ought not to go unchallenged. "Terrorist" is not a word that should be used lightly. However, it certainly seems to cloud one's vision when some Animal Rights activists are dismissed as "terrorists" and yet the real terrorists, the ones truly with blood on their hands (the vivisectors, the factory farmers etc.) are spared any such terms of abuse. Ranting about the ALF seems to me to be a tragic waste of time and energy when we could be doing something really useful like shouting from the rooftops about animal abuse in all its guises. We get involved in the Animal Rights movement because we care about animals, not because of a desire to have any one person's political philosophy rammed down our throats. Aren't we selling the animals short by doing this? Of course we need to discuss tactics in a rational and open manner (as in Arkangel) but these arguments ought to be voiced amongst ourselves and no one should run to the media in hysterics bandying insults left, right and centre. Nor should anyone feel that they have the mandate to take on the role of censor for us. Why was the sale of "Arkangel" stopped at the "Living Without Cruelty" exhibition because of "adverse publicity"? I suggest to anyone who feels confused about the nature of violence that they spend some time in an abattoir or a vivisector's laboratory.

Of course it was a pity that a child was injured. I don't think anybody would want to deny that. The child was innocent, but so too are all the animals that are suffering as a matter of course. Is the veal calf or the piglet that has its teeth smashed on being born somehow less innocent than the child? Are the male chicks that are crushed to a pulp "guilty" by virtue of being the wrong sex for the egg industry, or the hens that are debeaked routinely? Why do some people get more incensed about a minor injury to a child than about the massacre of animals that is taken for granted every day?

Also, the argument about the "sanctity of human life" needs to be looked at more closely. It seems to me that it is used in a very opportunistic manner, only when it suits the purpose of the person pontificating about it. Obviously, not all human life is sacred at all times; Mrs Thatcher was only too keen to send men off to be killed in the Falklands' War, or in Northern Ireland. It is a stock phrase that the mouthpieces of the State churn out whenever it fits their purpose. "Non violence" is also a joke when we think about the activities of the police etc.

It is interesting that a lot of people sympathize with the African National Congress, even within nice middle class circles. Yet we all know that the ANC is involved in violent direct action, but somehow we see apartheid as being so wrong that we can go along with the actions of the ANC (as I agree we should). And innocent people do get hurt, which is always unfortunate. But you don't see the leaders of the anti-apartheid movement falling over themselves to condemn the people who have carried out the actions, nor to distance themselves from them. And we know too that the ALF has, to quote from a recent ALF SG newsletter, "a strict policy which all members adhere to when carrying out ALF actions. This policy is to take all possible precautions not to harm any human or animal life." Now perhaps with the car bombs (incidentally not claimed by the ALF) not enough precautions were taken, but we must balance the unintentional harm to the child as a result of this action with the trouble caused to the vivisection industry (eg. increased security meaning less profit). Isn't it illogical that we can support the liberation/freedom movements of the people of Africa and Latin America, where violence is an everyday occurrence, and yet find it so completely unacceptable within the Animal Rights movement? Is this not speciesism?

Surely what we have got to do is to make the lives of the animal abusers as difficult and as unprofitable as we possibly can. The animals cannot afford for us to get tied up arguing amongst ourselves about linguistics, nor should we be afraid of dirtying our hands rather than sitting at home feeling smug because we are living a "cruelty-free lifestyle". "Public education" has of course got a part to play but on its own it is not enough. Without the ALF I wonder how many people would know what a battery egg is. I think that we ought to be offering our complete support to those brave enough to risk their freedom on behalf of animals rather than labelling them "terrorists" and saying that they can "play no part in what we are striving to achieve". I am of course not advocating murdering anybody, but we do need to be able to put things into perspective rather than let ourselves be manipulated by the media into knee jerk reactions. When people in the Animal Rights movement are approached by the media after events such as the car bombs, they have a choice as to what to say. All people that want to prevent animal abuse should expect them to make the choice that helps animals. But the Mark Golds of this world choose to slag off the ALF, the only effect of which is to worsen the image of Animal Rights activists in the eyes of the public. They could have chosen to say that the suffering of the child was infinitesimal compared to the suffering of laboratory and farm animals, while at the same time, if they wished, making clear their own personal preferences as to tactics. They did not make that choice.

Perhaps we ought to remind ourselves each day what is happening at this very moment to the animals imprisoned and tortured for profit. Please can we have unity between us instead of all this infighting and abuse? Please can we clear our vision so that we don't get diverted from the proper focus of our energies - let's remember that the important thing is to work for animal liberation, by whatever means necessary, and that this should override everything else. Let's remember who our real enemies are - the enemies of animals - and let's get the bastards! (Whoops, I forgot to say - in their pockets).

The Real World

by Barry Horne

There have been several articles in the last two issues of Arkangel condemning incendiary device actions and the car bomb in Bristol. Quite frankly I wonder just who the authors of these articles really are. Do they live in the real world or just in their own private fantasy world where everybody plays by the queensbury rules? Animal abuse is carried out by sick perverted people who care nothing about right or wrong but only about profit and perverse pleasure. This is the real world. These sort of people won't be discouraged by peaceful campaigning but only by hitting them where it hurts most, ie. financially. Incendiary devices are designed to inflict this financial loss by destroying their property, be it department stores or livestock trucks. This is the only language they understand.

As for the car bomb, well the thinking behind that is plain for anybody with an open mind to see. The articles by people in the last issue on this subject amazed and disgusted me. Val Graham states that "a vegan AR supporter out walking a dog" could have been hurt. This statement is so ludicrous as to defy description. There is a war going on out there Val and in any war innocent civilians unfortunately get hurt, but of course the bomb was not intended for that purpose but was aimed at a vivisector. The only bad thing about it was that the vivisector walked away unharmed and free to continue torturing and killing animals. Is this what you want Val? Why not hand him a leaflet and ask him to change his ways? He'll laugh in your face as you well know.

Val then goes on to say "can we now expect those responsible to go the whole hog and start strapping explosives to dogs?" This statement is so ridiculous and confusing that I can only assume she was getting hysterical by this time. I wonder who you really are Val. Comments in your article about putting the movement back years, harm done to the movement etc., are classic Animal Aid, BUAV etc. type statements and have no place in a genuine animal rights magazine.

The comments by Ronnie Lee about the car bomb being both "tactically and morally wrong" also need challenging. The tactics of any action can only be gauged by the long term effect it has on the struggle. In this case the vivisector involved now has some inkling of the terror he causes every day to innocent animals and this action must therefore be viewed favourably. As for it being morally wrong, I would ask Ronnie if it is morally right NOT to try and prevent vivisection. The object of this car bomb was surely to prevent this particular vivisector from continuing his evil work. It was surely therefore morally right.

Local Politics

by June Ellis

I thought I would let you know about my involvement in animal welfare through politics. I have been an animal campaigner for over 20 years: I have fund raised, marched, handed out leaflets in high streets, written endless letters to various ministers, involved myself in various groups etc. and obviously there is a real need for this to win public support. However, I also feel that there is a need for members to be involved in politics in order to bring into effect by legislation, the hard work that animal welfare has done in changing public opinion. I felt that it was important that I should have a more definite, assertive and determined approach. Animal welfare activities should be more politically orientated, eg. Compassion in World Farming.

In January last year I nervously went along to my local branch of the Labour Party, having just become a member. I thought at least I would have an opportunity of bringing up animal issues if possible. Owing to the lack of support for local branch politics and because of my seen enthusiasm, I was voted branch secretary in my first week which made me a delegate at the higher committee which is the constituency branch. This shows that it is not difficult to occupy key positions at branch level. Even though I cannot type, I have never been as committed before and I knew very little about politics.

I took up an issue that I thought would be easiest to push further. I decided on the issue of the testing of animals for cosmetic purposes. I wanted to bring in a resolution, having read up on the procedures. It is first of all necessary to "move" a motion at the branch meeting and this was what I did. I did have a couple of supporters like my chairlady who was fond of her cat!! Anyway, I was surprised when all the members supported my resolution as none of them were welfare people. There were no arguments and they merely wanted me to explain what the tests involved. The next procedure was for me to send a copy of my resolution to the Constituency Labour Party secretary so it could be heard at the General Committee or GC (the meeting of all the branches). The outcome has yet to be determined as the resolution is being considered by the Executive Committee.

What I want to say about all this is for your members to do what I have done in their local branches, whatever the party. I am sure a lot could be achieved through politics at branch level. Please urge members to do this.

Health, Fraud & the BBC

by Patrick Rattigan

"There is not a crime, there is not a dodge, there is not a trick, there is not a swindle, there is not a vice which does not live by secrecy.....Publicity may not be the only thing that is needed, but it is the one thing without which all other agencies will fail".

We, who promote natural medicine and denounce vivisection, seem to have been paying lip-service only to Pulitzer's primary requirement in the campaigns against medical fraud. We have missed the obvious.

On BBC Newsnight 26&27/7/90 we were treated to another advert for vivisection-based medicine; as usual dressed up as a balanced debate. We had the vivisectionists and their agents within the "anti-vivisection" and "animal rights" lobby generally agreeing that we must choose between animal torture and animal disease. As is strict BBC policy, there was never the remotest chance that any genuine anti-vivisectionist would be allowed to put any medical or scientific arguments. Vivisection-based Modern Medicine has maimed and killed more people than war, famine and pestilence combined. It has survived due to the efforts of the likes of the BBC.

We have marched through big cities; to research Belsens; we have written to newspapers, television and radio, MPs. We have lined up thousands of people with toffee hammers and tried to breach a large dam.

In Jan. 1981 the Board of the Governors of the BBC declared "...The Board reaffirm their recognition of a duty to ensure that the programmes maintain a high general standard in all respects....and to provide a properly balanced service which displays a wide range of subject matter....The Board recall that it has always been their object to treat controversial subjects with due impartiality, and they intend to continue this policy."

Pure hokum: pure brass neck. Since the BBC's inception we have had a constant, unremitting tirade of deception on the benefits of false medicine. Rational therapy and research has been ignored or damned with false praise: by order. We have accepted this scandalous bias as inevitable. The BBC has a Royal Charter and is funded by the LICENCE PAYERS: US. It should have been obvious to us for years that our mass marches should have been to the doors of the BBC. I suggest we start to do just that.

"Details are still sketchy, but we think the name of the bird sucked into the jet's engines was Harold Meeker."

OUT OF TOUCH

by Gari Allen

I'd like to express some points in relation to Dave Horton's article "Out of Touch". Now then Dave, I appreciate that you live in Australia so it's possible you don't really know what's happening in the UK, unless of course you're kept up to date by watching East Enders or by reading The Liberator.

Ronnie Lee's not and never has been a leader. You not only have insulted Ronnie but also hundreds of activists who have got minds of their own. Haven't you heard of individualism? He was a spokesperson for the Animal Liberation Front Supporters Group, and very good he was at it as well, who because of his excellent handling of the media, by explaining why actions took place as well as highlighting animal abuse, was savagely interned for 10 years. You say that Ronnie Lee super hero dolls for kids in department stores should be sold? And that Ronnie Lee forgets where peoples' heads are? Well it's obvious to me Dave that we're sure where you're head is - and that's up your arse! You seem to be still living in the "laid back sicksties" where animal abuse was just as rife as it is today but people were too stoned to realise what was happening. Since when have "The People" been caring peace loving folk? What plane are you on maaan?

Actions like Bristol and Porton Down have put the movement back years? Now where have we heard these sentiments expressed before? Oh yes, the good old collaborationists like Animal Aid, LACS, British Union for the End of Cosmetic Experiments - but not for the Abolition anymore otherwise we'd all be out of a nice salary should any form of govt. abolish vivisection! Where was I? Oh yes, you stink of the same Nationalists Mr Horton - it wouldn't surprise me at all if you just so happened to be a "figurehead" of sorts of some national animal rights society in Australia. You see, over here we have pseudo moralists like yourself who think that by just being vegan you're going to achieve animal liberation. Well the real violent people in any society are those that take part in animal abuse. "Those who live by the sword shall die by the sword" is a classic quote. You will never get change by lobbying politicians (sorry I didn't mean to swear), simply because they couldn't give a toss. We have 80% of the population against foxhunting in the UK but no politician really cares enough to ban it.

Wake up Dave - it's the 1990s, not the '60s. It's time people realised that direct action is the only way forward. Instead of knocking it, understand just why it is that people do actions. It's not for self gain, it's because we care! It's because we have no faith in society. It's because of the media and other so-called animal rights groups that slag off any sort of direct action, be it incendiaries, bombs and liberating animals, that people like you suck it all in. Let's not forget your classic quote Dave because from your article it's you and the rest of those who criticize direct action that are totally "Out of Touch".

Pull Together

by Jill Russell

I should like to make a few points regarding the articles in Arkangel no. 3 on the Bristol and Porton Down car bombs in the spring. Firstly, no-one seems to know who planted the bombs. The police are reportedly baffled because the devices used were apparently different from the usual ALF devices. Secondly, it was an extraordinary time for any animal rights person to want to divert attention from the media publicity surrounding the Feldberg expose of only a few weeks before and which must have infuriated the research establishment. Thirdly, re. the injured child, Val Graham asks "what do I say now?" She (he?) can say that the only person killed in recent years was in fact a Greenpeace photographer murdered by State-sponsored terrorism. We must remember that the venom directed - possibly incorrectly - at the Animal Rights movement in general over the incidents is completely inconsistent with the lack of concern displayed by scientists towards the 10,000 babies who were born deformed due to the animal tested drug Thalidomide and the many more since who have been damaged by even more intensively animal tested drugs.

The irate and defensive letters from vivisectionists in the press and their statements on television have become increasingly self congratulatory and "Holier than Thou". I have never noticed at any time any mention of the many adverse reactions, including teratogenicity and death, to humans from some animal tested drugs and agrochemicals, nor any sympathy whatsoever from the researchers for the numerous victims.

At this important time with the Huntingdon and Feldberg evidence available it is imperative that we all pull together and are not fragmented by the emotive and often inaccurate statements made by so-called medical researchers, 80% of whom are not medically qualified despite the title "Doctor". These people could not undertake human studies so are reliant upon animal research unless they can update themselves towards modern technology.

We have up to date evidence of what can and does go on in British laboratories and we must use it to stop vivisection.

Cloud Cuckoo Land

by Mr. D. M. Hammond

The Government and their animal abusers have got the Animal Rights movement just where they want it, that is in the doldrums and scared of breaking their laws. Laws that they use as weapons to exploit, torture and murder, not only our sentient animals but also anyone who tries to help them. They have got us all saying: We are passionate about animals but we are not prepared to liberate them from their living hell because our comfortable existence may be disturbed. It is a good job for the animals that people like Ronnie Lee did not take this attitude. He and the other animal rights prisoners are the true emancipators of animals. They were prepared to lose their freedom for them, because they had no faith in the so-called democratic system, the very system that gives a carte blanche to animal abusers.

If any animal rights person believes for one minute that new acts and legislation will bring about care and freedom for our animals, they are living in cloud cuckoo land. Think how hard a fight it was to achieve the 1981 Animals Protection Act, that the Agricultural Minister would have to enforce if unnecessary suffering was caused to our live animal exports. So what a golden opportunity it was for the Minister of the day, the animals and animal rights campaigners, to reap the fruits of their labour when those French scum burnt, poisoned and treated our animals like vegetables. But dear Mr Gummer decided it was not necessary to enforce this act. After all, they did only burn, poison and slaughter them en masse in the middle of the street. Hardly unnecessary cruelty was it? And it certainly had nothing to do with Gummer's vested interest in a billion pound meat industry.

The Badgers' Protection Act really does protect badgers. Every time a brain dead badger digger is caught it shakes it's head to the question: were you digging for foxes? Yes, writing letters, going on demos, talking, giving lectures and holding stalls really does emancipate our fellow creatures, after all, that's all the suffragettes did!

Vivisection—The Facts

by Sherry Warrick

Animal experiments are undoubtedly cruel and morally indefensible. However, how many people realise that animal experiments have no scientific validity either? The following examples demonstrate how unreliable animal experiments are:-

Penicillin kills guinea-pigs, yet they can safely eat strychnine, one of the deadliest poisons for humans.

Digitalis dangerously raises blood pressure in dogs.

Morphine calms people and rats but causes maniacal excitement in cats and mice.

Potassium cyanide is deadly to humans but harmless to owls.

Sweet almonds kill foxes and chickens.

Parsley is poisonous to parrots.

Arsenic kills most species but sheep thrive on it.

When drug companies want to market a new "wonder" drug all they need do is test it on a variety of animals until they find a species that demonstrates the least damaging side effects. Of course any species that displays an adverse reaction can be conveniently forgotten. In this way drugs can be given to the unsuspecting human patients and if they experience side effects the drug companies have an alibi by saying that it seemed all right on the test animals. All drugs are toxic and have the potential to cause side effects.

Also the medical profession concentrates on tackling symptoms rather than what caused the illness in that particular patient. As a result drug therapy has never cured any disease and never can. That is not to say that certain drugs do not alleviate symptoms, for example pain killers do temporarily relieve pain, but at what cost? A few examples:-

Aspirin can cause internal bleeding.
Paracetamol can cause liver damage.

Vaccines can cause brain damage and even death.

Anti-biotics damage the immune system and can cause thrush.

There are plenty of traditional healing methods such as herbalism, naturopathy and acupuncture that have proved safe and effective over hundreds and even thousands of years; all without using animal experiments.

For over a 100 years anti-vivisectionists have been using moral arguments alone. In an ideal world that should be sufficient but why not make use of all the arguments against vivisection including the scientific evidence? We should not be surprised that something as cruel and inherently evil as vivisection should also turn out to be illogical and incapable of doing any good.

The use of Violence

by Mark Lowe

On the question of what I would do if I saw a person being attacked in the street then I would use violence to defend that person from the attackers. I would also use violence to defend an animal being attacked if I came across a situation where an attack was taking place as I am not a speciesist. In these circumstances I would be using only limited violence so as to save the victim. Once I had directed the attackers attention away from the victim and onto myself I would not continue using violence except in self-defence. The point is that I will only use the minimum amount of violence necessary to protect myself and the other party concerned. This type of limited violence is very different from initiating unlimited violent attacks on hunters/vivisectionists/etc. when they are not in the process of committing an attack.

Also, as John F. Robins pointed out in Arkangel 2, tactics such as contamination of food stuffs or bombings and arson of property is potentially very dangerous for firefighters, bystanders etc. and fires can easily spread to premises and property of innocent people which is completely unacceptable. I would say that this type of action is certainly more dangerous than the action of a speeding ambulance with sirens screaming and lights flashing to warn people. It isn't worth the risk.

ROAD TO VICTORY

The Vegan

Badger digger Paul Blackledge was jailed for 4 months and banned from keeping dogs for life by Market Drayton magistrates after his terrier suffered horrific injuries during badger baiting. (Daily Telegraph, 24/2/90)

Norway has extended its ban on the killing of seal pups in the Arctic for another year and the number of seals that hunters can kill has been cut. (Western Morning News, 24/2/90)

Appin mink farm in Scotland has gone into receivership with debts over £1 million. The Appin business held 3,500 animals in captivity and has been in operation for 30 years. (Agsene, May/June '90)

The Dutch have begun a programme of phasing out battery cages by the year 2000. It will be illegal to build any new battery cages after 1994. (The Extending Circle, Vol. 3, Issue 3)

John Gummer has announced that the dumping of industrial waste at sea will no longer continue after 1992 and the dumping of sewage sludge at sea will end in 1998. (Turning Point, July-September)

Burkina Faso, Finland, Gabon, Liberia, Madagascar, Niger, Nigeria, Isle of Man, Mauritania, Sierra Leone and Uganda have complete import bans on ivory. (Traffic Bulletin Vol. 11, No. 4, 17/9/90)

The French national fur trade has lost a law suit against a TV programme which they claimed damaged their industry. This is the third time they have brought court action to protect their trade and the third time they have failed. (Animals International, Summer '90)

The Canadian supplier of furs to Harrods has lost £20 million due to the fur dept. closing. (Animals International, Summer '90)

A seal cull in South Africa of 25,000 cubs and 5,000 adult bulls has been suspended after protests.

(The Times, 5/7/90)

A special breeding unit at Wallacerille Animal Research Centre (New Zealand) has closed because fewer animals are being used in experiments. The Director of the centre said that the closure could partly be attributed to the work of animal rights campaigners.

(Evening Post (New Zealand), 30/4/90)

A judge in Argentina ordered the immediate closure of an animal experimental unit in Buenos Aires following an investigation by the President of the Argentinian Association for the Defence of Animals. Thirteen dogs have been saved from terrible conditions at the lab.

(Mobilise, June '90)

At it's congress in June, the Co-operative Women's Guild passed the following resolution - "This congress of the Co-operative Women's Guild demands the closure of all animal farms that breed mink, foxes and other animals in very cruel conditions for the production of all fur clothing".

(The Campaigner, July-September '90)

The former trainer of TV dolphin Flipper forced the US Navy to cancel an underwater explosion by sitting on a buoy above the 1,200 lb depth charge. He said the test, in Florida, would damage dolphins.

(Turning Point No.19)

The animals unit at Leeds Polytechnic has had to close because of staffing problems and cost. The small unit, housing rats, mice and guinea-pigs, got into difficulties when the sole technician left. Technicians from other depts. were asked to work in the unit but they all refused. Their union NALGO supported their stance and as a result the unit had to close. There were also problems meeting the cost of changes to lab cages and equipment required by new Home Office regulations. For the animals remaining there was a new lease of life, they were released to an animal welfare organization for rehoming.

(Liberator, Autumn '90)

A survey in the Sun newspaper on whether animal experiments to help cure human disease should be stopped came up with the result that 13,576 voted for the ending of experiments and 1,693 voted for the continuation.

(The Sun, 28/6/90)

Otter hunting has finally been banned in Ireland by a Government decision not to issue licences to the last two remaining packs of otter hounds.

(Wildlife Guardian, Summer '90)

Moorlands Furs mink farm near Hebden Bridge is closing down and will be replaced by a small residential site. There were plans proposed for a pig or poultry unit to replace the farm but they were turned down by the local council. The farm held 12,000 mink.

(Hebden Bridge Times, 21/9/90)

Thirty radiologists employed by the Rizzoli Orthopaedic Institute in Bologna, Italy, well known for its experiments on dogs, refused to carry out scheduled experiments. Their protest action was taken at the opening of a new vivisection unit within the Institute.

(Orizzonti, June 1990)

Official 1989 figures for the number of experiments on animals in the UK are the lowest for 30 years. The figures show a total of 3.3 million animal experiments, which is 170,000 (5%) fewer than in 1988 and have now fallen for 13 years in succession.

(Daily Telegraph, 25/7/90)

Arkangel promotes a positive and united fight for the protection of animals. It covers news and information about all activities and work carried out for animals and invites news and reports and photos from all pro animal societies, groups and individuals. The editor does not necessarily agree with all the activities publicised or views expressed in Arkangel.

Readers may have noticed that the cover price is now £1.50. This does not effect subscribers. The subscription rate is still £6. We can't afford the loss of supplying bookshops and other retailers at bulk trade prices, along with the cost of postage, unless the cover price is raised to allow for this. This is the only reason.

ONE PEOPLE

FETTERED THINKING

by Ronnie Lee

It is really rather sad that John Bryant's otherwise excellent book "Fettered Kingdoms" should be somewhat spoiled in its new revised edition by an Epilogue which so viciously attacks so many forms of direct action and which fails to accept the fact (whether JB likes it or not) that the ALF's campaign of economic sabotage has undoubtedly made a significant contribution to the reduction of animal persecution. Of course there is a certain amount of controversy surrounding some actions carried out by the ALF and other groups, but Bryant would have done a better service to the movement by discussing the pros and cons of such activity in a rational manner rather than indulge in all-out slagging.

John Bryant advocates such things as public education and peaceful persuasion and of course both of these are vitally important and their use needs to be supported and encouraged, but Bryant fails to consider whether such tactics have any limitations. Is it possible, for instance, to educate everybody to have the right attitude towards animals and, if not, what happens if a significant number continue to give financial support, as consumers, to animal persecution? Where is the evidence that the vast majority can be educated? And does not a rational look at society indicate that this is probably not the case?

There is indeed a highly-increased public awareness these days with many more people becoming vegetarians or vegans and attempting to live "cruelty-free" but does that really mean this trend can spread throughout the whole of society or is it only spreading amongst that section of the populace who are open (or allow themselves to be open) to such ideas? Even if most people could be converted, how long will that take and can the animals really afford to wait that long? And finally, if the majority of the population can't be persuaded to live cruelty-free, or if it will take too long, what other tactic is open to the movement to put the animals out of business, apart from direct action?

John Bryant's blind hatred of what he terms "violence" has not only inhibited him from rational discussion in his book but has also caused him to use the tragic death of Mike Hill as a soap-box from which to attack other animal rights activists. In a comment on Mike's death in the Spring '91 issue of Wildlife Guardian, Bryant repeats the lies of the gutter press in his description of the demonstration outside the house of the hunter/driver of the vehicle which killed Mike and his article insulted the demonstrators to such an extent that it caused Mike's family considerable upset. What Bryant conveniently chose to ignore (or perhaps what he failed to realise) was that as well as being a hunt saboteur Mike was also an ALF activist and so would almost certainly not have disapproved of the attack on property belonging to the huntsman involved in his death.

To be truly on the side of the animals is not to allow personal ideologies (whether they be of "nonviolence", "left-wing", "right-wing" or whatever) to stand in the way of what is necessary for their liberation. To be a good and true member of the movement is to give proper respect to others in it even if at times you disagree with their actions. It's time to get rid of those fetters, John!

NATIONAL CAMPAIGNS

ANGLO-VENETIAN/PROTECTION OF STRAYS (DINGO)

(4 Hop Row, Haddenham, Ely, Cambridgeshire)
Raises funds to support work for stray animals in Venice. In 1989/90 the group had 504 cats spayed, 159 castrated, 291 euthanised and 893 given treatment, vaccinations or operations.

ANIMAL AID

(7 Castle St, Tonbridge, Kent TN9 1BH - 0732 366533)

Carried out a small scale survey of medical opinion in the London area - 400 doctors received a questionnaire and about 60 doctors responded. 76% thought there are too many drugs on the market, 84% thought that more emphasis should be given to prevention of diseases and 53% thought that animal experiments should be reduced. Animal Aid was awarded the Mahaveer Trophy for its services to the cause of vegetarianism, at the mass vegetarian rally in Hyde Park, organised by the Young Indian Vegetarians. The society's newest campaign is called 'The Veggie Pledge'. Its aims are to have 10% of the population vegetarian by the year 2000. A new leaflet includes a pledge to give up meat, for the public to sign, and a booklet on the subject is also available. The Society has also launched a Humane Research Donor Card. The card will signify that the carrier is willing to allow their human tissue to be used for medical research, giving research scientists the chance to use material that can not only replace the use of animals in many areas of experimentation, but will also give results that are far more meaningful in attempts to understand and find cures for human disease. 'The Human Factor', a report by Animal Aid's scientific consultant Dr. Robert Sharpe, describes the many advantages of human tissue tests over animal experiments.

ANIMAL CONCERN (SCOTLAND)

(62 Old Dumbarton Rd, Glasgow G3 8RE - 041 334 6014)

Helped to save Magnus, a grey seal who was to be destroyed by Edinburgh Zoo. He had been held there for 20 years and after protests has now been moved to a seal sanctuary in Cornwall. A picket was organised against the National Farmers Union in Edinburgh, protesting at live exports.

ANIMAL CONCERN PICKETED THE NATIONAL FARMERS UNION IN EDINBURGH IN PROTEST AT LIVE EXPORT OF ANIMALS.
Pic S. Crawford/IACS

ALF SUPPORTERS GROUP

(BCM 1160, London WC1N 3XX)

Has a new range of merchandise for sale, including T-shirts, badges, postcards, writing pads and mugs.

ANIMAL LIBERATION INVESTIGATION UNIT

(PO Box 87, Rochdale, Lancs OL16 1AA)

Launched with a daytime visit to the Boots lab at Thurgarton in Nottinghamshire. Photos and a video were taken of the beagles there. Unfortunately this action resulted in a number of arrests - 43 people were charged with 3 counts of conspiracy and defendants had their homes searched. The action has prompted a nationwide campaign against Boots and the ALIU has posters, leaflets and T-shirts available.

THE BARN OWL TRUST

(Waterleat, Ashburton, Devon TQ13 7HU - Ashburton 53026)

The object of the Trust is to conserve the Barn Owl and its environment. As part of its work the Trust provides a comprehensive range of information sheets on the owl and its habitat. It has been operating since 1985 and has raised and released over 150 owls into the wild.

BRITISH UNION FOR THE ABOLITION OF VIVISECTION

(16a Crane Grove, London N7 8LB - 071 700 4888)

Launched its charities campaign, attacking the British Heart Foundation, the Cancer Research Campaign and the Arthritis and Rheumatism Council, who are cited as charities whose reliance on animal experiments is wasting time, money and lives. The campaign is backed up with leaflets and posters bearing the slogan "Where Charity Ends" and a 40-page report, "Faith, Hope and Charity", an enquiry into charity funded research by Dr. Gill Langley. The report is available at a price of £3.45 including p&p. The BUAV has recently received a donation of £5,000 from Sainsburys which will be used to aid their cosmetics testing campaign. The winter edition of Liberator magazine listed 12 things to do to help laboratory animals this year, suggesting that you can do one each month - these are, placing a BUAV sticker in your car window, buying the BUAV raffle tickets, filling out a petition, talking to people about the plight of lab animals, organising a street collection, writing to your MP, not giving to a charity which funds animal research, writing to companies asking them to change their policy on animal testing, taking part in the Walk for Laboratory Animals, placing a BUAV collecting box in a local shop, writing to your local paper and buying your Christmas gifts from the society's catalogue.

CARE FOR THE WILD

(1 Ashfolds, Ruspur, West Sussex, RH12 4QX - 0293 871596)

Joined with 4 other organizations to establish a rescue, retirement and rehabilitation centre for dolphins. PRIDE (Protection of Reefs and Islands from Degradation and Exploitation) has offered a protected sea area of some 100 acres surrounded by a secure 1,500 metre fence. It is hoped that this will be turned into the new Dolphin Centre.

THE CAT SURVIVAL TRUST

The Centre, Codicote Rd, Welwyn, Herts AL6 9TU
043871 687316478)

A charity concerned with the survival of wild endangered cats. Formed in 1976 they have bred over 160 cats in captivity but their main aim is to reintroduce cats into the wild, so that the charity has split its work into two areas, habitat preservation and cat conservation. The Trust has taken in wild cats as breeding stock, some of which had been impounded by the authorities from unlicensed and unsuitable collections.

THE CINNAMON TRUST

(Poldarves, Trescowe, Germoe, Penzance, Cornwall TR20 9RX - 0736 850291)

A registered charity providing help for elderly pet owners and new homes when the owner can no longer look after their pet. The Trust has a sanctuary which acts as a safe haven for a variety of wild animals as well as their rescued charges.

COMPASSION IN WORLD FARMING

(20 Lavant St, Petersfield, Hants GU32 3EW - 0730 64208)

Unfortunately lost its case against John Gummer concerning his issuing licenses for the export of animals while French farmers were attacking lorries carrying livestock. The organization commissioned an investigation into livestock slaughter in Spain to prove that the Spanish government's claim of having implemented the EC directive on stunning to be false. A video taken is being used as evidence and is available from the society. On January 24th a 378,000 signature petition concerning the campaign to ban the keeping of pregnant sows in narrow stalls, was handed in to the Ministry of Agriculture.

CIWF members demonstrate at Dover Docks.

CONSERVATIVE ANTI-HUNT COUNCIL

(PO Box 193, Welwyn, Herts AL6 9HG)

Exists to encourage the Conservative party to ban hunting and to generally promote anti-hunting views in Conservative party circles.

COUNCIL FOR THE PROTECTION OF RURAL ENGLAND

Published a charter calling for the better management of water resources in order to stop rivers and water meadows from drying up and prevent trees and wildlife from dying. The charter urges water companies to set up schemes to keep demand for water in line with existing supplies and states that the public should treat water as a precious and finite resource.

LET ME LIVE

ELEFRIENDS

(Cherry Tree Cottage, Coldharbour, Nr. Dorking, Surrey RH5 6HA - 0306 713320)

Released a single as part of their fund raising efforts. The record, called 'Let Me Live', was released on 6th November. Beauty Without Cruelty, British Airways, Carlsberg and Unilever are among those who have donated time and money to the organization. Elefriends has dispatched a truck and a flat-bottomed boat to Tanzania for anti-poaching activity. The boat's operating range is 500 miles and it is virtually unsinkable.

FAUNA & FLORA PRESERVATION SOCIETY

FAUNA AND FLORA PRESERVATION SOCIETY

(79-83 North St, Brighton, East Sussex BN1 1ZA - 0273 820445)

Has been in existence since 1903. Its most recent campaigns have been to focus awareness on bats, snakes and toads and their individual needs. The society has also become involved with the Mountain Gorilla Project.

THE FELLOWSHIP OF LIFE

(43 Braichmelyn, Bethesda, Bangor, Gwynedd LL57 3RD)

Founded in 1973, its aims are to establish vegetarianism as a Christian way of life and unite believers of all religions or none in a way of life which hurts neither life nor the environment. The society have two excellent leaflets, one about the Bible and vegetarianism and another more general, but very hard hitting, one about animal abuse. Membership is open to all and there is no subscription fee but donations are always gratefully accepted. Leaflets are available on request and a SAE is much appreciated.

FRIENDS OF THE EARTH

(26-28 Underwood St, London - 071 490 1555) Produced a leaflet highlighting ways of cutting down on electricity usage and have initiated a campaign to get householders to cut electricity consumption by 20% so as to reduce global warming. The society is stepping up its campaign against global warming and has produced an action poster showing how everyone can help. A card which people can carry with them at all times gives advice on how to help reduce greenhouse gases and a new leaflet explains the problems caused by global warming, including the fact that it will cause the extinction of millions of animals and plants.

GREEK ANIMAL WELFARE FUND

LIMITED

GREEK ANIMAL WELFARE FUND

(11 Lower Barn Rd, Purley, Surrey CR8 1HY - 081 668 0548)

Their first fully equipped Mobile Clinic made its way to Greece in October, after many months of hard work raising the money to bring the project to completion. Still in need of funds, however, to keep the clinic going and to continue to support animal shelters in Greece. GAWF now has its own office in Athens.

GREEN PARTY ANIMAL RIGHTS WORKING GROUP

(22 Station Rd, Greenfield, Holywell, Clwyd CH8 7EL)

Passed a policy at its conference on the 24th September with the stated long term aim to eliminate the wholesale exploitation of other species, foster understanding of our inter-relationship in the web of life and protect and promote natural habitat. The policy includes the active encouragement to reduce consumption of animal produce, a ban on the import/export of all furs, the outlawing of fur farms, a ban on importing ivory and whale oil, the phasing out of intensive farming including fish, to phase out animal experiments in 5 years with an immediate ban on cosmetic, weapons, LD50, Draize and experiments for me-too drugs, a total ban on dissection within 3 years, a ban on hunting with hounds, shooting and zoos.

GREENPEACE

GREENPEACE

(30-31 Islington Green, London N1 8XE)

Greenpeace is to prosecute a firm called Albright and Wilson, after harmful discharges of metals into the Irish Sea from its works in Cumbria exceeded the legal limit. In November three British Greenpeace protestors and their American guide were arrested and charged with trespassing after they entered a nuclear test sight in Nevada and held up a British test for two hours. Also in November Greenpeace demonstrators abseiled off Tower Bridge after the unfurling of a banner protesting against UK nuclear tests. They got through security checks by pretending that women members of the team were pregnant. Ten were charged with contravening Tower Bridge by-laws. Greenpeace also blocked a pipe owned by the Pilkington company which discharges effluent into the Mersey, and delivered 6 barrels of toxic effluent from the pipe to the main gates of their factory. In December activists in inflatable rafts prevented a Japanese ship from harpooning Minke whales off Antarctica.

HAPPIDOG PET FOODS

(Bridge End, Brownhill Lane, Longton, Preston, Lancashire PR4 4SJ - 0772 614952)

The vegetarian dog food makers now produce a complete puppy weaning and rearing food called Happipup, which can be fed to puppies from 2 to 3 weeks of age.

HUNT SABOTEURS ASSOCIATION

(PO Box 1, Carlton, Nottingham NG4 2JY - 0602 590357)

Has now become a VAT registered, limited company and as such has many plans to further aid local hunt saboteur groups.

IDENTICHIP

(Animalcare Ltd, Common Rd, Dunnington, York YO1 5RU)

Most vets can now implant a micro-chip in animals to identify them if they are ever lost. The Identichip is housed in implant grade glass and has been used for many years in human implants. The chip is passive and doesn't need batteries and cannot break down. In addition to these benefits the fee also covers the animals for third party public liability insurance to the value of £1 million and there is a fixed reward payable to collection centres. Charges have to be met each year to keep the registration up to date and to cover the insurance. Please see Pro Dogs for further details.

INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL FOR BIRD PRESERVATION

(32 Cambridge Rd, Girton, Cambridge CB3 7BR) Has over 22 projects, including Cousin Island near the Seychelles which was purchased to protect the Seychelles Warbler and also protects rare turtles. The council publishes data books on the status of the worlds threatened birds and has a computerised databank.

THE INTERNATIONAL DONKEY PROTECTION TRUST

INTERNATIONAL DONKEY PROTECTION TRUST

(Sidmouth, Devon EX10 0NU - 0395 578222/513254) With the help of the Spanish government the Trust is helping to improve conditions at donkey safaris in Tenerife and is setting up a code of practice. The Trust rescued a donkey called Blackie from a ritual killing at the Lenten festival. It is now safe in the sanctuary in Devon. To help combat the terrible problems in Mexico the Trust has purchased an ambulance, giving the vets access to markets in the more remote areas.

ILDAV

(International League of Doctors for the Abolition of Vivisection, Vernon Coleman, Lynmouth, Devon EX35 6EE)

Nurses are being urged to join the League following the launch of its European campaign against animal experiments.

JAPAN ANIMAL WELFARE SOCIETY

(RMC House, Townmead Rd, London SW6 2RZ - 071 736 9306)

Started in 1954 in Tokyo and has been fighting since against the indifference to animal suffering in Japan. The branch in England raises funds and awareness of the situation in Japan.

LIVING LAND PROJECT

(122 Charles Barmy Crescent, Hulme, Manchester M15 5DW)

Aims to buy a smallholding anywhere in Britain where they can farm veganically, plant trees, create a wildlife garden and set up workshops. They also intend to recycle all their waste and to use alternative energy sources. It is also hoped that the holding would be an educational centre.

LEAGUE AGAINST CRUEL SPORTS

3-87 Union St, London SE1 1SG - 071 407 0979/3155)

Sponsored a 3 year scientific study of foxes in the Highlands of Scotland, at a cost of £85,000. The conclusion of the study is that the suspension of culling foxes does not mean that there is an increase in the fox population or any increase in the number of lambs deaths possibly attributed to foxes. The League hopes that this will persuade the government to end subsidies for the killing of foxes in Scotland and will also force the Forestry Commission to reassess its policy of killing foxes at the request of sheep farmers. 'Victim of Myth', the full report, is available from the League for £3 including p&p. LACS has purchased another 18 acres of land vital to protect deer from the Quantock Stagounds. This, in addition to the other land owned by the League, makes the area which the Stagounds can hunt that little bit smaller but also means that the hunt must avoid an even larger area of land because of the fear that their quarry will escape onto League land.

(Ravenside, 261 Goldhawk Rd, Hammersmith, London W12 9PE - 081 846 9777)

Moved to a new address which is much larger and has given the society the opportunity to expand its library and information centre. NAVS have also taken on extra staff in campaigns, membership, orders and accounts departments. The new reception area is to have a display of merchandise. The society has also opened a new shop in Birmingham called "The AD Shop". It was officially opened by patron Sinitta and accompanied by a fashion show. Every customer at the shop receives a leaflet with their purchase. The ground floor sells clothing, the first floor is for cruelty-free cosmetics and the second floor houses childrens wear and other goods such as stationery. The society is also launching a new range of merchandise. NAVS are the organisers of the World Day for Laboratory Animals march and rally on 27th April

NATIONAL CANINE DEFENCE LEAGUE

(1 Pratt Mews, London NW1 0AD)

A 'Lost Dog Pack' is available from the League which includes a special poster with room for a photo but small enough to go in a shop window. It also includes advice about options available when a dog is lost. The organisation has an affinity card in conjunction with the Royal Bank of Scotland - every card which is issued will earn a £7.50 donation for the League as well as a donation every time the card is used. There is also a free travel accident insurance of up to £50,000. Otherwise the card is just like a normal credit card. 1991 is the centenary year of the NCDL and a special logo has been produced. An extra effort is to be made to make this year that little bit more important for the NCDL and the dogs that they help.

OPERATION BUTTERFLY

Campaigning to save 7 rare British butterfly species from extinction because of development and agriculture. They have announced the first of a chain of sanctuaries. A Bucks landowner has given 12.5 acres of woodland near Aylesbury to conserve a colony of black hairstreak butterflies. He will not develop or spray crops and will work with a conservationist to safeguard its future. The society began last year with a grant of £300,000 from a Belgian firm and has 30 area organisers.

PETWATCH

(PO Box 16, Brighouse, West Yorkshire HD6 1DS)
Warning people to be on the alert for suspicious adverts which may be a cover for organised pet thieves. Petwatch can now supply pet discs bearing the name and address at a price of 50p and a stamp. They can also supply leaflets promoting the need to have all pets wearing a disc or tag of some sort. The group's magazine Petwatcher lists examples of known pet losses and the organization as a whole is campaigning to have the theft of cats recognized as the real problem that it is.

PEOPLES DISPENSARY FOR SICK ANIMALS

(Whitechapel Way, Priorslee, Telford, Shropshire TF2 9PQ - 0952 290999)

Founded in 1917 to provide free veterinary treatment for the owners of pets unable to afford the fees. By law the organization is unable to charge fees for its services, but donations are gratefully received. PDSA services do not include vaccination and neutering which are elective procedures for which people can plan and budget. In 1989 the PDSA spent about £10.8 million carrying out its work and now has 56 veterinary clinics around the country.

PRO DOGS

(Rocky Bank, 4 New Rd, Ditton, Kent ME20 6AD)
Warned in its magazine about the implant of microchips in dogs necks as some people are electro-magnetic sensitive and so it may be assumed that some dogs can be too. There is also opposition to tattooing for fears that stolen dogs may have the marks cut or burnt out. The society is backing an education campaign with recommendations that breeders should be made to accept responsibility for the puppies they breed. Pro dogs are also launching a campaign against the docking of spaniels' tails.

PUPPY WATCH

(PO Box 23, Neath, West Glamorgan SA11 1QP)
Formerly Puppy Watch Wales, their campaign now extends throughout the country. They are campaigning for immediate 'power of entry' for local authority inspectors or the RSPCA where illegal breeding or cruelty is suspected. A bill is hoped to go through in the next session incorporating this. A 15,000 signature petition was presented to the Kennel Club to encourage them not to register puppies from farms or commercial breeders.

auseway, Horsham, West Sussex RH12 1HG -

Launched a £30,000 Europe-wide campaign to curtail the transport of live animals for slaughter. Graphic and hard hitting adverts have appeared in many newspapers and on the London Underground. The 4 demands of the campaign are 1) To limit the journey to slaughter to 8 hours maximum, 2) A continuation of the British ban on the export of live horses and ponies, 3) Compulsory certification for all vehicles and drivers transporting animals, 4) Enforcement of the law relating to animal transport throughout Europe by properly trained and financed inspectors.

The society had its annual 'don't give pets as presents' campaign leading up to Christmas. The RSPCA's magazine 'Animal Life' urges its 60,000 readers to write to the Environment Secretary asking him to support the EEC plan to ban leghold traps. An 18th century grade 2 listed barn is to be used as convalescent quarters for seals at the society's purpose built wildlife hospital. This new £1 million hospital, a conversion of farm buildings at East Winch, near Kings Lynn in Norfolk, will open next year. It will include an operating theatre, X-ray room and an intensive care unit. The hospital will be able to care for 50 seals at a time and about 3,000 other injured birds and mammals a year. The RSPCA sent a team of wildlife experts with special skills in treating animals contaminated by oil to Saudi Arabia following the oil pollution in the Gulf.

ROYAL SOCIETY FOR THE PROTECTION OF BIRDS

(The Lodge, Sandy, Beds SG19 2DL)

Lodged an appeal to the European Commission against development of harmful tourist facilities in the Coto Donana, an important wildlife area and national park in SW Spain. In a report published in Brussels in November the RSPB stated that the Common Agricultural policy should be reformed so that farmers receiving subsidies would be required to protect the remaining wildlife habitat on their land. The society has also bought 272 acres of Stoborough Heath in Dorset to maintain its importance as a wildlife habitat and to encourage rare species.

SEA SHEPHERD CONSERVATION SOCIETY

0784 254846)

Now the proud owners of a new sea going ship, bringing their fleet to two vessels. The new addition to the seaforce is a 95 foot, 106 ton patrol boat, the Edward Abbey. The ship is named to honour the late Edward Abbey who was an environmental writer and long-standing member of the Sea Shepherd. It was built in 1955 as a US coastal guard patrol boat. Her twin Detroit engines were installed new in 1978 and rebuilt in 1988. With a top speed of 25 knots the ship will give Sea Shepherd the freedom to pursue ecological bandits whose ability to outrun the Sea Shepherd 2 has been a cause of frustration.

Working together the Edward Abbey will be able to slow down their target till the slower Sea Shepherd 2, with its reinforced hull, can shut down the target permanently. The new ship will carry a crew of 14. The UK's branch has a major inland campaign against Windsor Safari Park Dolphinaria, which it is picketing. Sea Shepherd also plan a number of actions directed against the Japanese, due to their massive involvement in marine life abuse.

Sea Turtle Survival

(PO Box 790, London SW16 3NJ - 081 764 9186)

Formed in 1990 to promote awareness of the plight of turtles throughout the world. Sea Turtle Survival is campaigning to save the threatened nesting beaches of the endangered Loggerhead Turtle. Comprising mainly of ex-volunteers from the turtle conservation programme run by the Sea Turtle Protection Society of Greece on the island of Zakynthos, the group aim to raise awareness in Britain of the threat expanding tourism poses to the turtles and their nesting beaches. Volunteers on the 1990 programme were confronted by gangs who carried out serious violent attacks on Sea Turtle Protection Society members, made death threats and sabotaged the group's work. Illegal development is taking place on beaches which have been designated 'protected' and the authorities take no action against those responsible. This year Sea Turtle Survival aim to highlight the illegal establishments so that tourists can boycott them and be provided with a simple list of dos and don'ts in order that the turtles are not disturbed. STS are campaigning for a Marine Park in Laganos Bay which they believe is the only thing that will ensure the future of the turtles in the Mediterranean. 80% of holidaymakers to the island are British.

THE TREE COUNCIL

Unveiled a tree warden scheme whereby trees across the country are to be protected by a network of volunteer wardens in parishes and communities. County Councils are being encouraged to find a volunteer in every single parish and community to fulfill the role. So far 30 councils have shown an interest and 100 wardens have been appointed. The Tree Council is a charity partly funded by the Department of the Environment.

FEED THE HUNGRY

VEGAN SOCIETY

(7 Battle Rd., St. Leonards-on-Sea, East Sussex TN37 7AA - 0424 427393)

Produced a festive turkey leaflet at Christmas jointly with Chicken's Lib, CIWF and the Vegetarian Society (UK). Investigating microbiological testing, which uses animal products and is used in the testing of the majority of food and non-food items, including those which are labelled 'cruelty-free', and despite there being alternative tests available which do not use animal products. The society has been informed that Bonita Skin Care does not commission or perform microbiological tests at all. The Vegan Society council has ratified the use of its trade mark to the companies Crookes Healthcare, Mocatan and The Bio-D Company.

VEGETARIAN SOCIETY (UK)

WA14 4QG - 061 928 0793)

The vegetarian message has been spread to many schools by the Society's Youth Education department and, following their success, the Vegetarian Society is launching a major campaign aimed at adults. The Society's cookery school is open to both vegetarians and non-veggers. Course brochures available on request VS merchandise includes The Vegetarian Handbook, £3.95, and The Vegetarian Travel Guide 1991, £5.50 - add £1.50 p&p per book, £2.50 for two or more. The Handbook is free to members, including non-vegetarians who may join as associates. The Society's Open Day and Garden Party is on Sunday 14th July this year, at its national headquarters. There will be stalls from various organizations, entertainments, food and drinks, a raffle with a first prize of £1,000 being drawn on the day, and much more.

VEGFAM

(The Sanctuary, Nr. Lydford, Okehampton, Devon
EX20 4AL - 082 282 203)

To help Vegfam raise funds visitors can now stay for a self-catering holiday at their headquarters. Over the past 2 years over £20,000 has been donated for relief projects not involving the exploitation of animals.

WWF

(Panda House, Wayside Park, Catteshall Lane, Godalming, Surrey GU7 1XR)

Fieldwork completed by the WWF has shown that there are only 70-150 Lowland Gorillas left in South East Nigeria. The WWF is putting together a long-term management plan to save the gorillas and their habitat. The British government is being lobbied to have tighter control on the export of ivory from Hong Kong. A joint petition by the WWF and Greenpeace collected 500,000 signatures to support the idea of having Antarctica as an international wildlife park and to stop mineral extraction. The government has now stated that it has no objection to this proposal.

YOUNG INDIAN VEGETARIANS

- 081 681 8884)

On 10th December the Society organised a programme at Greenwich Hindu Temple where Nipan Malde gave a talk about the spiritual aspects of vegetarianism, which was followed by a full vegetarian meal. On 22nd December the annual Christmas lunch was held with Bernard Weatherill as speaker.

ZOO CHECK

(Cherry Tree Cottage, Coldharbour, Dorking, Surrey RH5 6HA - 0306 713431)

In conjunction with the Mail on Sunday the group organised the 'Into the Blue' campaign and acted as agents for Rocky the dolphin when he was moved to the world's first Dolphin Rescue, Retirement, Rehabilitation Centre where he will be professionally cared for in over 100,000,000 gallons of crystal clear Caribbean water.

• LOCAL GROUPS

ANIMAL AID (LONDON AREA)

(PO Box 254, London E5 8TB)

In November last year the group held a public meeting with speakers from CIWF and a vegan health shop. In February they held their second campaign conference, with stalls, literature and vegan food as well as speakers from BUAV, CIWF, LACS and the Vegetarian Society (UK).

ANIMAL RESCUE

(PO Box 8, Widnes, Cheshire WA8 0FX)

Raising funds for vet and food bills for sick and abandoned animals and for campaign work. Co-ordinating and sponsoring 'The Liverpool Animal Meetings'. A meeting on 21st March invited both public and Merseyside animal rights campaigners and featured speakers from the Hunt Saboteurs Association, Liverpool Animal Rights Association, the Campaign to End Vivisection at Liverpool University and Badger Protection. The talks were illustrated with videos. This first meeting was a great success - over 100 people attended. The next meeting will be on Thursday 20th June 1991, at 7.30pm prompt, at Bluecoat Chambers, School Lane (Back of Littlewoods in Church St), Liverpool city centre. Again there will be speakers from a number of groups.

ANIMAL RIGHTS CAMBRIDGE

A demo was held outside a commercial turkey farm and at the same time members entered the farm buildings with cameras and videos. They had left by the time the police arrived. The demo outside was attended by the Reverend Tony Ruffel. The video is available to show at meetings and it was on show at the Co-ordinating Animal Welfare meeting held in Cambridge on January 13th. The group also held a protest outside Haverhill Meat Products, a pig abattoir which deals solely with Sainsbury's. The abattoir is said to kill 3,000 pigs a day. A fur dealer who came to a Cambridge hotel for a day, to renovate furs, only had bookings from animal rights activists and he went home at mid-day feeling rather cross. Meanwhile the rest of the group picketed the hotel and a fur coat was burnt symbolically. The group is campaigning against vivisection at Cambridge University. The aim of the campaign is to stop the experiments and have them replaced with videos that convey exactly the same information. The University Students Union has adopted a policy demanding the use of videos and pledges support for students who object to the use of animals in university courses. Following ARC campaigning, 50% of students have been walking out of some physiology demonstrations in disgust at the experiments being carried out. The group holds a weekly stall in the local market at which they are collecting signatures to present to the council asking for them to erect a memorial or plaque in memory of all the animals who have died or suffered in animal experimentation in the city. A third of the group's income is donated to the local hunt sab group. Early in February the group held a picket against Boots in conjunction with Cambridge University Animal Concern.

BOGNOR AND CHICHESTER ACTION FOR ANIMALS

In November the group had its eleventh demo outside a local fur shop in Rushington and collected 200 signatures for their petition. The shop owner has stated that he will not sell synthetic furs because they are not biodegradable. The group has also set up a Badger Protection Group for the area and the local Forestry Commission has given them permission to monitor setts on its land. To aid the badger protection work the group has bought a mini-bus and is seeking sponsors from groups and individuals to run the vehicle. The group held its first public meeting at the local college which featured a talk by an RSPCA Superintendent, illustrated by slides. The group has also been helping out on a local nature reserve and they are calling for a referendum to stop shooting of birds at Pagham Harbour Nature Reservation.

BOLTON AND DISTRICT ANIMAL RIGHTS

(PO Box 47, Bolton)

After the group organised letter writing and lobbying of councillors the council has banned circuses with animals and the giving of animals as prizes on council land.

DOVER AND ANIMAL DEFENDERS

Group members chained themselves across the entrance to Dover Docks in a bid to prevent lorries carrying live animals from entering the port. In October the group displayed anti live export banners to passengers on cross-channel ferries as they left Dover Docks, from dinghies manned by Sea Action, the marine section of CND.

BROMLEY ANIMAL DEFENCE GROUP

Held a demo against Gerry Cottle's circus on October 31st and are campaigning to ban circuses with animals in the borough.

CAMPAIGN TO END VIVISECTION AT LIVERPOOL UNI

(c/o Liverpool University Animal Action, 2 Bedford Street North, Liverpool L69 7BR)
Began their campaign in the autumn with a 24 hour vigil outside 'Devil's Tower', the ten storey windowless animal house at Liverpool University. In November wreaths were laid at the Psychology and Veterinary Science departments. The group is circulating a petition and has three leaflets on vivisection at the University. The group are holding a march and demo against Liverpool University Veterinary Research Centre at Leanurst on the Wirral (where much vivisection takes place) on 24th April, World Day for Laboratory Animals.

CARLISLE HUNT SABOTEURS

(PO Box 83, Carlisle, Cumbria CA1 3AN)
Has its own leaflet which pictures a fox before and after a hunt. It also details the acts of a general hunt and asks for support and donations.

CARDIFF ANIMAL RIGHTS SOCIETY

(c/o Students Union Building, Park Place, Cardiff CF1)
Having weekly demos against the departments involved in vivisection at Cardiff University. This has resulted in the cancelling of lectures in the targeted departments when the demos are taking place. The group have requested to be shown around the animal labs to ensure that the guidelines are being enforced. They are also continuing with their anti-McDonalds campaign with fortnightly demos outside their premises in Cardiff's main shopping street.

CLAPHAM AND BATTERSEA ANIMAL RIGHTS

On May 4th the group will be staging a Cruelty-Free Afternoon at the Garfield Centre in Battersea where they will be selling 'cruelty-free' products and arranging for a fur amnesty and product swap.

CLEVELAND ACTION FOR ANIMAL RIGHTS

(The Charity Shop, 32 Lowthian Rd, Hartlepool, Cleveland)
Produces a quarterly newsletter called 'Animal Action' which reports on national and local news and costs 75p. The group consists of four branches, in Hartlepool, Stockton, East Cleveland and Middlesborough, each with their own contact. Hartlepool has had regular campaign stalls and their first benefit gig. They hope to be helping out on the Flamingoland campaign this year. Stockton have had regular stalls as well and have leafleted the Stockton area. East Cleveland have had a series of Vegan Taste Ins which have proved very popular, as have their jumble sales. They have a regular stall in Redcar but are looking for other areas in which to hold stalls which up to now have only been leafleted. Middlesborough have had several library displays, the best being in Acklam, and have also done a few benefit gigs with the aid of a local band 'Spit the Pips'.

CLWYD ANIMAL AID

Had donated over £800 to the Animal Aid offices by October last year. The group does donate a small amount to local abandoned animal charities but all other funds raised go to the national organization.

CORNWALL ANIMAL RIGHTS

Arranged for a Christmas leaflet to be inserted in all editions of a local newspaper. The National Farmers Union was upset but the reporter who covered the story about it became vegetarian.

COVENTRY ANIMAL ALLIANCE

(Box 1, Wedge Bookshop, 13 High St, Coventry, Warwickshire)

Holds a stall in the city every Friday and have been receiving quite a lot of support from the public. The group held a fund raising gig in December and now have their own transport. They are trying to get compensation from the police after being arrested outside McDonalds in October last year.

DARTMOOR BADGERS PROTECTION LEAGUE

Campaigning against the proposed improvements to the A30 Honiton to Exeter Road which will destroy two of the finest badger setts in Devon - people are asked to write to the Secretary of State for Transport, Whitehall, London SW, and ask for the road to be redirected. The League is still in urgent need of more people to help with its badger sett patrols.

DEVON ANIMAL RIGHTS

(PO Box 79, Exeter, Devon EX2 9AR)

Taking their stalls to various events and have put on street theatre, organised a fur collection and burning. The group have also demonstrated against hunting and held a Living Without Cruelty exhibition.

DORSET AND BOURNEMOUTH ANIMAL WELFARE GROUP

Produced a leaflet explaining the salmonella problem of battery eggs and condemning the cruelty in battery farming. 1,000 of these leaflets have been posted or delivered to guest houses and hotels in the Bournemouth, Poole, Swanage and Weymouth area. The group is also distributing the London Greenpeace anti-McDonalds leaflet on most Saturdays as part of an ongoing campaign against the burger chain.

EAST LONDON ANIMAL RIGHTS

(PO Box 216, Forest Gate, London E7 9RB)

Held a public meeting in November last year about their vegetarian campaign. There are plans to put on a disco and benefit gig to raise funds.

EAST SUSSEX HARE PROTECTION

(PO Box 47, St Leonards-on-Sea, East Sussex TN38 0FT)

As the name suggests, the group has been set up to protect hares in East Sussex. It is believed to be the first of its kind in the country. Its main target is to be the little known Hailsham based Pevensey Marsh Beagles and seeks the disbandment of this hunt by a combination of leafletting and traditional hunt sabbing tactics. The group has already brought hounds to a standstill on two occasions. The group has two black and white photos of this hunt available for media purposes and an excellent leaflet focusing on this hunt.

ESSEX SOUTH AND SOUTHEAST RSPCA BRANCH

One of the RSPCA's most active branches, they give special emphasis to rehoming, campaigning, fundraising and education. They have recently persuaded Castle Point District Council to ban animal circuses from its land and have picketed Gerry Cottle's circus. One of the two remaining fur outlets in Southend has a closing down sale and members are outside the other shop every other Saturday with banners, leaflets and a petition. No healthy animal is put down by the branch and they employ a rehoming co-ordinator. Vegetarianism is promoted within the branch. The group has a successful shop in Southend.

FLAMINGO LAND DOLPHIN CAMPAIGN

(c/o MDC, PO Box 63, Lancaster LA1 4GD)

Campaigning to close the dolphin pool at Flamingo Land where 13 dolphins have died in the past 14 years - 5 in one incident all within 48 hours. Flamingo Land needs permission to increase the size of their pool and the group is opposing this with demonstrations and is planning a national demo in the spring.

FUR FREE SHEFFIELD CAMPAIGN

Held a demo outside the Rotherham Moathouse Hotel in November last year, wearing skeleton masks and bloodied fur coats - the hotel was staging an exhibition by Glyn and Leinhardt Furriers. This company used to have a fur shop in Sheffield but it closed due to lack of demand. Held demonstrations outside Stella Furriers.

HACKNEY AND ISLINGTON ANIMAL RIGHTS GROUP

(Box 17, Sunpower, 198 Blackstock Rd, London N5)

After the group's campaign which helped to close down the Hudson Bay fur company in this country, the group moved on to the last fur shop in its area, Maldor Furs in the Kingsland Road. They began with demos every Saturday and had to endure verbal and physical threats from the proprietor and intimidation from the police. The group arranged a meeting with a Chief Inspector who told them that if they continued the demonstrations they would be arrested. The group held a final demo where a wreath was laid outside the shop. However, the group had the last laugh because later on the shop stopped selling furs and went over to electrical goods. Demos have also been held outside Boots, Kentucky Fried Chicken and outside an Imperial Cancer Research Fund charity shop which opened in November last year. On 4th February this year the group held a public meeting entitled 'Animal Rights and Gay Politics'. The speaker was Peter Tatchell, a leading campaigner for gay rights. The aim of the meeting was to make clear the meaning of AIDS research and to encourage the gay community to speak out against it. A video was shown on the use of monkeys in hepatitis and AIDS research. About 50 people attended.

HAVERING ACTION FOR ANIMALS

In December 22nd last year the group held a Christmas Without Cruelty exhibition in Romford with vegan food, 'cruelty-free' toiletries, merchandise and information. Prior to the event the group did a lot of leafleting to advertise it. Also that month the group went carol singing to raise money for a local dog sanctuary.

HEREFORD ANIMAL RIGHTS

Held a small demo against an animal circus and received good local media coverage. They also collected £300 to help fight badger baiting.

(PO Box 66, Broxbourne, Herts, EN10 6LU - 0426 911785 - 24 hour Voicebank)

Distributed 20,000 leaflets advertising a series of ten public meetings which have been attended by a total of 300 people. 10,000 of the group's campaign leaflet have gone out and their membership has risen to 300 people. Herts County Council are receiving up to 150 protest cards every week, which have been produced by the group, and the petition is well on course for their target of 10,000 signatures, which would make it the second biggest petition ever received by the council, the largest being a 25,000 signature petition handed in in 1983 demanding an end to bloodsports. The group has had over 40 local newspaper reports across Herts since July last year, as well as radio coverage. This has led to a flood of enquiries and a number of schools have asked for speakers for older pupils. An average of 2-3 stalls are held each week in various Herts towns with 7 stalls in 7 days being held in an anti-cubbing week of action, with children dressed up in fox cub masks, again with much media interest. The Campaign now comprises of about a dozen animal rights/welfare groups and has established valuable links between groups which had previously worked alone. Just before Christmas the Campaign held three street stalls concentrating on bloodsports, to counteract the Boxing Day publicity that hunts get. The result was over 2,000 new signatures and £700 in donations. The group has produced its own leaflet about bloodsports and their local hunt the Enfield Chase - the leaflet was headed "This Boxing Day beware of men in red coats.....they may not be Father Christmas".

HOUSLOW AND TWICKENHAM ANIMAL DEFENCE GROUP

Formed in January and advertised extensively for members and attended a car boot sale to raise funds. They plan to hold stalls and produce a newsletter as well as having a small exhibition in Hounslow library. The group has adopted a seal at a sanctuary in Cornwall and they pay £200 for its upkeep each year.

ISLE OF WIGHT PRESERVATION AND ACTION GROUP

The Winter edition of the group's 'Preserve' magazine includes articles on nuclear weapons, the role of Paganism in the AR movement, the trade in wild-caught birds and kangaroo protection, as well as vegan recipes, poems and subscribers' letters.

KIDDERMINSTER ANIMAL RIGHTS GROUP

Held a successful evening in the local town hall. Over 50 people attended. The aim of the evening was to promote the vegetarian campaign of Animal Aid. One of the members of the audience was the district nurse, who admitted that all the health points made were absolutely true.

LAKELAND ANIMAL AID

(PO Box 83, Carlisle, Cumbria CA1 3AN)

The group held a demo outside McDonalds in Carlisle which received extensive press coverage. McDonalds employees, however, were told by the Council Town Centre Warden that they could not hand out their own leaflets because they had not obtained permission, whereas the Animal Aid group had previously applied for permission. A fur amnesty was held again in Carlisle in October last year with the stated aim of making the city fur free. The ten furs that were collected were passed on to Lynx and hundreds of signatures were collected on a petition against Swallow Hill Top Hotel which holds leather and fur sales. The group has produced its own general leaflet which covers information about the use of animals for food, entertainment, vivisection and fur. It also gives advice for people who want to adopt a more humane lifestyle.

Evening News and Star

Fur-free hopes

LANCASTER ANIMAL RIGHTS

(Students Union Building, Bailrigg, Lancaster University, Lancaster, Lancashire)

In October last year the group took part in a demonstration at a McDonalds in Stoke-on-Trent, organised in conjunction with Manchester Animal Protection Group and Stoke Animal Rights, and organised a street theatre outside Lancaster McDonalds. Street theatre also featured in a campaign against L'Oreal, particularly the continued sale of L'Oreal products on campus, along with leafleting and a petition. The group took a minibus down to the National Trust AGM in Llandudno to add their voices to the debate on whether to ban hunting on NT land. A Christmas Without Cruelty Fayre was held with 'cruelty-free' cosmetics, books and merchandise and videos and speakers. A 'Free Range Week' has been organised, urging everyone on campus to eat only free-range eggs in an effort to persuade the university caterers to use only free-range eggs in the meals.

LIVERPOOL ANIMAL RIGHTS ASSOCIATION

(PO Box 8, Widnes, Cheshire WA8 0DX)

A campaign against dissection has been launched. Petitions are available and the intention is to deliver several thousand signatures to the county council calling for a ban. On 21st March the group took part in the first of a series of animal rights meetings in Liverpool - see 'Animal Rescue'.

LONDON VEGANS

Produces a very useful listing of events of interest to vegans in the London area, sent free to subscribers.

LOWESTOFT AND DISTRICT ANIMAL AID

(PO Box 22, Lowestoft, Suffolk NR33 8LA)

In November the group held a stall in the town followed by a meeting in a room in the local library for interested young people, in order to gain new recruits for their youth group. The youth group held a stall at the Lowestoft Animal Charities Christmas Fayre to raise money for animal rescue and is also writing to schools in the area to drum up more membership. The main group held a totally vegan Christmas cookery demo on December 7th.

MIDDLESEX ANIMAL RIGHTS

Held a vigil outside Mill Hill vivisection labs on Christmas afternoon and laid a wreath for the animals inside.

NEW FOREST ANIMAL PROTECTION GROUP

(PO Box 45, Ringwood, Hants - 0425 621671)
The group's petition was handed in to the Forestry Commission in the new year. Members have been sabotaging the New Forest Foxhounds with many successes in stopping the digging out of foxes and a general decline in the number of kills by the hunt.

NORTHERN IRELAND ETHICAL RESEARCH CAMPAIGN

(Students Union, University of Ulster, Jordanstown Campus, Shore Rd, Newtownabbey, Northern Ireland)

Has been campaigning to have all donations made to the Queens students union rag week given to only ethical charities and has been leafleting with a list of ethical charities.

NORWICH ANIMALS CHARTER

(PO Box 30, Norwich, Norfolk NR1 4DT)

A street collection for animal rescue raised over £350. Over £100 has been raised for the youth group. Plans have been made for a two week exhibition at the local library.

Demonstration held by the Manchester Animal Protection Group in December last year against Boots' use of beagles in experiments

MANCHESTER ANIMAL PROTECTION GROUP

(One World Centre, 13 Paton St, Manchester 1)
Staging a day of action against vivisection and against Manchester Medical School on Saturday 8th June. It will start with a march from Platt Fields (assemble 11am) to Albert Square where there will be a short rally. An exhibition with stalls will follow in the Town Hall where vegan refreshments will be served. The day will end with a Social Evening with Disco. A large number of marchers are required, wearing black if possible. Contact 061 225 2073 for further details. On December 8th last year the group held a Christmas Fair with information and vegan food and it was well attended. The group launched a 'don't buy pets for Christmas presents' campaign, to continue on after Christmas. A leaflet produced for the campaign urges people to give homes to animals from sanctuaries rather than buying them from kennels, pet shops or breeders. Several demos have been held against circuses which have visited the area including Gandeys, Starr and the Hungarian State Circus. The group supported pickets outside Morecambe Marineland. A successful demonstration against Boots' use of animals in experiments involved a coffin and activists dressed as beagles. An open day at Hyline rabbit farm, which breeds for meat, vivisection and the pet trade, was disrupted by a protest demo. In a joint action with Students Campaign for Animal Rights, a halal poultry slaughter unit, a knockers yard and a pig farm were inspected with the attendance of a BBC TV crew who used the footage obtained in a 'Reportage' programme in the new year. The video film was presented to Richard Body MP to use to promote his Pig Husbandry Bill. The Environmental Health Board are now investigating all three premises. The group's anti-fur pickets have been a great success and they have had over 100 fur coats handed in to them.

NUNEATON ANIMAL CONCERN

Looking for more members. The group meets every Tuesday evening at the WRVS, Newtown Rd, (near the Bus Station) in Nuneaton, between 7 and 9pm. The group holds an information stall in the town centre and has also organised a debate at the local library. Seven members dressed up as a bear, dog, cat, elephant, polar bear, chicken and gorilla and went collecting, raising £243, part of which was donated to a local animal sanctuary. On 15th December a benefit gig with three bands was held to raise funds.

ROSS ANIMAL RIGHTS

Have held demos at several local hunt balls. They have also held a jumble sale with the proceeds going to an animal sanctuary and they are planning sponsored walks to help the local Badger Group fit alarms to setts. Members attended an all week vigil in protest at animal experiments at Bristol University, raising over £600.

ST. ALBANS BRANCH VS(UK)

Organising an 'Animals and Environment Fair' at the Apple Market, Covent Garden, London, on Sunday 12th May from 9am to 6pm.

SKEGNESS ANIMAL AID

Held a talk and showed a film at a local youth club. Group members are touring local schools to give talks on vivisection, vegetarianism etc. Members foster dogs until they are found permanent homes.

SOUTHERN YORKSHIRE END BLOODSPORTS CAMPAIGN

Leaflets villages where hunts meet and monitors hunts and their members for any overlap into unlawful bloodsports. The group has numerous door to door collections and gives many talks.

SOUTH DEVON ANIMAL RIGHTS

A campaign against the Christmas slaughter of turkeys went well. The group are also leafletting branches of Boots.

SHEFFIELD CAMPAIGN FOR ANIMAL RIGHTS

(PO Box 407, Sheffield S1 1ED)

Held a stall at the Derbyshire Peace Federation Conference. A demo was held outside McDonalds with members dressed as Ronald McMurderburger and Daisy the cow. The demo was such a hit that the group ran out of leaflets. The group picketed a new Imperial Cancer Research Fund charity shop when it opened in the town. They also demonstrated outside the Hungarian State Circus which had an amazingly low attendance and almost certainly made a loss. A delegation from the group was invited to witness a performance and go backstage. The group's large and well packed newsletter is being produced quarterly. The group goes hunt sabbing during the season and at the beginning of the grouse shooting season they managed to stop one shoot completely. They closed down the last fur shop in Sheffield with demos, leaflets, postcards and T-shirts. The group are currently targeting a fur shop outside of Sheffield run by a Harry Fish. During the first demonstration the shop shut up for the day. A leafleting session was held outside Chatsworth Game Fair, a stall was held at the local Green Fair, two performances of Fosset's circus were picketed in October last year and the group also attended a demo in Newcastle against Proctor and Gamble. Group members talked to Robin Smith of the BUAV about their directive to groups not to demonstrate against cancer research charity shops and their threat to withdraw support from groups that do. The group celebrated the fact that the city is now 'Fur-Free' with a demo in which they dressed as undertakers and carried a coffin to the sound of funeral music. The group has travelled further afield, taking their stalls to other towns and they picketed a circus in Rotherham. They are also campaigning against a local kennels where the conditions are appalling. At the end of November they held a stall with street theatre in which one member dressed up as a turkey.

SOUTH HUMBERSIDE ANIMAL RIGHTS CAMPAIGN

Box 6, Scunthorpe, South Humberside
DN17 1HW)

On November 18th the group held a vegetarian afternoon with a vegetarian food tasting session and various videos.

SOUTH LONDON ANIMAL AID

(PO Box 594, London SW9 8QG)

Campaigning to persuade Wandsworth Council to ban circuses with animals from council land resulted on 17th October last year, in a full ban on circuses with wild animals. The group held a Christmas Without Cruelty Fair and attractions included demonstrations on vegetarian cookery and 'cruelty-free' make-up, videos and speakers. A Green Santa gave out 'cruelty-free' gifts. There were over 40 stalls and an estimated 1,500 visitors turned up. The group plans a similar event for this year. They also held a Whistle Blowers demo outside St. George's Hospital, Tooting, where Greyhounds, cats, ferrets and other animals are experimented on.

SOUTH MIDLANDS ANIMAL AID

(3c Hanover St, Bromsgrove, Worcs B61 7JH - 0527 73793)

Running a 'Meat-Out' campaign aimed at schools and youth groups and has been getting people to be sponsored to go vegetarian for a day with all funds going to Vegfam. Many schools have taken up the campaign and allowed the group to address their assemblies. The group has also been involved in the L'Oreal campaign and as a result many hairdressers have stopped stocking L'Oreal products. Complaints to the local council about fly-posting by Jay Millers circus bore fruit and the circus were forced to either remove the posters or pay the council to have it done. The group is trying to get suede and leather sales on Sundays stopped under the Sunday trading laws.

STEVENAGE ANIMAL RIGHTS

(Box 6, Bowes Lyon House, St George's Way, Stevenage, Herts SG1 1XY)

Supporting the BUAV's charities campaign and had two street collections for them. On 31st October last year the group held a demo and leafleting session outside the conference centre where Glaxo were holding their AGM. Another demo was held outside Glaxo on 31st December. The Centre is set to open in one year's time. A demo is being held there every first Sunday of the month and a petition is being gathered. The group has expanded by amalgamating with Broxbourne Animal Rights. This move is aimed at strengthening the group's power in pulling more active members and funds into one central pool. The group's constitution remains unchanged and the pace of the campaign against Glaxo is to be stepped up. A national demo and march is to be held outside Glaxo on June 2nd - please write to the group for further details.

SUFFOLK ANIMAL DEFENCE

A new group, formed in August last year. Members have attended demonstrations at Huntingdon Research centre and Interfauna lab animal suppliers and went to the Perrycroft demo in September last year. Stalls are held in Bury St Edmunds and Newmarket on a regular basis. The group has also been supplying schools with information on all forms of animal abuse. Projects for this summer include a campaign against Greece and Spain, aimed at alerting tourists to the cruelty of bull-fighting, fiestas etc. etc.

SURREY ANIMAL CONCERN

This new group held a sponsored fast which raised over £300 which will be used to produce posters and leaflets

SWINDON ANIMAL WELFARE ALLIANCE

(PO Box 134, Swindon, Wilts SN2 3AF)

Formerly Swindon Animal Rights Group. In October last year the group complained to the local council about illegal advertising by Chipperfield Brothers Circus. Although the council admitted that the flyposting was illegal they refused to prosecute so the group has threatened to do their own flyposting next to any circus posters which appear in the future and they have pledged to take out a private prosecution against the circus if the council still refuses to act.

WEYMOUTH ANIMAL WELFARE

Appealed for incubators to warm hundreds of hedgehogs who, because they were born late last summer, cannot survive hibernation due to lack of weight.

WINCHESTER ANIMAL CONCERN

Held a protest outside the local hunt ball and also a well attended demo against Froxfield Farms which breed animals for vivisection labs.

WOLVES HUNT SABS

(Box H, c/o Students Union, Wolverhampton Poly, Wolverhampton)

Held a benefit gig with the groups 'Contempt' and 'Anorexia' playing and raised over £170.

THE ALF STRIKES

Western Daily Press

AVON

In late November the Bristol University Laboratory in Langford, near Weston, was raided and ten beagles were rescued. A spokesperson for the activists, talking to the press, said that all the dogs showed signs of mistreatment and one in particular had numerous scars which had not healed, where it had been used for experiments. The laboratory was raided 3 years ago when three cats were rescued.

BUCKINGHAMSHIRE

At the end of January three butchers had their shop windows smashed in Newport Pagnell, causing £8,000 worth of damage - they were Dewhursts, Co-op and Douglas butcher shops.

CHESHIRE

An ALF raid on Wises Farm, Parkfield, Normansheath, resulted in twenty chickens being liberated and two vans in the farm yard having their tyres slashed and windscreens smashed. Slogans were painted on the vans. A caller to the local press stated that the liberated hens had been taken to good, safe homes. The local spokesman of the National Farmers Union said that if these raids continued then 'Farm Watch' schemes would possibly have to be introduced. On 25th January the headquarters of the British Association for Shooting and Conservation (a nonsensical name if ever there was one) was the target of an incendiary attack. Three incendiary devices were placed in three separate buildings at the offices at Marford Hill, Rossett. Thousands of pounds of damage was caused by the fire and a wooden storage shed and a caravan were also damaged. Fire engines took over an hour to control the fire. A spokesperson for the activists, talking to a local paper, said "The BASC is a public relations exercise for the blood junkies who are addicted to hunting. Members of the association wander around the country shooting animals and indulging in blood lust. The headquarters is a justifiable target. We are a little disappointed that more damage had not been done - we will have to go back within the next 5 years and finish the job".

CUMBRIA

Between Christmas and the New Year three butchers had their shop windows smashed. One, called Hird's, lost two windows and it was the second time that this shop had been targeted.

DEVON

The head office of Shooting News and monthly Sporting Dog, based at Tavistock Industrial Estate, was badly damaged in an arson attack causing over £50,000 worth of damage. This action was carried out on the morning of 16th January. Two fire crews had to be called to the scene of the fire which melted computers and destroyed the building's asbestos roof.

EAST SUSSEX

In the early hours of October 3rd, ALF activists liberated fifty hens from appalling conditions, some of the worst that the experienced activists had ever seen. The raid took place at a battery unit in Polegate. The hens are now in safe hands. The exterior of the unit was daubed with "ALF", "Chicken Liberation" and "Poultry Belsen". Four vans belonging to the farm were also attacked with paint stripper and etching fluid and sprayed with "ALF" and that good old favourite, "SCUM", in a tasteless luminous orange coloured paint. A hoax bomb call to McDonalds in Terminus Road, Eastbourne, on the 18th October, caused the premises to be evacuated. During November a butcher's van in Hastings was paintstripped and etching fluid was used on its windows. Etching fluid was also poured over two butchers' windows and a door - one of the shops was due to be newly opened the following day. Boots in Hastings also received the same treatment. Threats were sent to developers SNW Homes and their plant hire contractors because of their plans to evict/ bulldoze a badger sett in order to build houses on a site in Hastings. In early December as part of a campaign covering the entire South East, shops which sold L'Oreal products were warned through newspapers that some of this company's products had been contaminated with oil or paint stripper. Examples were sent to the newspapers in question and towns mentioned were Brighton and Eastbourne, as well as London, Croydon, Dover and Folkestone. Pheasant pens near Bodle Street were destroyed. In St. Leonards-on-Sea in mid January three butchers' shops and a fishmonger's shop were decorated with "ALF" etchings and at Bexhill-on-Sea two vans belonging to 'Gunns' butchers were paint stripped, glass etched, had their windscreen wipers snapped off and their tyres slashed. A press release said that "ALF activists caused untold damage. The campaign of economic sabotage aims to fight back of behalf of the animals!" During the early hours of Friday 11th January ALF activists broke into the offices at Egypt Farm, Cowbeech. This company supplies chickens and pigs to 'Ross Foods (sic) UK Ltd'. Essential breeding records, accounts and wage books were taken from filing cabinets relating to the Farm's broiler units and dry sow stalls. Newly delivered pieces of hardware and drugs were also taken and later destroyed along with the accounts and wage books, all of which the activists had great pleasure in burning. Extensive damage was caused by a covering of symbolic red paint over everything inside both offices. "The ALF is watching and there's no place to hide" was daubed on the outside of the units, along with other ALF slogans. The press release finished with "Such attacks against this barbaric form of meat production is on the increase and will not end until these concentration camps of pain and misery on our fellow creatures have finally ceased. This was an act of love - not violence". On the morning of January 14th Mr Errey, Master and Huntsman for the Kent and Sussex Mink Hounds, woke to find both his hound van and car with ALF slogans, written in paint stripper, on them. All windows had been etched and the tyres were slashed. Over recent years Errey has been treated to several visits from the ALF, usually bearing gifts such as incendiary devices. In the early hours of Saturday 18th January activists broke into battery units belonging to a farm on the A21, only 2½ miles from Hastings. In the raid thirty-eight chickens were liberated from appalling conditions - the activists found cages 3ft by 1.5ft and four hens crammed into each. All the rescued hens are now in loving homes where they are able to spread their wings, walk and experience all their natural instincts which they had been so cruelly denied just for eggs and profit. In late January the windows of Dewhursts and Hays, the bacon shop in Hastings, had their windows etched with "ALF".

HAMPSHIRE

In November a statue of a greyhound, which commemorated the dog 'Master McGrath', which won the Waterloo Cup three times, was stolen from Pennington House near Lymington. It was worth between £5,000 and £10,000. The chairman of the Northern Ireland region of the BFSS was planning to move the statue to Ireland, because of which the Belfast ALF had already threatened to destroy it. On 16th December a pony and four guinea fowls were rescued from the New Forest after being found kept in appallingly cramped conditions - no water and severely malnourished. The pony was unable to bend her legs due to continual confinement in the tiny shed where they were found. The five animals are all now safe and well.

HERTFORDSHIRE

F Free Prisoners of Cell Block H! In the early hours of Tuesday 30th October Ware College was raided and a variety of animals were rescued from the animals unit in Block H. All the animals were destined for dissection and included four guinea pigs, six gerbils, two British toads, two salamanders, four tarantula spiders, one Xenopus frog, a cage of locusts and a cage of stick insects. They are all now in good homes. Many of the animals were in poor condition, the guinea pigs had claws so overgrown they could barely walk. Slogans were painted on the premises and the activists promised further action if the college continues its practice of dissection.

KENT

In early December L'Oreal products which had been contaminated with either oil or paint stripper were sent to a number of papers in Kent. The press release that accompanied them claimed that L'Oreal products in Dover and Folkestone, as well as London, Croydon, Brighton and Eastbourne, had been tampered with in this way. This resulted in shops all over the South East checking their stock. In Whitstable on December 7th the newly decorated Cancer Research collection mine was decorated again, this time with paint stripper. On 20th and 25th December, also in Whitstable, butchers' shop windows were treated with etching fluid. On 30th December the Cancer Research charity shop had its windows, including a large bow window, etched, and on the 6th January a butcher's shop window was smashed. At the beginning of January, after a warning was made to Herne Bay Library that turkeys in the local CRS shop had been poisoned, the entire stock of frozen birds were removed from the shelves of both stores. Butchers' shops in and around Maidstone have had windows smashed frequently over recent months.

LANCASHIRE

On January 10th activists broke into the laboratory at Lancashire Polytechnic in Preston and liberated a hundred and six mice, forty-three doves, eleven rats, two rabbits and a guinea pig. Documents were also taken in the raid. The liberators entered through a skylight in the roof and then had to saw through bars in the ceiling. Five sacks of documents were taken from a filing cabinet. A spokesperson for the group told the press that the letters and addresses obtained from the documents would be "utilised to the full". The documents taken have given us a list of targets to keep ALF activists in the North West busy for a long time. ALF are taking the problems animal abusers increasingly face to their doorsteps". The university claimed that an animal was killed by being trodden on in the raid. But as the saying goes, those who do not hesitate to vivisect do not hesitate to lie about it. In fact the animal was found already dead when the activists entered the building. One of the rescued mice turned out to be pregnant.

LEICESTERSHIRE

Our hearts go out to the poor butcher who has been having his windows smashed about four times a week in Nuneaton. And to add insult to injury his VW Golf was set on fire. Those with good memories will recall that VW Golfs appear to be a favourite with animal abusers, and animal activists. Most other butchers and fishing shops in Nuneaton have also come under attack, not wishing them to feel left out. On 15th November twenty premises had their windows smashed and red paint thrown in onto equipment. On Saturday 8th December a group of activists ran through the Pathology and Pharmacology departments at Coventry Polytechnic and removed experiment reports that students had done in an exam.

LONDON

On September 15th McDonalds in Upper Norwood had its windows etched. This branch has now had to replace its windows four times because of attacks and they have gone to the expense of fitting a surveillance camera above the entrance. A week later a butcher's shop in the same area had its windows etched. In two separate raids in mid October two goats were rescued from fields in Burnt Oak from which they were destined to go to slaughter. Both goats are now in safe hands. One of the goats was held on ground owned by St. Alphage Church. After the raid four members of the local press who reported the action were arrested and questioned by the police. After being on police bail for a while charges have been set. The Editor of the Edgware and Mill Hill Times and the Edgware District Editor have both been charged with conspiracy to theft. The reporter and the chief photographer have both been charged with conspiracy to theft and also theft and criminal damage. In early December shops in London and Croydon were warned through the press that L'Oreal products had been contaminated with oil or paint stripper, as part of a campaign covering the South East.

GREATER MANCHESTER

On Friday 12th October the ALF raided the offices of Bolton Poultry Products in Moncrieffe Street, Bolton. Sacks of documents were removed, including staff details and poultry slaughter information. Before leaving, incendiary devices were primed and laid. The devices ignited and wrecked the office. The group promised that the company would be a regular target all the while they continue their vile trade. They also threatened that information gathered in the raid about other businesses connected to the chicken industry will be given full attention. One of the documents taken in the raid was an invoice from a security company for a mobile security patrol service to visit Bolton Poultry Products three times a night. A fat lot of good that did them. Also in October, in Bury and Bolton, nine butchers' windows were catapulted. On November 12th twelve tyres of vehicles owned by Holcombe Hunt member John Pilkington were stabbed and on the same day in Bolton twelve windows of four Boots shops were smashed and in Heywood the locks of Boots were superglued. In the same month the branch of Boots in Crumpsall had its shutters painted with the natty slogan "Boots Butchers Beagles", and two butchers had their windows and doors smashed. All the windows and doors of the Boots in Shaw, Oldham and Heywood were etched and three butchers in Bolton had their windows smashed. A neglected rabbit in Rochdale was rescued, hutch and all, from a garden. In December at Littleborough, Rochdale, three lurchers were taken from a badger baiter and hare courser. They are now in good homes. In the same month three large windows of two butchers were smashed in Chorlton, and in Radcliffe in Bury the windows and doors of the Boots branch there were etched, and nineteen other shop windows were broken. In January a 54 seater coach belonging to the Rocket Angling Club went up like a rocket when it had petrol poured over it and was set alight. The coach was totally wrecked. The club secretary said "It's a big blow to the club. We used the coach regularly for social outings and we'd done quite a lot of work inside, installing tables".

MERSEYSIDE

Someone was evidently given some superglue for Christmas. On Christmas Eve Bootle butcher A. Watson had his shop locks superglued, the psychology department at Liverpool University had its locks superglued, a halal butcher's shop in Myrtle Parade had its padlock superglued, Farmer Arthurs egg merchants were superglued and a meat delivery van in Anfield had its locks superglued, as well as all its tyres punctured. These actions were the lead item in the local news. Later in December nine windows in Liverpool were smashed, three of which were Boots.

NORTHAMPTONSHIRE

In mid October fifteen butchers' shop windows were smashed in one night in Northampton and two days later another six shops were attacked, including two Dewhursts, Trotters Butchers and Graham Butchers. This latter shop was damaged in the raid a couple of days before and the window had not yet been repaired so the activists smashed the reinforced front door. This shop has been damaged about seven times over the past five years. In November, again in Northampton, all the windows and doors of two Boots branches and a butcher's were etched. The locks of a fish and poultry shop and the butchers' training centre had locks glued. Numerous butchers' windows were smashed and slogans painted. A Cancer Research advert was destroyed. A hen in a cage in a garden centre was rescued and a greyhound was taken from some coursers who were caught in the act. Later in November fifteen shop windows in Northampton were smashed and, deciding that they'd hitherto been too subtle, activists went to two branches of Boots with a sledgehammer. Over Christmas seven butchers, two McDonalds and one Burger Bar were given the same treatment. During January activists smashed one hundred and twenty shop windows in Northampton, including World of Leather, Boots and numerous butchers, not to mention poor old Graham the Butcher again. Also in January activists painted "Hounds Off Our Wildlife" and "ALF" in 3 ft high words on the walls of Earl Spencer's Althorp Estate. The Pytchley Hunt holds its annual meet at the stately home. Workers on the estate took an entire day cleaning the paint off the wall, which runs alongside the A428 main road between Rugby and Northampton.

NORTH YORKSHIRE

The ALF group have been running a campaign against Whiteheads furriers of Montpelier and the shop has been making a real 'killing' with its farcical 'Fur Clearance Sale' since they announced the closure of its fur department in March last year. The shop is still selling furs and the windows are boarded up at nights. Undeterred the group continued to take actions. On 17th November one of the shop's directors was foolish enough to leave his car at the rear of the shop and activists took full advantage of this by drenching it in yellow paint and slashing all the tyres. On 1st December the same director left his car parked outside his house and again all the tyres were slashed. On the 7th an attempt to penetrate the boards of the shop's windows with a crossbow bolt failed so the windows were smashed by driving a pick-axe through the boarding. On the 20th the most daring attack took place at 5 o'clock in the afternoon. It was dark but the shop was still open and there were people about shopping. A lone activist put a hammer through a window and then hot-footed it away leaving passers-by speechless. Ironically one of the directors names is Hammer, giving local papers plenty of scope for corny headlines. The group has pledged to keep up its attacks till the shop is a fur free zone. On New Years Eve four butchers plate glass windows in Harrogate were smashed, causing between £1,600 and £2,400 worth of damage. Two vans belonging to a sea food shop had their tyresslashed, a butcher's vehicle had the same treatment causing £130 worth of damage and another butcher's vehicle tyres were slashed, this time causing £240 worth of damage.

OXFORDSHIRE

On Christmas Eve six ALF activists raided Oxford University's cat breeding unit at Nuneham Courtenay, Oxford. Access was gained to the building by removing a section of the corrugated asbestos roof and then into individual rooms via holes made in the attic floor. All alarms were bypassed and every cat in the building was rescued. Sixty-four cats, including four mothers with kittens and eighteen pregnant females, are now safe. The press statement issued by the activists reads "Most had deep tattoos in both ears and were terrified of human contact, but with a little care and a vet's help both problems are being solved. We have to thank everyone who helps the ALF financially and practically, without who Oxford University would have well over 100 cats to see the new year in with. Eat shit Blakemore". One of the activists even dressed up in a full Father Christmas costume with one small difference - a balaclava. A spokesperson talking to a reporter after the raid said "If they restock the place we'll just demonstrate our total disregard for the whole building - we'll destroy it next time. We'll break the law as often as we need to do". The entire raid took over four hours. On the 1st February activists raided Oxford University's Park Farm in Northmoor for the umpteenth time and rescued two hundred and fourteen guinea pigs, fifteen rabbits and five cats from a certain fate at the hands of vivisectionists. They also took documents. Walls and doors of the buildings had to be drilled through before the animals could be rescued. Thousands of pounds of structural damage was done to the buildings in the raid. A spokesperson told the press that "We caused extensive damage to the building. If we can save one animal from death, pain or suffering it is worthwhile. The animals will receive treatment from vets and homes will be found for them". A University spokesman confirmed that the animals were destined to end up in experiments in the University's laboratories and hospitals.

WEST SUSSEX

In early December shops in Crawley and Horsham were warned that L'Oreal and Chanel products may be contaminated. The claims came after samples of products were taken from the Boots branch in Horsham. Boots was mentioned as a main target because of its large range of medicines and cosmetics and because they perform vivisection experiments.

WEST YORKSHIRE

In the middle of January Sky Commercial Rabbit Farm, at Meltham near Huddersfield, received a visit from an ALF team which resulted in eighty rabbits, the entire contents of one shed, being rescued. Afterwards the group set fire to the shed, burning it totally to the ground, thereby ensuring that it will never again be used to exploit animals. A spokesperson said "All of the animals are now in safe, caring homes". Thirty-five windows were smashed at a meat wholesalers and a butcher's window was smashed in Huddersfield in September last year. During October a Leathershop window, two gun shop windows and two butchers windows were smashed in Huddersfield. On anti-McDonalds Day a chemical that smells strongly of vomit was sprayed inside six McDonalds in West Yorkshire and two butchers suffered the same nauseating fate through windows which hadn't yet been replaced - talk about kicking them while they're down. In November an articulated lorry and three vans belonging to animal abusers in Huddersfield had all their tyres slashed, windows etched, aerials and windscreen wipers wrecked and bodywork paint stripped. Boots in Brighouse had its window smashed and nine butchers in Huddersfield had the same treatment with the damage for two windows being put at £820. Later in the month three windows of the butchers who had previously had their windows smashed were broken again, along with five others. Two cars with BFSS and BASC stickers had their tyres burst and the tyres were also done on a meat van. On 27th November Boots in Brighouse had a return visit with five windows being etched with "Scum" and two other windows were etched and locks were glued up. On 12th December a British Bacon Co. van in Huddersfield had all its tyres slashed and windscreen wipers broken. Again in Huddersfield on 22nd the McDonalds had its windows smashed and the same treatment was given to a frozen meat shop.

SCOTLAND

On 18th September an army bomb disposal team carried out a controlled explosion on a suspicious looking package in a McDonalds in Princes Street in Edinburgh, after a warning phone call.

ITALY

In October last year in Thiene a leather shop had its locks and shutters glued up.

POLAND

At the end of November in Luban Slaski ALF activists set fire to the buildings of the local slaughterhouse and the main gate. One building was totally destroyed and all work was stopped till the beginning of the new year. "Cancelled" stickers were stuck on posters advertising circuses with animals in Jelenia Gora, and other circus posters were torn down. Very few tickets were sold and some people returned their tickets. In Kielce ALF activists padlocked the doors of a hunting shop locking in twenty hunters who were shopping inside. On another occasion the shop was painted with slogans. Fifty mice were rescued on 10th October during a raid on the University in Poznan. An ALF group in Gryfow Slaski daubed slogans on meat shops and caused damage to angling boats and hunting look-out points.

SWEDEN

On November 17th the Swedish ALF (Djurens Befrielsefront, Box 2051, S-265 02 Astorp 2, Sweden) carried out their 35th action and sawed down five hunting platforms in the area of Ljungby. Their 36th action took place on November 21st when four young dogs were rescued from a notorious animal abuser, Mr. Erik Bengtsson in Skanes Fagerhult. This was the 6th time Bengtsson had been targeted and almost 90 dogs have now been rescued from this man.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

On New Years Day ALF activists raided Cook County Hospital's Hektoen Laboratory in Chicago and liberated rabbits, guinea pigs and rats. The lab conducts burn and gastro-intestinal experiments. A supermarket chain removed all turkeys from its store in Tucson, Arizona, and offered refunds, after a call from a man who claimed to have injected the turkeys with cyanide during the run up to Thanksgiving. None of the turkeys removed had actually been injected.

WALES

On New Years Eve the Cardiff ALF smashed the windows of four butchers, five Boots stores and seven burger bars - twenty-four panes of glass smashed in all. The shops included Wimpy, McDonalds and The Great British Burger and damage just to these three alone came in the region of £16,000.

NORTHERN IRELAND

On October 27th a "device" (and that's as detailed as it gets) was left in Mandy's hamburger bar in Cork. It was destroyed in a controlled explosion. A warning had been given about the device and there were claims that there were other devices in McDonalds and Burger King, which turned out to be hoaxes. Over October and November butchers' shops in Belfast were super glued and slogans were spray painted. A Kentucky Fried Chicken shop had four large plate glass windows smashed and damage was also caused to a meat van. In Hollywood, Co. Down, two windows of Boots were smashed and at Portrush, Co. Antrim, a large rock was used to smash a gun shop window. In December in Belfast Jaffa Furs was sprayed with "ALF" and anti-fur slogans. Fur Seasons, also in Belfast, was the target for a smoke bomb device on Christmas Eve and the President of Ballymena Hare Coursing Club had his home attacked with slogans painted on the front of the house and red paint poured over the front door. On the 7th January in Belfast slogans were painted on the walls of a sheepskin store and its window was smashed. A window of the Leather Centre was smashed causing £1,000 worth of damage. Jaffa Furs was targeted again when a marble wall belonging to the premises was pulled down. Red paint was poured over a gun shop in Co. Down.

The ALF carries out direct action against animal abuse, rescuing animals and causing financial loss, usually through the damage and destruction of property, to animal abusers. ALF actions are illegal and therefore activists work anonymously, either individually or in groups, and do not have any centralised organization or address.

OTHER GROUPS

On Saturday 6th October last year Animal Rights Militia activists slashed tyres and disabled fuel lines on a convoy of trucks at Royce Dupont Poultry, a meat packer in Toronto, Canada. The Band of Mercy claimed to have rescued over one hundred and seventy broiler chickens from seven different poultry farms in the south of England over the weekend of 1st and 2nd December. In South Africa the Southern Animal Defence League sent bomb threats to Wits Medical School, H.A. Grove Animal Centre and the Roodeplaat Research Laboratory.

HUNT SABOTEURS

David

Most of Arkangel's readers will know about the death of Mike Hill, a hunt saboteur from Merseyside. The HSA nationwide was deeply shocked by the tragedy and our thoughts are with Mike's friends and family. The events leading up to Mike's death are covered elsewhere in this issue, along with an obituary, of course.

Hunt Master in Livestock Shock!

No, it's not what you're thinking. Hunt master Guy Lister was convicted last November on five counts under the Protection of Livestock Act. The incident occurred in January 1990, when hounds of the East Essex FH jumped a garden fence and chased a donkey into a barbed wire fence. The animal was so terrified that it had to be tied down for a vet to examine its wounds. In her evidence, the donkey's owner Ann Fitch said that a huntsman ignored her pleas to take hounds away. While it's good to see justice done, the travesty is that hunts do far worse things to foxes (and other animals) and are quite within the law. Just before the court case the East Essex killed two pheasants - no foxes mind you, but it's all blood.

Elsewhere in the country sabs were busy against the usual range of hunts. Newbury sabs, for instance, were dealing with the ever-friendly Vine and Craven. In a moment of rare modesty, sabs described their horn calls as "feeble" - but nevertheless managed to call over the entire pack. What this says about the huntsman's competence is anyone's guess - but what can you expect from a hunt that's named two of its hounds 'Tebbit' and 'Thatcher'?

Equally pathetic are the Meon Valley Beagles, according to the Bognor and Chichester group. After a long day's sabbing at the Hursley Hambledon FH they were heading for home when what should they find but the MVB. A few quick notes on the horn scattered the beagles across several fields, while the ageing supporters tried to gather them up. As light faded sabs did the decent thing and helped collect the hounds.

The same group had one of their sabs arrested at the Chid and Lec in December. Almost as soon as he arrived at the police station he was released, and spent the afternoon waiting to be picked up in a nearby pub - is this supposed to be a deterrent?

Saboteurs demonstrate at the Boxing Day meet of the Chiddingfold

Howl

Oxford sabs attended an Old Berkshire meet just before Christmas, but there was no sign of the hunt. Sabs were just about to leave when the hunt started arriving in dribs and drabs, looking very sorry for themselves. One rider finally apologised to the sabs for being late - they'd all got hammered at the hunt supper the night before. Needless to say, their hunting wasn't up to much!

Of course the big event in December is Boxing Day. In some ways this is ironic, because it's the day on which hunts are least likely to kill: they spend ages at the meet showing off (and getting pissed) and anyway tend not to want the general public to see any blood and guts. Hunting on Boxing Day is usually a pretty unimpressive affair, but it's also a prime opportunity for the HSA to show off too! This season, however, the weather took a hand, and hunts up and down the country stayed out only for a couple of hours before returning, drenched, to their turkey leftovers (and pneumonia, with a bit of luck). The weather doesn't put us off of course, and sabs attended a wide range of meets. No kills were reported. The Linlithgow and Stirlingshire FH didn't even go out, and the terrierfolk had to content themselves with chucking stones at the sabs waiting outside the kennels. A poor substitute for killing foxes no doubt.

The weather improved for the last few days of 1990, and sabs were out in force. The annual post-Christmas bash against the Heythrop FH saw Oxford, High Wycombe, Bath and New Forest sabs dealing well with a usually violent hunt. Several supporters took it upon themselves to try and roll one of the vans over, but luckily accepted a hunting horn instead. This was flattened by a virtually rabid terrierman and then handed back to the sabs.

Further west sabs were having trouble finding the North Ledbury FH, because the hunt seemed to have given up horn calls (can't think why) and have taken to dispersing their support in all directions. They'd be even harder to find if they stayed at home, but they haven't tried that - yet.

A Bath sab models a horn, specially customised for him by followers of the Heythrop FH, to blow flat notes only.

The year ended on a high note in Surrey. On December 31st North Downs sabs attended a children's meet of the Surrey Union. As with Boxing Day, children's meets tend to be fairly bloodless affairs, so it was quite a surprise when sabs had to stop a dig-out. Despite their efforts the hunt terrierman 'Round Rodney' West eventually dug down to the fox. He pulled it out and drew his humane killer. Three sabs piled in, two of them grabbing Rodders and the third grabbing the fox. As West went down the fox was thrown clear: the hunt staff then released the hounds, but - a tribute to how crap their hounds are - the fox got clean away. As if this wasn't enough, sabs stopped a second dig-out later in the day.

New Year's Day, however, was a mixture of good and bad. Oxfordshire Anti-Death Sports Society held their annual demo in Thame against the Vale of Aylesbury FH. Local anti-hunt protesters outnumbered hunt supporters, and a lot of good coverage resulted. Oxford sabs dealt with the actual hunt in their usual professional manner and there were no kills. At the Fitzwilliam FH hunt supporters seemed to have caught Mad Cow Disease, or perhaps Mad Landrover Disease. Displaying the care for life which we've come to expect from the blood-sports fraternity, one irate supporter drove his landrover straight into a Peterborough sab, knocking him down. But why settle for one when you can have a brace? He turned round and did it again, this time flattening a 16 year old girl.

Four days later sabs were back in force, but the hunt didn't emerge from the kennels. ("High Winds". Surprise, surprise.) Never ones to waste a day, the sabs travelled a few miles down the road to a joint meet of the Cambridgeshire and the Oakley. The high point of the excellent day that followed was probably a rider screaming "scum!" at an Anglia TV crew and trying to ride them down. The footage was duly shown on the evening news. Thanks, old chap...

January 2nd was the next meet of the Surrey Union, and not surprisingly there was trouble. Five or six 'boys' - not Union regulars - waded in with sticks, clubs etc. Two sabs had suspected skull fractures, two more had broken noses, and the rest had assorted cuts and bruises. Eleven days later an unknown number of saboteurs arrived at the Union's Forest Green meet. The police estimate was 300 plus, but probably no one will ever know. The hunt was chased back and forth across the Surrey hills (local papers spoke of "military style ambushes" and sabs armed with pickaxe handles, but that bears no relation to the truth) and finally took refuge in a farm surrounded by police. To describe the day's events as a "hunt" would be untruthful, but it was one of the finest day's sabbing this season. In the aftermath, the police advised the Union to drop their fortnightly Saturday meets - thus freeing North Downs sabs for other packs.

January also saw a couple of hunters in court, albeit with differing results. The whipper-in of the Bicester with Whaddon Chase was up for Action Likely To Cause A Breach Of The Peace, namely that he'd hit Oxford sab Alison Dunnett on the head with his riding crop. While the court accepted that he had cropped her (as he admitted) they decided not to bind him over. On a more positive note, the huntsman of the Holderness FH was up for Criminal Damage. He had already been bound over on a previous occasion, so he's obviously becoming well acquainted with court system. He was duly convicted, and given a Conditional Discharge - with that and a bind over, sabs are expecting him to behave next season.

Three days after the Bicester whip walked free, Oxford sabs were back. Since cropping a hunt saboteur appears not to be an offence in that part of the world, it's hardly surprising that another rider decided to crop their van. One sab got out and asked for the rider's name and address: the rider cropped him too.

Not long after that Oxford sabs travelled down to Somerset for one day of a Beagling Festival hosted by the Chilmark Beagles. The visiting pack was the Holme Valley from the Pennines,

I'll give you

and sabs set to work enthusiastically. The beagles responded well and the hunt was soon in complete disarray. It took the huntsman one and a half hours to gather his hounds, by which time it was getting dark. Holme Valley supporters pleaded with the Chilmark to put them up for the night so they could hunt again the next day, but the locals were having none of it. Sabs reckon the Holme Valley can't have got home much before 1 a.m.

The first week of February saw hunts and sabs all over the country grinding to a halt as the snow fell. One hunt that did go out was the Cheshire Beagles, and Merseyside sabs were there too. This was the day that Mike Hill was killed and more details are given elsewhere in this issue. Two days later there was a vigil outside the kennels, attended by Animal Rights activists from all over the country. Tempers flared and some damage was done to the house of the huntsman. (If you read the tabloid press account, you'd think that the Brixton riots were re-enacted, but that's no surprise.) The following Saturday sabs from virtually every sab group in the UK came to Cheshire, with the express purpose of stopping hunting anywhere in the county.

Right: Boxing Day sab. The Cheshire Beagle Hunt try to cross a stream and get rather cross. One fell in up to his waist.

The Cheshire Beagles cancelled. The Cheshire Foxhounds cancelled. The Cheshire Forest Foxhounds cancelled. The North Staffordshire Foxhounds cancelled. The Albrighton Foxhounds cancelled. The Watkin Williams-Wynn's Foxhounds cancelled. These are the ones we know about: there are probably more. No hunts in Cheshire went out, and neighbouring counties saw precious few either.

Since then the Cheshire Beagles have been sabbed every Saturday. It has become a matter of honour that they go out - if that isn't an indication of how sick hunters are, what is? - and several neighbouring hunts have cancelled so that their supporters could "help out" at the Beagles. There has, of course, been a massive police presence, but sabbing has still taken place. However you look at it, Mike Hill's death has sealed the fate of the Cheshire Beagles. We will remember him.

February's snow gave way to a sunny March, and the season started to wind down. Oxford sabs made a complete mess of the Bicester (yet again) and were duly rewarded when one of the terriermen rammed their van. The van skidded through 360 degrees and ended up in a ditch. The sabs hurriedly got it roadworthy - amazingly, none of them were seriously hurt - and went off to their afternoon meet with the Christchurch and Farley Hill Beagles. One of the whips greeted them cheerily: "We haven't seen you chaps for a while." While one of the sabs apologised for this oversight, another ran off with the pack. They boxed up shortly afterwards.

Looking back over the season it's been one of the most active ever, although with a corresponding rise in violence from hunt supporters. Hunt sabs in Cambridge have been out 51 times, including 22 meets of their local foxhunt, the Cambridgeshire. Hastings and Bexhill sabs have missed only a very few meets of the East Sussex and Romney Marsh FH. Norwich sabs have stopped all their local hunts from advertising. Every Saturday of the East Kent FH has been sabbed, as have almost all the meets of the Old Surrey and Burstow FH. Yorkshire sabs have been very busy with their local packs, with the York and Ainsty (South) on course to win the Most Responsive Pack contest. At the Middleton one sab vehicle had its tyres slashed, but joint master Megginson assured sabs that it hadn't been his people. Sabs suspect aliens.

As March comes to a close, several hunts have finished earlier than usual (it's the weather, of course) which has released large numbers of sabs to concentrate on the ones that are still out. There has been trouble at the West Norfolk FH and the Hursley Hambledon FH, with the usual travesty of several sabs in hospital and several others in police cells - and no hunt supporters in either. It's a tribute to the dedication of hunt saboteurs that that sort of behaviour from police and hunt hasn't shaken their resolve.

HAVE YOU NOTICED?
YOU CAN NEVER FIND A HUNT SABOTEUR
WHEN YOU WANT ONE!

Several hunts are now having their last meets ever, or else have already done so. So thanks and goodnight to the Linlithgow and Stirlingshire Foxhounds, the Derwent Valley Beagles, and Mr. Goschen's Foxhounds. In addition, the Four Shires Bassets are "probably disbanding" and the Dart Vale and Holden Harriers are amalgamating with the South Pool Harriers. Roll up, roll up, who's next?

As Arkangel goes to press, hunt saboteurs will be attending a "long weekend" of action against Cumbrian foxhunts - and as you read this we'll be out against the first mink hunts of the summer. As ever, we'll need your support.

The HSA exists to take non-violent direct action against all bloodsports ranging from illegal ones such as dog-fighting to supposedly prestigious ones like foxhunting and staghunting. The HSA's strength lies in its network of local groups - over 1,000 saboteurs are active every Saturday, and often mid-week as well. Both local groups and the national HSA are always in need of support, financial, moral, active or whatever.

CANADA

Following pressure from A/R campaigners Toronto and Vancouver have banned rodeos. A change in the antiquated local animal protection law enabled the Canadian SPCA and local animal protectionists to rescue 200 dogs from a breeding farm near Quebec (Recht fur Tiere Nov/Dec 90). The 50 worst industrial polluters along the St. Lawrence River have cut discharges into the water by 30% over the past year. Staff of Parks Canada, a branch of Environment Canada, have joined native groups from Northern Alberta and Northwest Territories in rebellion against Environment Canada's plan to massacre all 3,500 bison in the Wood Buffalo National Park (Animals Agenda Jan/Feb 91). Canada's newly released national Green Plan calls for the spending of £1,500 million to protect the environment over the next 5 years and includes setting aside 12% of Canadian territory to protect wildlife and eco-systems, reducing pollution and spending £50 million to clean up the Arctic. The Ontario Trappers Assoc. whose auction co. dealt with 75% of raw fur sold in Ontario went bankrupt on Jan 5th after sales had fallen from £15 million in 1989 to £4 million in 1990 (Animals Agenda March 91). A proposal to expand Vancouver Zoo has been thrown out by a local referendum. Saanieh in British Columbia has banned animal circuses (Animal Free Press 12/3/91).

CHINA

The Chinese alligator population, down to 500 in 1980, has climbed to 2,000 since a 900,000 hectare preserve was set aside for them in 1982 (Animals Agenda Jan/Feb 91). China has announced a crackdown on wildlife smuggling (Animals Agenda March 91). A Chinese farmer was sentenced to death, suspended for 2 years, for killing a panda in Shaanxi province.

COLOMBIA

A National Statute for the Protection of Animals has recently come into force which prohibits much cruelty to wild and domestic animals, seeks to improve standards of animal transportation, abolish animal experiments "where alternatives exist", protects endangered species and imposes penalties of up to 5 years in prison (Giornale della Natura Dec 90)

The governor of the region of Aswan has strictly prohibited the hunting of the Nile cocodile, with possession, transportation and selling of the crocodiles and their skins also prohibited (Famiglia Cristiana Oct 90)

FRANCE

Plans for the construction of a dam on the River Loire are to be abandoned. The proposed dam (at Serre-de-la-Fare) was opposed by environmentalists who are continuing to fight other plans for developments along the river (Le Monde 13/2/91). It is becoming more fashionable to be environmentally conscious in France, where Green candidates took part in the last local and European elections. Many furshops have closed in Paris following Brigitte Bardot's TV programmes against animal exploitation and a lot of French models won't promote fur. More and more French newspapers have environment experts and "Green Studies" in schools is increasing. An agency for the environment and energy saving has been formed by the Govt. with a budget of about £250 million raised from air pollution and refuse taxes and early next year the French parliament is to discuss a national plan for the environment. Plans to interfere with about 70 rivers to provide water for atomic power stations and agriculture have been put on ice because of the resistance of environmentalists (Die Welte 20/2/91). After worldwide protest France recalled an Antibes Marineland crew sent to Morocco to capture 7 highly endangered Mediterranean monk seals (Animals Agenda March 91).

GERMANY

Medical students have been allowed to avoid animal experiments at Berlin University. The world's first animal rights press agency, the APPA, has been set up in Oberrod by the Animal Peace organisation (Recht fur Tiere Nov/Dec 90). After representation by animal protectionists Luft-hansa, formerly the largest carrier of pet birds to the USA, announced it would no longer accept shipments of wild caught birds (Animal Welfare Institute Quarterly Winter 90/91). The German parliament has accepted a proposal by the Green Party forbidding the production and use of the hormone BST, which increases milk production but damages the health of the cow. An apparatus developed at the University of Bochum which can be used to produce a kilogram of anti-bodies and so saves 10,000 mice from being used for this purpose, is now being used by more than a thousand labs throughout the country. Agriculture Minister Karl-Heinz Funke has supported the states of Nordrhein-Westfalen and Niedersachsen in their opposition to battery cages for hens and has accused the central German Govt. of putting economic interests in front of animal protection. He has also forbidden the use of live ducks (whose wings are clipped) in the training of hunting dogs, so saving the lives of an estimated 100,000 ducks in the state of Niedersachsen alone (Gaia Winter 90/91). A report from the Orthopaedic University Clinic at the Essen-Werde Evangelical Hospital shows how techniques for the development of microsurgical skills can be practised on isolated tissues and inanimate objects instead of live animals (The AV Jan 91). Germans, especially young people, are eating less and less meat and it is estimated that there will be a 3% reduction in meat production in Germany in 1991. It is also forecast that pork production will fall by a further 20% and beef production by 5 or 6% (Die Welte 24/1/91). From 1992 herbicides and pesticides which have a tendency to drift away from the area where they are being sprayed will no longer be permitted by the German authorities (Die Welte 29/1/91). There has been a heavy turnover loss for the German fur industry with many furshops closing, including 3 large ones in the centre of Munich after years of protest by AIR campaigners (Recht fur Tiere Feb 91). Following a programme about animal experimentation on German TV, 30,000 viewers phoned in, of which 75% favoured total abolition of vivisection and a further 20% partial abolition (Animal Peace). According to a new police decree in the state of Baden-Wurtemberg a sort of weapons licence will be needed for aggressive breeds of dog and the breeding of fierce dogs for private purposes is to be completely forbidden (Die Welte 1/2/91). A computer programme developed at the Heidelberg Institute for Neurobiology is replacing experiments on frogs in the training of German biology and medical students and has also been taken up in colleges and universities in Austria and Switzerland (Die Welt 12/2/91). The German Ministry of Research has provided about £14 million to cover the years 1990-93 for research into finding alternatives to animal experiments (Die Welte 7/3/91). 3 nature reserves in the Rhone, Spreewald and Sudost-Rugen regions of Germany as well as the Berchtersgarden national park are to become internationally recognised and protected as Unesco biosphere reserves and the already existing biosphere reserves of the Middle Elbe and Vessertal in the Thuringwald are to be enlarged. At present there are about 300 Unesco biosphere reserves in 74 countries (Die Welt 19/3/91 & 28/3/91)

One zoo after another is closing and several towns have banned animal circuses. There is also more support for animal protection from the Catholic Church (Recht fur Tiere Feb 91)

JAPAN

Bowing to global outrage over the killing of 582 dolphins in Miiraka harbour on Dec 23rd, the Nagasaki prefectural govt. refused to pay the killers a bounty of £19 a head that they had received previously for killing dolphins. Japanese retail beef sales have slowed markedly and of 394,000 tons imported in 1990, 100,000 remained unsold at the year's end and despite a 20% price cut over the previous 6 months (Animals Agenda March 91)

MEXICO

Following an international campaign to end the annual slaughter of thousands of Olive Ridley turtles, the Mexican govt. crackdown on the trade is having results, with an increase in the number of egg-laying females and the closure of a turtle slaughterhouse (Animals International Spring 91). The Mexican president has closed a refinery at Azcapozalco (north west of Mexico City) which was seriously polluting the atmosphere (Le Monde 22/3/91).

NAMIBIA

Namibian law now threatens ivory and rhino horn poachers with fines of £40,000 plus 20 years in prison (Animals Agenda March 91)

A Vegetarian Society has been set up in Nigeria and has plans to open a vegetarian restaurant and health food store, to promote cruelty-free products and lifestyle and to encourage humane education in schools (Nigeria Vegetarian Society and Animal Welfare Foundation, PO Box 3893, Oshodi, Lagos, Nigeria)

NORWAY

At April's annual sale of mink and fox furs Oslo was catastrophic with demand almost coming to a standstill and this was expected to have a very hard effect on Norwegian fur farmers in the 1990-1991 year (Recht fur Tiere Nov/Dec 90). Norway has continued killing whales for "research" but has cut the number of minke whales to be taken from 68 to 5 to avoid US trade sanctions (Animals Agenda March 91)

POLAND

Goshawks have increased in number in Poland recently as a result of protection by law since 1979 (Animals Agenda Jan/Feb 91). There are now 7 organisations campaigning for animal rights in Poland (Recht fur Tiere Feb 91)

SAUDI ARABIA

At the urging of WSPA the commanders of Operation Desert Shield ordered troops training in the desert to avoid repetition of an incident in which 4 camels were killed by shell fire after wandering into a target range (Animals Agenda March 91)

SPAIN

A new animal protection law has come into force in the Madrid area which forbids the abandoning of dogs and the killing and injuring of animals at fiestas (Recht fur Tiere Nov/Dec 90). After the discovery of a network for the artificial fattening of livestock (using prohibited hormones etc.) the consumption of meat in Spain fell by 30%, with an almost 50% fall in the region of Catalonia (El Pais 20/12/90). Shepherds who once blasted bearded vultures out of the sky until there were only 35 pairs left in the country are now being paid off by WWF to protect them. The policy has worked so well that last year Spain's bearded vultures raised 21 chicks, a record for the last 10 years. "Project Bear" (funded by provincial agriculture depts and the Fund for the Protection of Wildlife) which compensates farmers for financial losses from bears' predation has so far proved very successful in preventing bears from being killed. Over the last decade at least 9 Spanish "national parks" have been created, where any interference with animals is strictly forbidden and 16 "natural parks", in which certain activities like grazing and forestry are permitted. Poaching and similar offences are now much more severely punished and heavy fines face anyone killing endangered species (Animals Agenda March 91). The European Development Fund has earmarked over £150 million for environmental protection in Spain, to be used to combat erosion and destruction caused by forest fires and to clean up industrial effluent (Die Welt 26/3/91)

SOUTH AFRICA

Has not signed the CITES ban on ivory but honoured it throughout 1990 and said on Jan 2nd that it would continue honouring it throughout 1991 (Animals Agenda March 91)

UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS

WSPA has estimated that the worldwide collapse of the fur trade has been reflected in a reduction of the fur industry by 60% in the Soviet Union, meaning that 25 million fur animals a year are avoiding death and torture in the USSR where the policies of Glasnost and Perestroika have led to the formation of numerous animal protection societies (Recht fur Tiere Feb 91)

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

Researchers at the National Cancer Institute have exchanged mice for non-animal procedures involving computers, automated equipment and human cancer cells, in order to determine the effectiveness of anti-cancer drugs (Gaia Winter 90/91). The pet overpopulation problem in Bridgeport, Connecticut's largest and most economically depressed city, has improved dramatically since 1986 when the Foundation for Animal Protection and the Bridgeport Animal Shelter set up a project to promote pet care and pay for veterinary treatment and neutering/spaying. In 1989, at the Shelter, 601 fewer dogs were impounded, 764 fewer destroyed and 249 fewer sold as pets than in 1986. On Nov 28th President Bush signed a new law prohibiting "dolphin safe" claims being applied to products harvested by driftnet fishing. The Act also imposes a future ban on all fish caught in driftnets from entering the US (Animal Welfare Institute Quarterly Winter 90/91). Citizens to End Animal Suffering have won an out-of-court settlement with the New England Aquarium to prevent a "surplus" dolphin being given to the navy. Voters in California have overwhelmingly approved a ban (from 1994) on nylon gill nets, which are a major threat to marine mammals. The Seattle-based Nordstrom department store chain announced it would cease fur sales by Feb 1st. The animal care and use committee at Washington State University's Pullman Campus has refused to let researcher Frederick Gilbert test a modified body-gripping trap on up to a dozen otters. The International Animal Exchange of Grand Prairie, Texas, which 20 years ago supplied 80% of animals imported by US zoos has suffered a ½ cut in income in recent years as enforcement of the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species has become tougher. The course for the American Power Boat Assocs world championship was cut by 4 miles to avoid injuring manatees off Key West, Florida. The value of McDonalds' shares fell 25% in 1990 and sales per restaurant have slipped since 1988. Florida has begun a £10 million effort to cleanse heavily polluted Lake Apopka by restoring wetlands, with 5,050 acres being returned to swamp. Los Angeles has agreed to preserve 200 acres of dunes near the city airport which are home to 900 different species of wild animals and flowers. After losing donations due to controversial investments the Connecticut Humane Society announced that within a year it will sell £1.25 million worth of stock in firms that use animals in product testing and research. Lands End Inc. has acknowledged that recent ads in its catalogue featuring rodeo scenes were "thoughtless" and has pledged it won't "make this mistake again". The National Maritime Fisheries Service has put the Sacramento River chinook salmon on its protected species list. A 3,500 square mile National Marine Sanctuary has been approved for Florida Keys, with a management plan to include anti water pollution measures, a ban on large ships near the coral reef and the prohibition of nearby oil and gas drilling. Roebuck have said they will not list live chickens or debeaking services in any of their 1991 catalogues after being asked to cease debeaking and the sale of live chickens by the Association of Veterinarians for Animal Rights. At the request of a 76 member local coalition, San Luis Obispo County, California (where beef ranching is a major industry) declared October "Vegetarian Month" with a proclamation extolling the virtues of a meatless diet. North Haven, in New York State, is to ban boarhunting. Although veal made up 7% of dinner sales, the Pennsylvania-based Maggie Mae's restaurant chain dropped it from its menu from Nov 1st after the company owner became aware of the conditions in which veal calves are raised (Animals Agenda Jan/Feb 91). On Jan 16th the US Navy scrapped plans to use bottle-nosed dolphins to guard missile-carrying subs in Puget Sound. In Dec San Mateo County, California, passed an ordinance prohibiting anyone without a breeding licence owning a non spayed or neutered adult dog or cat. Rock star Tom Scholz gave £1,750 and Citizens to End Animal Suffering and Exploitation gave £1,000 to the Pine Street Inn Shelter and Soup Kitchen in Boston after the management declined £2,225 raised by a fur fashion show. The Salvation Army has disassociated itself from the Safari Club International "Sportsmen Against Hunger" campaign, in which hunters donate their kills to soup kitchens to improve their public image. As fur shops continue to go out of business in all parts of the country, attendance at the American Fur Industry Inc's fund-raising pre-Xmas dinner dance dropped from 500 in 1989 to 235 in 1990 with cash returns falling from £100,000 to £45,000. A judge at Moffat County, Colorado, imposed one of the stiffest sentences yet for livestock abuse when he sentenced a couple to 90 days in jail each for letting over 200 cattle starve to death. The Bureau of Land Management has cancelled the 1991 Barstow-to-Las Vegas off-road motorcycle race to protect the endangered Mojave desert tortoise. 15 Oklahoma oil well operators have agreed to put up netting to prevent birds getting stuck in sump bits, a measure which could save an estimated 500,000 birds a year. Trophy hunter Paul Aspen was jailed for 30 months and fined about £100,000 for illegally importing heads and hides of at least 16 endangered animals between 1978 and 1987. Sued by Los Angeles County for violating the Californian endangered species act, boot-makers Tony Lama co. of El Paso, Texas, agreed to pay penalties and costs totalling over £70,000 and to stop importing python skin boots. In Dec the governor of Ohio vetoed a bill making it illegal to harass hunters, following the ruling as unconstitutional of hunter harassment laws in Connecticut and Wisconsin. Lack of funding seems to have killed a plan to bring horse racing to Lubbock, Texas. Mexican food, offering multiple vegetarian options, is the fastest growing sector of the fast food business while fried chicken and hamburger franchise earnings have levelled off or dropped. Oklahoma City has upped its maximum penalty for cruelty to animals from a fine of £50 to a £250 fine plus 90 days in jail. The San Diego Supercomputer Center has developed a programme simulating the effect of a jet engine sucking in a flock of birds to replace the killing of chickens during engine design tests. A Florida man has become the first shrimper to be jailed for not using a turtle excluder on his nets and was given 30 days on Dec 11th, while a shrimper from Louisiana was fined £1,125, given 3 years probation and ordered to spend 40 days helping the Nat. Marine Fisheries Service teach Vietnamese fishermen about Gulf of Mexico fishing law. Boston's Stone Zoo shut on Nov 12th due to budget cuts. The Bureau of Land Management has ordered the DeLamar Silver Mine of Idaho to keep waterfowl from drinking water polluted with cyanide by mining operations and to post a bond of £5 million to guarantee the site will be cleaned when the mine closes. Tuna company Bumble Bee pledged to spend up to £250,000 to research dolphin-safe fishing methods and to pay all the costs of basing a full-time environmentalist at its parent firm in Thailand for a year to verify that future tuna purchases are dolphin-safe. New York State has purchased 6,412 acres of one of the most critical bald eagle habitats in the eastern USA plus conservation rights to 5,565 acres more as part of a conservation programme which has seen the number of nesting pairs on the site increase from only one in 1976 to 10 at present. Of the "Ten Worst Zoos" Parade magazine named in 1989, three have now greatly improved, one closed last year, 2 are closed for renovation and one has pledged to renovate. The New Fillmore, a San Francisco monthly newspaper with a 17,500 circulation, now refuses meat ads because of the damage an animal-based diet causes to health and the environment. The number of loggerhead turtle nests found at MacArthur State Park, Florida, jumped from 581 in 1989 to 1,062 in 1990. The owner of the former Marineland Aquarium in Rancho Palos Verdes, California, is allowing the Organization for the Respect and Care of Animals of the Sea to use it as a marine mammal rehabilitation centre pending completion of a permanent rehab. centre at Fort MacArthur. Washington DC adopted a carriage horse protection bylaw in Dec 18th. The Stardust Resort and Casino in Las Vegas has closed a performing orangutan show after 32 years following revelations of cruelty by the trainer. The Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, City Council has required rodeos to have an on-site veterinarian and has barred the use of bucking straps, electric prods, sharpened spurs and "other tormenting devices" at such events. And Alameda County, California, has also passed a measure requiring rodeos to have a veterinarian on site. On Jan 9th the Berkeley, California, city council unanimously banned the use of the Draize test and skin irritancy test within city limits. The Coalition for Responsible Ecology has persuaded authorities at River Hills, Wisconsin, not to have local deer shot and to relocate deer found within the town limits instead of killing them. The St. Petersburg, Florida, SPCA forced the Sacred Heart Catholic Church to end a roulette game where live rodents were used instead of balls. The University of California at San Diego has cancelled a series of dog labs for practising surgeons due to protest by the local Animal Advocates group. The National Council of American Indians has joined the Coalition to Ban Live Bird Shoots in Pennsylvania. The Governor of Florida named Dec 17th "Save a Pet Day" to coincide with the "Animal Rights Day" set earlier by the Palm Beach County Commission (Animals Agenda March 91)

SANCTUARIES

THE ANIMAL ACCIDENT RESCUE UNIT

(24 hour no. Nottingham 321555)

Provides an emergency transport service to help animals (including hedgehogs) and birds involved in accidents etc. in the Nottingham area.

ANIMALS IN DISTRESS

This cat rescue sanctuary in Torquay have had new premises built to save the costs of putting up unwanted pets in commercial catteries. The new buildings have facilities for cats to stay indoors or to roam in an open air pen. Ten volunteer helpers go in every day to feed the residents and to clean out the cages.

CEDARWOOD WILDLIFE HOSPITAL

(Blissford Hill, Frogham, Nr. Fordingbridge, Hampshire - 0425 657402)

An animal rehabilitation centre for injured animals and the people running it are on call 24 hours a day. They deal with a large number of birds of all sorts and hedgehogs, which alone cost the centre £1,000 a year. The centre has two resident foxes, Digby and Basil. Visitors are not allowed unless bringing casualties, as there is no time to show people around. As always, donations are urgently needed.

COURT LODGE FARM SANCTUARY

(Court Lodge Farm, Burwash, East Sussex - 0435 882340)

Looks after large farm animals and has, at present, calves, lambs, ponies, donkeys and horses. They have four shire horses which have been saved from being sold for horse meat. Funds are needed and the sanctuary is also in need of people to help with the never ending work.

One of the shire horses at Court Lodge Farm

PHIL CLARKE'S FERAL CATS HOME

(73 Mary St, Kirkby in Ashfield, Notts NG17 7JQ - Mansfield 756592 and Nottingham 585666)

The home has a new address. Builders have recently concreted the yard and erected new runs, all of which cost £1,450. The Cats Protection League helps with the cost of spaying and neutering and with vets bills but the home has to pay for all the other costs itself.

THE KIT WILSON TRUST FOR ANIMAL WELFARE

(Animal Rescue Centre, Stonehurst Lane, Hadlow Down, Uckfield, East Sussex, TN22 4ED - 082 585444)

Had a very successful open day raising over £5,000 and over seventy of their ex-dogs brought their humans along. The Trust managed to increase its animal sponsors by fourteen on that day as well. The 1990 sponsored dog walk raised over £12,000. The Trust is lucky to be one of the 40 sanctuaries country wide who will benefit from an appeal fund started on World Animal Day.

RESCUED ANIMALS IN NEED

Lost its refuge in Knockholt but is hoping to purchase suitable land in the Sevenoaks area in Kent. Till then RAIN will continue to aid animals needing homes as much as possible with direct homing. Anyone who can help as a cat minder please ring Mrs. Peddar 0689 54269, as a dog minder ring Mrs. Thoy 0959 32550 or with fund raising, ring 073275 535.

SILVER LAKE ANIMAL SANCTUARY

(Midlington Rd, Droxford, Hants)

Run by a single hard-working lady who has been involved with animal welfare for 52 years. Permanent residents are two sheep and a black labrador who had a broken back but was saved thanks to public donations to pay the £700 vets bill. The sanctuary has a caravan which is a sick bay for cats.

SKYE ENVIRONMENTAL CENTRE

SKYE ENVIRONMENTAL CENTRE

(Isle of Skye Field Centre, Broadford, Isle of Skye IV49 9AQ - 04712 487)

Has an animal rehabilitation centre for sick and injured wildlife. To date they have treated a number of birds and animals including gulls, snipe, Manx shearwaters, Leach's petrel, Little auk, seals and otters. The site also has a museum and education centre.

SUSSEX HORSE RESCUE TRUST

(Heron Farm, Ashurst, Steyning, West Sussex BN4 3AL - Steyning 812427 and Cowfold 864200)

The open day raised just over £2,000. A great deal of time has been spent draining and filling some dangerous slurry pits, not helped by the fact that all the frogs and toads who'd made a home there had to be relocated.

TY-AGONED ANIMAL SANCTUARY

(Cribyn, Near Lampeter, Dyfed, Wales)

Has about a hundred and fifty animals, mostly dogs, many of which are ex-breeding bitches from puppy farms. Money, as always, is needed to keep the sanctuary running in this difficult area of the country.

PUBLICATIONS

ALL CHANGE

(PO Box 10, Ryde, Isle of Wight - 0983 616980)
Over a number of years Janet Hunt (The Caring Cook) and Animaline Director Geoff Francis have collected vegetarian recipes from a wide range of 'celebrities'. The fruits of their labour, 'Celebrity Vegetarian Cookbook' is to be launched this spring and they fully expect it to become a popular seller. Royalties will go to a long-term vegetarian project to feed malnourished children in the Third World.

THE ANIMALS SHOP

(PO Box 10, Ryde, Isle of Wight - 0983 616980)
New Zealand cartoonist Stan Eales has designed a set of colourful and amusing postcards, some of which we have used to illustrate this issue of Arkangel. The cards are available directly from The Animals Shop for 25p each retail and 12p + VAT wholesale (p&p is 30p for orders up to £1, 90p for orders up to £5, £1.70 for up to £10, £2.40 for over £10 and p&p is free for orders over £30).

Postcard from The Animals Shop

BLACK PAW

A magazine including a multitude of press cuttings relating to Animal Liberation Front actions and also lists press sources and addresses to contact them. The editorial explains that the mag's purpose is to show the level of ALF activity over the past year and how the ALF is growing, contrary to the claims of the media and some animal organizations. No address is published for obtaining the publication.

BUYING GREEN

(PO Box 14, Stockton-on-Tees, TS18 3Y6)
Since the publication of the Green Consumer Guide in 1988 many new environmentally friendly products have hit the market. With the intention of keeping the consumer in touch with the new products a bi-monthly newsletter is available entitled 'Buying Green'. Subscription is £6. If subscribers request, a proportion of the sub will be donated to the BUAV.

THE EXTENDED CIRCLE

(Centaur Press Ltd, Fontwell, Sussex BN18 0TA - 0243 683302)
Updated and greatly expanded. The book stresses the connection between our behaviour towards each other and our treatment of non-human species. It makes a trenchant case for acknowledging the rights of other creatures, irrespective of consequential benefit to ourselves.

GREENLINE

(34 Cowley Rd, Oxford, OX4 1HZ)
The excellent monthly magazine of green politics and lifestyle. The new year issue (GL84) includes interesting articles "Arguing for Animals" by David Lane and "Putting Animals Into Politics" by Barry Maycock, as well as its regular "Animal News" page, articles on green issues, a Green Diary and book reviews. For 10 issues: supporters £12, waged £8 and low waged £6.50.

GREENSCENE MAGAZINE

(The Vegetarian Society, Parkdale, Dunham Rd, Altrincham, Cheshire WA14 4QG - 061 928 0793)
"The only magazine for young vegetarians!". Packed full of features, recipes, cartoons, consumer news, interviews and other items of interest to young people concerned about animals and the environment. 85p an issue but sent free to all Junior members of the Vegetarian Society (open to under 18s for £4 a year).

THE MOVEMENT FOR COMPASSIONATE LIVING

(47 Highlands Rd, Leatherhead, Surrey KT22 8NQ)
A new book is available called 'Happy, Caring, Healthy and Sharing', by Graham Burnett. The book is for young, green vegans and focuses on several aspects of the 'Green Vegan' philosophy, such as self-sufficiency and vegan health, all explained with pictures and words in a clear, easily comprehensible manner. The book is 16 pages long and costs £1, including p&p. The MCL has videos of the Open Door film made by the Vegan Society in 1976. It lasts 30 minutes and is a convincing argument for veganism. The video will be loaned in return of £1 for postage but any donations would be gratefully received. The MCL's magazine 'New Leaves' is available for a subscription of £3.

ROSE-TINTED MENAGERIE

(by William Johnson/Heretic Books - £8.95)
This probing new book exposes the suffering and deprivation behind the glamour and spectacle of circus animal acts and dolphin shows. From his own undercover work and from the testimony of scores of ex-circus and dolphin show staff, the author has built a formidable file of evidence. He hopes his book will change public perceptions of animals held in captivity. Available from Care for the Wild and the Captive Animals' Protection Society.

PERSUADING A COUNCIL TO ADOPT AN ANIMAL RIGHTS CHARTER

by Anne Edwards

The advice given here is based on my experience of working on this with a London Borough a few years ago so it may be out of date and/or vary from the constitutions of county councils and Metropolitan boroughs. I must also point out that the adoption of the charter may be the easiest thing to arrange compared to ensuring that the local authority actually acknowledges its duties and obligations under the charter. This will require long term commitment, constant lobbying and some involvement with local party politics no matter how much this may conflict with your own ideals.

After drafting your charter (we used the Islington one as a model) the first step is to obtain a list of councillors, committees and sub committees from your Town Hall. Then send a copy of the charter to all the councillors (in a London borough this may be over 60 people so be prepared for high expenditure on postage) explaining who you are and that the charter will shortly be presented to the council for adoption as council policy. Ask them to reply to you saying whether or not they will support this. Not only may you find out who will be sympathetic but also who will be anti, as usually only those strongly in favour or strongly against will be bothered to respond. Whatever the response, if only a few write back, don't assume they are all unsupportive. Good councillors are very busy and to them Animal Rights is just another item on their agenda demanding some of their limited time. There is bound to be one, at least, sympathetic and informed councillor who will be prepared to help you. If you don't already have such a contact, and don't get a response from the letters, look back through local papers to see if anyone has spoken out for animals. It is very important, in fact it is essential, to have the advice and co-operation of at least one member who will give you information on committee procedure and the political make-up of the committees and advise which is the most appropriate committee or sub committee to work through.

It is wise to send copies to each branch of all the political parties in the borough via the branch secretaries. This will also be a way of finding a councillor prepared to help you. Addresses can be found from telephone directories, the Town Hall, or even local newspapers may be prepared to tell you. When writing to local branches of all the parties, explain about your intentions and ask for a chance to address one of their meetings to drum up support. It may seem a lot of trees being sacrificed to copy the charter so many times, but everybody with interests and influence must be kept informed and involved. Likewise, send copies to local MPs and local RSPCA and other Animal Rights/welfare groups there may be in the area.

The supportive members should be able to suggest other people to contact and tell you which committee should receive the charter for consideration, bearing in mind the political make-up, likely support, as well as the most relevant department - usually Environmental Health. There must be a councillor prepared to submit the charter. Get the dates and times of the meeting that will receive it and write to the Chair, maybe signed by the councillor, asking for it to be put on the Agenda. Usually this will be acceptable and you will get notice of when it is to be discussed. (If the Chair refuses, keep lobbying with letters in local papers etc. and try again in a few months.) Write to all those on the committee explaining about the charter (send a second copy just in case the first one got lost) urging their support and your readiness to meet and talk to them about it. Again, don't be discouraged if you don't get any replies, it may not be significant.

Now, widen your campaign by writing to the local newspapers, getting pre-printed/pre-addressed postcards for local people to send to the Town Hall and get on the streets distributing them, both knocking on peoples' doors and by having them on your stall in shopping centres. Don't forget to write as individuals yourselves too. It is no guarantee for success if the council receive floods of letters, but without any sign at all that the voters will support it you really have no chance at all.

At the relevant committee or sub committee meeting, wait outside to lobby members as they go in (BE POLITE AND NON-CONFRONTATIONAL) and then go and watch the meeting from the public gallery. You will not be allowed to speak or brief the councillors. Be patient as it may be a long meeting with your charter far down the Agenda. All being well, the meeting will vote at the end of a debate. If the motion falls, ie. they refuse to adopt the charter, have a postmortem and discuss new tactics, where you could have done more etc. Then wait about 6 months and start again. Listen to the councillors who may have advice to offer - this may involve making changes to the charter which only you can decide upon.

However, if they vote to accept the charter, it must then go to the council for ratification. (If it was initially discussed at a sub committee it may go first to a committee and then to full council). This is not just another rubber stamping exercise as the membership of full council includes members who have not discussed this before, so it must be taken very seriously. Write to them all and keep giving out postcards for the public to send in. On the evening of the meeting, again be there early to leaflet outside - and inside, in the public gallery, prepare for an even longer meeting. Now, when the vote is made, if it falls, re-evaluate the position - seek political advice and if you are still dedicated to getting the charter adopted wait a few months and start again. Be prepared to listen to the advice of councillors who are supportive.

If the charter is adopted - well done! As I wrote at the beginning though, the real work starts now, monitoring how the charter is implemented and ensuring it is not just policy in name only. Generally, my advice is to listen to the politicians and local party workers - you know all about the charter and Animal Rights but they know about local authority constitution and committee work. Cultivate contacts with influential people and be prepared to do the work for them, eg. draft their letters, write information for their speeches if they wish. Be patient, it will certainly take months to achieve its adoption, but if you succeed it will be a real step forward for the promotion and protection of Animal Rights in your area. Also, keep alert and nurture the policy makers - always remember that what can be made council policy, can be unmade!! This is a personal account, offered in good faith, and is in no way claimed to be the only or even the best way to get an Animal Charter adopted. Good luck.

MORECAMBE DOLPHIN CAMPAIGN

by Bev Cowley

The MDC had been in existence only ten months when, in July 1990, the owner of Marineland announced that Rocky the dolphin was free to go to a home which was acceptable to the campaigners who had fought to close the dolphinarium. Using the power of picketting we were able to negotiate for the freedom of an animal, who for the past 20 years had been no more than capital expenditure on the accounts sheet of a commercial entertainments operation.

Although the speed of the victory came as a surprise to us all, on reflection there were several very obvious reasons for this. In outlining them, I hope this may provide a prescription for future campaigns, or at least some guidelines - but first, a background of Marineland.

The dolphinarium opened in 1965 with six dolphins, sealions, alligators, flamingos, penguins and even chimpanzees (which were housed where the novelty shop now stands). It was seen as a prototype on which the construction of other European dolphinariums would be based. The sad truth was that dolphins had a pitiful survival rate, many only lasting 18 months to 2 years.

In the '60s there was no control over the importation of cetaceans (whales and dolphins), so when one died it was quickly replaced by another dolphin bearing the same name. Thousands of dolphins were slaughtered in order to capture the young ones which were considered suitable for captivity. Successful breeding programmes, not surprisingly, have never materialised. No whales bred in captivity in this country have survived; only two dolphins. This then produced a need to continually replenish stocks from the wild.

Fourteen dolphins have died at Marineland since it opened. Sooty lasted a pitiful 52 days. It was the death of Rocky's mate Lady which sparked the campaign. The circumstances surrounding her death, together with the most damning indictment of dolphinariums stated under oath by the manager of Morecambe Marineland, were to be the best weapons in our fight to win public support. Lady, who was sick when she was transferred from Whipsnade, was expected to perform tricks alongside Rocky. She became pregnant and still she performed until, in September 1989, she haemorrhaged and died. At that time there was no notification of this in the press. The council had not been informed, despite a contractual requirement to do so. Had we not visited Marineland at that time, her death would have passed without question.

Prior to the beginning of the Morecambe Dolphin Campaign only one serious attempt to attack the dolphinarium, and what it stood for, has been made. This was in August 1987 when 'our people investigated the possibility of releasing Rocky. They were arrested and charged and all received heavy fines. Since then they have supported the campaign and were all pleased to see Rocky finally taste freedom. It was during their trial that the manager stated that "Dolphins have to be hungry in order for them to perform". This goes against the fallacious propaganda put out by the industry which suggests that dolphins perform because they enjoy it. The manager's words were quoted on leaflets and showed Marineland for what it was. He has now left the country, indicating that there is no place for dolphin trainers here.

The campaign was multi-faceted. At times we seemed to get away from the issue of animal welfare, but there was a need to keep the pressure on what was, after all, a money-making business. Take away profit, or increase costs, and eventually the business becomes unviable.

To begin with we contacted the media; press, radio and television. We publicised the circumstances surrounding the death of Lady. At this time we knew little about dolphins or dolphinariums except that they were wrong. We enlisted the help of Doug Cartlidge, an ex dolphin trainer and now consultant to Zoo Check and the Whale and Dolphin Conservation Society. He had compiled a survey of UK dolphinariums, as had Margaret Klinowska for the Department of the Environment, and these provided valuable information.

The Zoo Licence Act of 1981 is administered through local councils who issue the licences to 'zoos'. We then began lobbying the Environmental Services Committee for the removal of Marineland's licence. The committee received hundreds of letters from people asking them to close Marineland and eventually they resolved that:- "This council disagrees in principle to the use of animals in circus, zoos and dolphinariums" and instructed the town clerk to seek any legal means to prevent performances at Marineland.

March 1990 saw our first national demo and rally. About 650 people supported the action and the procession made its way through Morecambe following two dolphin shaped coffins, symbolising Lady and her calf, carried by coffin bearers in animal costumes. We had a lot of press interest, provoked partly by the fact that Heathcote Williams came along and recited part of Whale Nation at the rally afterwards. Doug Ertledge also spoke, as did Dr. Horace Dobbs from International Dolphin Watch, who showed a film about wild dolphins. We hired a large conference centre for the demo, as it was felt that once we had arrived at Marineland, little could be achieved by shouts and chants. The day was, for the most part, a combination of emotion and good humour. The sun shone in Morecambe - a small miracle in itself! and Veggies from Nottingham and Sheffield kept marchers sustained with vegan goodies.

In April, as we had promised, the pickets began. The success was amazing. We turned away between 40% and 80% of the gate, and although occasionally tempers became strained, it was generally reason which won the day. Although initially the pickets were largely made up of Lancaster Animal Rights Group, fear that the pickets would trail off during the summer was unfounded. Groups from Manchester, Liverpool, Bolton and Northampton were immensely supportive and between us we were able to increase the pickets to four per week throughout the peak season. The atmosphere on the pickets was positive and good fun. This had the effect of grinding down staff morale within the dolphinarium. We held weekend vigils and one off 'flying pickets' which all gained good publicity. For those who ran the gauntlet along a stone jetty to watch Rocky performing his inane circus tricks was the constant reminder of what they had paid to see. At the commencement of each show several campaigners scaled the wall running alongside Marineland to unfurl a banner, clearly visible to the audience stating "14 dead dolphins, what price your entertainment?".

We produced badges and tee-shirts for sale outside the dolphinarium and offered children a badge stating "I helped Rocky" if they refused to go into the show. Marineland responded with free dolphin balloons for those who went in. They only stood the cost for one day.

As well as the pickets, we questioned the safety of their fire escape, bringing pressure to revamp the building. They were reported to the Health and Safety Officer for the condition of their toilets. We contacted Consumer Protection regarding the inaccuracy of advertising material. This we removed from tourism offices (in bulk). We forced structural changes to comply with other health and safety requirements, as well as the conditions attached to the Dangerous Wild Animals Act. Finally we notified the public of admission increases, the briefness of the show and the fact that they would get better value for money elsewhere. With a business which was already failing, this undue attention brings inordinate pressure to bear, even if it seems a long way from the plight of Rocky and the other animals. Rocky did his bit by going on strike from time to time and sending his beach ball over the wall to us, which we burst or lost.

Tourism rallied to Marineland's aid and the question of the council's continued support of the dolphinarium was debated at a meeting of full council. I was offered the opportunity to speak for five minutes and we held an 80 strong demo at the Town Hall. The result was some of the most amazing set of speeches against captive animals that I have ever heard Councillors make. The vote was all but three in favour of removal of Marineland's publicity from council literature, one voted against, two abstained. We were all thrilled and held an impromptu picket at Marineland after the meeting. The following day the owner announced that Rocky would be leaving Morecambe at the end of the season and negotiations between ourselves and the owner began.

There came a point when we needed to bring in a larger organisation to facilitate the setting up of a rehabilitation project. Zoo Check took on the negotiations and through their contacts with the Mail on Sunday were able to raise £120,000 to fund the 'Into the Blue Project'. Many like myself feel betrayed that our work has not been recognised since this project began. Politically I feel that it is easier to suggest that money buys freedom and not determination and compassion, but MDC accepts that the point at which we handed over Rocky's future was a point at which we had not the resources or the know how to give him the best, which is what he deserves. I would however say to anyone who feels passionately about anything that it does not take vast sums of money (though it helps!), it just takes a little imagination and a group of determined people in order for it to succeed. Rocky is in the Turks and Caicos Islands because of animal rights campaigners and that is payment and gratitude in itself. We are now working to secure homes for the rest of the animals at Marineland and have turned our attention to Flamingoland.

While we work for the three dolphins in North Yorkshire, Rocky swims for the first time in 20 years where he belongs - in the ocean.

For more information about the Flamingoland Dolphin Campaign contact FDC c/o MDC, PO Box 63, Lancaster LA1 4GD.

USA: Jonathon Paul, Bill Keogh and Cres Vellucci have been arrested for the liberation of 260 animals and the destruction of 3 labs at the University of Oregon in 1986. The trial is due to start on May 21st.

MIKE HILL

At 4pm, Saturday 9th February 1991, Mike Hill became the first hunt saboteur to be killed whilst trying to protect hares from sick sadists in uniforms of blue and red belonging to the Cheshire Beagle Hunt. Mike was only 18 years old and for the last 2 years lived and breathed animal rights, not just dogs and cats but every living creature. He was a practising vegan, worked at both Heavens Gate Sanctuary and Freshfields Animal Rescue Centre, was an active Hunt Saboteur with Yeovil Hunt Sabs and then Merseyside Hunt Sabs as well as attending national anti-vivisection demos like the Perrycroft march.

Mike was too nice a person for this world. There was not hurt nor malice in his soul. He thought good of everyone and everything. He was quiet, unassuming, softly spoken and gentle with those abandoned animals in his care. Yet he was always bursting with new ideas, new plans and new actions. His youthful energy and commitment knew no bounds. He lived and he died for his beliefs. Hundreds gathered for his funeral in Yeovil to pay their last respects to Mike. Although nothing can bring Mike back to us, we can all ensure that the Cheshire Beagle Hunt kill no more hares - Mike would have smiled at that and then perhaps his killing can find some meaning. Our thoughts must go out to Brian and Jean, his parents, who have had to absorb so much in so short a space of time.

SUE MERRIKIN

Sue Merrikin, one of the greatest ever ALF activists, died from cancer in Nottingham on March 11th at the age of 45. Sue became active in the ALF in the early eighties and was soon organizing some of the most important direct actions that have ever taken place, perhaps the very best of these being when she used an old van to smash through the security doors of the closely-guarded Safepharm laboratories near Derby to enable members of her group to rescue guinea pigs from torture there. Sue had appeared in court in connection with a previous Safepharm raid when the lab was smashed up and rabbits rescued, but the most serious charges laid against her were those of robbery following a raid on a laboratory animal supplier near Doncaster where a variety of different animals were rescued from appalling conditions. Sue had taken off her balaclava to calm down a woman at the farm who had gone into hysterics and so was recognised - but in a rare moment of judicial compassion the judge threw out the charges against her.

It wasn't just in the larger actions that Sue excelled, however, as it was constant small-scale attacks by her group that drove the fur trade completely out of Nottingham. The last fur shop put up thick shutters to try to ensure its survival, but activists used a sledgehammer to smash through them. But Sue's fight for the animals didn't just include direct action and as well as being the founder of the Nottingham Animal Rights Confederation she took part in many other campaigns in addition to running a sanctuary at her home for cats and other animals, which was still operating at the time of her death.

Sue's courage and high principles were also evident in the fight against her disease as when she discovered she had cancer she went into battle against it using holistic medicine rather than allow animal tested drugs to be used upon her. For a while it looked as if she was winning the struggle but sadly it was not to be. The movement has lost a great fighter whose robust, no-nonsense approach to the battle of animal liberation was and still remains a tremendous inspiration. In her memory, and in admiration for her courage, those of us who had the privilege of knowing her will fight even harder until the animals are free.

DAVY BARR

Davy Barr took his own life on the 16th March 1991 in his flat in Glasgow, Scotland. To say "took" his life doesn't sound very fair to me because in my opinion he was pushed into it by the police, the state and by other pressures like the slaughter of animals etc. There were a lot of people in the Animal Rights Movement who didn't understand Davy and I'm not going to go into details to try and explain it to them. I had the honour of getting one of his letters whilst he was incarcerated in prison in 1988 for animal rights activities. We used to write to each other quite regularly and it was decided that whoever got out between us first (as I was also in prison at the time), then they'd visit the other. As it turned out Davy got out first and no sooner had a visiting order been sent out, he was there - a round trip of 700 miles or more for a ½ hour's visit. He was always supporting other animal rights prisoners and there was never a word of prejudice against anyone. Not only was he eating, breathing, shitting animal rights, he was also anti-fascist and had campaigned against the racism and sexism that is rife throughout our society today. Here's an excerpt from one of his last letters to me which I'd like to end on. "Remember Gari they can set us up, shit on us and even kill us, but so long as there are Gari Allens in their world they'll win nothing but contempt and anger, I love you my friend, big brother, if nothing else I care for you - tomorrow may never come but if nothing else, some of us didn't stop trying, Yours for ever - Davy XXX". Well the animals have lost a true friend and so have I. No Davy! Some of us will never stop trying!

The Truth Surrounding Mike Hill's Death

(by the Merseyside Hunt Saboteurs)

On the 9th February Merseyside Hunt Saboteurs attended the meet of the Cheshire Beagles at Little Budworth, Cheshire. The 20 sabs from Merseyside had successfully sabbed the hunt all day, despite being attacked by hunt heavies earlier on in the day. At 3.15pm the hunt congregated around the hound van 3 or so miles away from the meet. Various scuffles ensued between the sabs and the hunt. The driver of the hound van, Alan Summersgill, was unable to control his emotions and laid into the sabs with the aid of a wheel brace. The sabs, believing the hunt to be regrouping in order to hunt elsewhere, blocked the path of the pick-up truck and trailer containing the hounds. 3 sabs, including Mike Hill, climbed onto the back of the pick-up truck in order to prevent it from moving off. Summersgill moved off at top speed with the sabs on board. They estimated that he was travelling at speeds upwards of 80 mph around the country lanes of Cheshire for over 5 miles. Despite efforts to get him to stop, he wouldn't. The sabs were scared and decided that they would disembark when the vehicle stopped. As the vehicle slowed to turn a corner, Mike jumped and was dragged beneath the trailer in tow. Even now Summersgill refused to stop. The sabs had to smash the rear window in the pick-up before Summersgill stopped and even then they were attacked by Summersgill's passenger. The sabs ran back to where Mike was lying, the pick-up drove off at top speed in the opposite direction. Mike was dead.

At present no charges have been brought against Summersgill. Compare this to the 30 or so people who are on Section 1 charges for venting their anger on the kennels of the Cheshire Beagles. Is this justice? Mike Hill is the first animal rights activist to be killed by the animal abusers. He probably won't be the last. Mike's dead and they're still killing. Merseyside Hunt Saboteurs and Freshfields Animal Rescue Centre would like to thank all those for their support during these difficult times. Please remember the Mike Hill Memorial Fund which will directly benefit animals at Freshfield Animal Rescue Centre where he worked (Mike Hill Memorial Fund, Freshfield Animal Rescue Centre, East Lodge Farm, Ince Blundel, Merseyside), and the defence fund set up to pay the legal fees of the 38 people arrested at the kennels (see 'Law' section).

COMMENT

SOME LESSONS FROM OUR LOSS

by Ronnie Lee

With the recent deaths of Mike Hill, Sue Merrikin and Davy Barr the movement has lost three important and committed activists and the animals three of their dearest friends. It is indeed a tragedy for the struggle against animal persecution that these three good people should all have died within such a short space of time and that sadness is redoubled for those of us who knew personally one or more of them. Their lives were not in vain, however, as each of them made a significant contribution to the battle for animal liberation and if we can learn something from their deaths then neither will those have been in vain.

At Their Peril

The killing of Mike Hill should cause us to think immediately as to the reasons why that tragic event took place. What was it that caused the huntsman to speed away so rapidly, so putting the lives of the hunt saboteurs in such danger? Without doubt it was because he felt confident that he would get away with it. To my mind Mike's tragic death is yet another example of where the widespread philosophy of "non-violence" is putting the lives of animal rights activists in danger. One only needs to have a brief understanding of the psychology of animal abusers to see how this is the case. A person who abuses defenceless animals (whether that person be a hunter, a vivisector, a circus thug or whatever) is obviously a bully (and therefore also a coward). The non-violence of the animals does not prevent such people carrying out attacks on them and indeed their violence is encouraged by the defencelessness of the victim, just as a school bully will tend to pick on the weakest member of the class. Therefore if members and supporters of the hunt believe that hunt saboteurs are "non-violent" and unable to stand up for themselves they will actually feel encouraged to carry out attacks against the sabs or to put their lives in danger.

The best way for us all in the movement to prevent a repetition of what happened to Mike Hill and to reduce the escalating number of attacks carried out against hunt saboteurs and other animal rights campaigners is for us to scrap the non-violence nonsense and to create a situation where all animal abusers know that if they attack us it will be at their peril. Just a couple of days after Mike's death a group of A/R activists attacked and badly damaged the house of the huntsman who ran over him. This obviously would act as a deterrent to any other hunter wishing to behave violently towards hunt saboteurs, but what I am advocating in this article is a perfectly legal solution.

One has the right in law to defend oneself and others, using reasonable force, from any act of aggression and therefore I am urging that all A/R campaigners (especially hunt saboteurs) take up self-defence training. In most areas one can find evening classes which teach self-defence and I would urge that all local A/R and hunt sab groups attend them as a group in order to learn the knowledge, skills and attitude of mind required. One can also get books on self-defence techniques which would form a useful addition to such classes. This would all probably demand a couple of hours of one's time each week, but it would be time well spent if it leads to people being able to defend themselves properly from animal-abuser aggression and to bring about a change of image in the movement which would deter such aggression from occurring in the first place.

The intention is not for A/R campaigners to violently attack animal abusers, but for the animal abusers to know that if they violently attack any of us they will rapidly get their come-uppance. Thus with hunt thugs etc. being too frightened to attack, the amount of violence on hunts (and at such things as anti-circus demonstrations) will be considerably reduced. I'm well aware this is the philosophy of deterrence - but when you are dealing with bullies and cowards it is the only thing that works. A knowledge of self-defence would not have prevented Mike from being tragically run over, but a knowledge that the A/R movement could and would stand up for itself may well have prevented the huntsman from behaving dangerously in the first place. It's time to change the image of "wimps in sandals" to "people you don't mess with or you get what for"!

Fit for the Fight

The tragedy of Sue's death was that she was only 45 with so much more living to enjoy and battles to fight for the animals. But for many years she had been a heavy smoker and drinker and there is really no doubt that this is what led to her early death. From this we can all draw a lesson, however, for having known Sue as a good friend I know she would wish no other animal liberationist to go down the same road to an early grave. It horrifies me how many A/R campaigners smoke, drink to excess and even take harmful drugs and how many of them get little or no exercise to keep themselves fit. Quite apart from how concerned I am for those people in a personal level it is obvious to me that as the movement is a collection of individuals, so the fitness of those individuals for the struggle is of vital importance to our success. If someone makes themselves ill through abusing their body or by neglecting their fitness, the contribution they can make to the movement becomes considerably reduced - and there is nothing better than an unhealthy, unfit vegan or vegetarian for persuading people to carry on eating meat.

To be aware of the terrible suffering of the animals can be very stressful and depressing and some A/R people might argue that they smoke and/or drink to deal with that depression and stress. That is a nonsense argument, however, as there are other healthy ways of dealing with such negative feelings. Take exercise for instance. A good bout of exercise produces chemical changes in the body which actually create a feeling of well-being and so helps not only the body but also the mind. One of the ways I have staved off stress and depression in prison is by taking the best part of an hours vigorous exercise almost every day - and it is something I intend to continue when I get out as the time taken up by the exercise is more than made up for by the strength and fitness it gives me (both physically and mentally) to carry on with and to increase my work. To claim one is "too busy" to take exercise is a very false economy indeed. If we can be fitter and healthier than the animal abusers we have yet another advantage over them. So let's make sure we are all of us fit for the fight!

Lives Worth Living

Of the three deaths perhaps Davy Barr's was the most tragic as he took his own life. We will all of us have great empathy with him as I would wager there is not one among us who has not at one time or another contemplated suicide as an escape from a world made almost unbearable by the suffering inflicted upon the animals for whom we care so much. But of course the very worst thing we could do for the animals would be to kill ourselves and so deprive them of those who could fight for their liberation. The persecution of animals can drive us into the depths of unhappiness, but the fight for their freedom can give us back at least some happiness and an important reason for living.

Despite the sadness it brings, to be aware of the evil of animal persecution and to be involved in the battle against it is truly a reason to be alive. What reason for living do ordinary unenlightened people have, dragging out their tiny meaningless lives, changing nothing, achieving nothing, merely taking up space in an already grossly overcrowded world? As I look out of the window of a train, gazing down on a town or city, and see all the rows and rows of houses stretching to the distance my mind recoils in horror with the thought "How can they stand to live?", "How can there be enough within their lives to make it worth the effort?" Ashes to ashes. Dust to dust.

But for us it is different. To be involved in the most fundamental liberation movement the world has ever known, to be part of a struggle which will end aeons of tyranny and usher in a Golden Age when the jackboot of human imperialism will no longer stamp on all the other animals - that is indeed a reason for living. To fight and to triumph, and to triumph in a victory like no other victory, a victory which liberates all the other creatures of the Earth. There can be no better reason. Davy Barr's short life was dedicated to the animals. He worked for them, fought for them, went to prison for them and he is, and will be, a part of that great victory. But so much more would he be so were he still alive.

"THE REAL ANGELS"

by Conchita

(in Australia)

It is sad to read constant condemnation of the ALF, from so called animal rights people. The core of the matter as I see it, depends on which side of the fence you are sitting on. If you are an animal screaming for help in a blood drenched slaughterhouse, or in terminal bondage of stereotaxic restraining chairs, would you be so critical of your savers?

The ALF are unpaid soldiers, risking their freedom to save others. Does it matter what kind of life they save? Soldiers at war are getting medals for doing the same thing! The ALF has never harmed anyone. At this very moment people are blowing each other apart, and we call them brave!!!

Wake up to yourselves and leave the ALF to do the job they must do. The ALF are the heroes of tomorrow and without them we would be in the dark as to what goes on behind closed doors. To all of you unknown people wherever you are, my heart goes out to you. You who risk your freedom to save others, you are the real angels.

In closing I would like to quote Martin Luther King Jr -

*"Cowardice asks the question, Is it safe?
Expediency asks the question, Is it politic?
Vanity asks the question, Is it popular?*

*But conscience asks the question, Is it right?
And there comes a time when one must take a position that is neither safe, nor politic, nor popular, but he must take it because his conscience tells him that it is right...."*

"Are you sure it's not another awful experiment?"

WHAT PRICE VIOLENCE?

by Jim Hepburn

It is easy to laugh at Richard Ryder worrying about causing pain to any and all sentient creatures, "even the machines of the future if we have grounds for suspecting that they are conscious". What tender-hearted forethought! It is almost as easy to laugh at Robin Webb and his spiders that would get killed in burning down a broiler shed. Imagine your average hunt sab van tearing across the countryside with sabs inside (no speciesists they) quite as concerned about the snakes, toads, spiders and worms they are killing as the foxes they are saving!

On the other hand, Nancy Phipps is not funny at all. She says "good riddance" to dead animal abusers, and just to make sure we take her seriously she includes "child molesters, rapists and National Front" people. "They are all scum", she adds, echoing language we have heard about homosexuals, Communists, police, Tories, Christians, Serbs and all other collective objects of blind anger and self-righteousness. Nor is Barry Horne funny. He says that either you get animal abusers where they live, as with a car bomb, or you do something useless, such as handing out leaflets. "The object of this (Bristol) car bomb was surely to prevent this particular vivisectioner from continuing his evil work. It was surely therefore morally right." Two surely's, one therefore: how could he possibly be wrong? With similar self-confidence we could kill off all the evil people in the world, and live thereafter in eternal peace. Just as vegans.

Between the funny and the unfunny a question arises: what am I to make of the welter of opinions that the admirable no-censorship policy of Arkangel permits? My first thought is that AR people must be as diverse as (let's say) the police or vivisectioners - some good, some bad, some other things. Some good vivisectioners? Some bad AR people? I must be joking! Well, no. My worst-scenario is of the bad AR person planting a car bomb that kills a good vivisectioner. What price violence? Some people are bloody-minded from first days to last. Some are not. I know of a young woman who trained in biology and got a job in biology, and for several years she did vivisection, and gradually she decided that vivisection was wrong and she gave it up and began to campaign against it. Was she an evil woman who became a good woman, or is the issue more complicated and in the sum of things she was possibly a good woman even in her days of vivisection? I myself became a vegetarian when I was sixty years old and a vegan when sixty-six. Lucky me that in my meat-eating days some virtuous AR extremist didn't decide that I deserved to die.

My second thought about the welter of opinions goes with the first: I prefer thoughtful conviction and thoughtful doubt to violent self-righteousness. As between Robin Webb and Barry Horne it is easy to choose. Webb argues his way through complex and contradictory issues, and at the end he thinks there is still arguing to do. He may be mulling things over for the rest of his life, and I think that is all to the good. In contrast, Barry Horne seems to have arrived at the end of thought. He is the realist and his opponents are fantasists and hysterics. The things his opponents say are ludicrous, amazing, disgusting and ridiculous (all his very own adjectives). How he reminds me of the unchanging taxi-driver in Private Eye: he says we should destroy the property of animal abusers; "this is the only language they understand!"

I think the price of violence is the hardening of hearts: our enemies', our friends', our own. The process is not necessarily irreversible. That woman gave up vivisection, and maybe some AR people will give up car bombs.

"SET THINE HOUSE IN ORDER"

(Isaiah xxxviii)

by Margaret House

(RSPCA Members' Watchdog - expelled from RSPCA 1987)

I am writing in response to the very interesting and stimulating articles by Richard Ryder on "Sentientism" and Robin Webb on "Violence" in Arkangel number 4.

I disagree with Robin that the RSPCA Council has offered clear guidance on the use of violence by adopting a policy that condemns premeditated actions that endanger life carried out by animal rights groups. How can an organisation that openly condones actions that endanger life possibly be in a position to condemn or preach on moral issues? Just a few years ago, at the RSPCA Annual General meeting, the then RSPCA Chairperson proclaimed her fondness for eating the flesh of other sentient creatures. Was she not supporting the premeditated violence against life that takes place in a slaughterhouse? Only last year, the RSPCA Council members went to Westminster Abbey for a Thanksgiving and Re-dedication Service to mark the 150th anniversary of being able to use "Royal" in the Society's title. After listening to extracts from the life of St. Francis of Assisi, the flesh eaters amongst them went to a reception where slices of their "brothers and sisters" were served up on a plate. I wonder what they thought that the lines from Isaiah "They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain", read by the Chief Executive meant? The RSPCA Council failed to expel Michael Colvin MP, the well known promoter of foxhunting and Life member of the RSPCA. Do not hunters undertake premeditated actions which endanger life? (Michael Colvin has since resigned due to the protests from animal rights groups.)

The criticism by the RSPCA Council of animal rights groups seems even more hypocritical when the Council's actions against dedicated individuals are concerned. Many members have been expelled from the RSPCA, expelled from RSPCA branches and been refused branch membership by branch committees. These individuals have NOT broken the law and they have NOT been cruel to animals. Quite the opposite - they are well known for their commitment to the protection and care of animals. In my view, the "trials" conducted by the RSPCA Council and by branch committees constitute mental torture for

by Robin Webb

Since writing my recent article on the morality of violence in pursuit of animals' rights (Arkangel 4) I have received an introductory mail-out and the first press release from a group calling themselves The Band of Mercy. As The Band of Mercy's stated aims and my discourse have much in common may I make it clear that I had no prior knowledge of this new organisation and also, although welcoming any new force in our struggle on behalf of other species, express certain reservations about them.

Both the letter and press release told of the 170 broiler chickens which they claim "were rescued from seven different poultry farms in the South of England". Unlike any 'direct action' press release I have seen before the farms were not identified. Any activist would realise that the media would need such basic information. How else can the media, or anyone else, check whether the claims are true?

They say that the name 'The Band of Mercy' was chosen as it was the ALF's original title and that "by resurrecting this name we are re-affirming our commitment to non-violence...the use of...arson would be entirely contrary to our beliefs". This seems to be nonsense as the first actions by the original Band of Mercy once they widened their interest from purely anti-bloodsports were arson attacks on pharmaceutical companies, seal culling boats and several other targets. Why try to rewrite history?

I am concerned that what this new group has written seems to be an attempt to divide those who, rightly or wrongly, support the ALF. We have enough divisions in our movement without any more. In any case, following the rescue of 50 cats from a breeding centre used by Oxford University the 'Oxford Times' (2.1.91) reported that "(an ALF spokesperson) warned that if the cattery was re-stocked, the ALF would take 'non-violent action' to ensure that the site could never be used again, but ruled out bomb or fire attacks". So, what is the difference between the ALF and the new Band of Mercy?

Both the ALF and the new Band of Mercy claim to exist solely to take illegal action, therefore neither may have identified contacts. However, both have supporting organisations. The Animal Liberation Front Supporters Group has a BCM number address which is run by a private company that guarantees confidentiality. Supporters of the new group (how can they have got supporters before actually doing anything? The original Band of Mercy/ALF had been going for about 9 years before the SG was formed) have formed Friends of the Band of Mercy with a standard PO Box number. Anyone can walk into the Brighton post office and ask for the name and address of the holder of any box number. Even if a false name and address is given it wouldn't take much detective work to track them down. Are they just not very bright or do they have no illegal connections to hide?

Much of the terminology used in the letter and press release is reminiscent of calls over the past year or so to boycott the ALF, to turn away from such activities and (more importantly?) to give your donations to more deserving causes.

Am I wrong? Am I being unfair? Am I being too suspicious? I don't know, all I do know is that until I have more information about the new Band of Mercy and see reports of what they have definitely done I shall continue to live with my reservations.

the victims. Is not that a form of violence? Does it not endanger life to treat individuals so badly that the victims can never forget the humiliation and injustice of their treatment?

I hate to disagree with Robin on yet another point. The RSPCA's front line of defence for non human animals is most definitely not their Inspectorate. The RSPCA Inspectors have very limited opportunities to defend non human animals. For example, the Inspectors have no access to laboratories where by far the largest number of animals suffer. There is inadequate protection under the law for non human animals and as Robin says, the Inspectors can only act within the law. It has been the animal rights groups who have made the progress in uncovering and exposing animal abuse. The front line of the RSPCA is composed of their Education Officers for they can teach children to respect all life.

The RSPCA is a vastly wealthy organisation. A lot of the wealth is held in the branches. In some cases hundreds of thousands of pounds are held in investments and in many other branches tens of thousands of pounds are held. If money was poured into education in schools a great deal could be achieved - this was apparent when Richard Ryder was Chairperson of the RSPCA and the Education Department was a vital force. Since then the Education Department was decimated.

So, whether violence against sentient beings takes place within or without the law is irrelevant to the question posed by Robin - "Is violence in the pursuit of Animals' Rights morally justifiable?" In my opinion, Richard Ryder's quote from Confucius is relevant to the moral validity of using violence in the pursuit and protection of animals' rights -

"What you do not want done to yourself do not do to others".

Only the individual can decide whether the action being contemplated is morally justifiable.

Arguing for animals

by David Lane

Consistency

We in the Animal Rights movement ought to have a single and unifying aim - that is, to bring about an end to animal abuse. Sounds simple enough doesn't it? But you've probably been to meetings where activists in leather shoes hand round animal fat digestives and offer you coffee with cow's milk... It's a familiar story! Have you ever seen hunt saboteurs wearing knee-high Dr. Martens? Of course you have. The aim may well be clear, but there is clearly a lack of consistency in our approach.

Almost everyone involved in our movement will spend a good deal of time arguing the issues with the unenlightened masses who, on the whole, would rather remain in ignorance of the horrors that lurk behind their food, drugs and entertainment. People are not exactly queueing up to go vegan, they would prefer to be comfortably numb to the reality of their lifestyle, but if you've managed to get them thinking about the abuse of animals and the case for Animal Rights - at least you are in with a chance of affecting their attitude and habits. But because people generally resist change they will often go to great lengths to expose the flaws in your arguments and in your own lifestyle.

Try to convince anyone of the case for Animal Rights and they will inevitably start looking for inconsistencies in your own position. You oppose hunting, but what about angling? You condemn fur-wearing rich women, but what about leather-wearing hunt sabs? You think the veal trade disgusting, but what about the dairy industry which supplies it? If you are thought a hypocrite you won't be able to persuade anybody of anything - the argument will stop right there. Do you believe that the National Health Service is safe in the hands of politicians who use private health care?

The need for consistency doesn't only apply to individuals. National organisations which appear to promote double standards do the movement no good at all. Explaining why Lynx do not oppose the use of leather, a spokesperson recently claimed that while people continue to eat meat it would be disrespectful to the animal if its skin was wasted! Do they really think it matters to the cow? Presumably they would support the wearing of rabbit-skin coats providing the rest of the rabbits had been eaten?

When a member of the fur trade accused Lynx of hypocrisy on 'Kilroy' he was right - and we were all tarred with the same brush! And even the more militant Hunt Saboteurs Association recommends the use of reconstituted dried blood for the laying of false trails. Are they advocating boosting the profitability of the meat trade in order to help save foxes?

So consistency is vital when arguing for an end to animal abuse, but we still get the objections; "I hate soya milk", "Plastic shoes make my feet sweat", "I only buy free-range eggs", "At least fish swim around free before they're caught". And so on, and on... But please, let's get things into perspective, it's not that difficult to become vegan. Taste is acquired and you will probably get to like soya milk, feet will get used to plastic or canvas shoes, and it is quite possible to live without eggs!

I must stress that it is those who campaign for Animal Rights who must be consistent. I have heard it said many times that to be against fishing, leather or the dairy industry weakens our case. People will be 'put off' if we are too 'extreme'. But that is to miss the point. If you wish to campaign against fur but not leather - fine, but that is no cause for you to wear leather, and if asked why you won't wear it, explain that its use contributes to the abuse of animals by lowering the price of meat by about 10%, and cheaper meat means the death of more animals.

The Arguments

When arguing the case for Animal Rights it is quite normal for a discussion to wander through a whole variety of different areas; health, medicine, science, religion, ethics, philosophy, changing from one to the other as your opponents try to justify their support of animal abuse. It might go something like, "Well, we may not need to eat animals but what about drugs, they've got to be tested haven't they? Thalidomide? Okay, but doesn't the bible say animals were put on earth for our benefit? Thou shalt not kill? Well okay, but God really meant humans, didn't he?"...

Doonesbury

BY GARRY TRUDEAU

The Animal Rights movement has developed convincing arguments and has gathered a great wealth of evidence to discredit vivisection as a way of conducting medical research. Similarly, evidence that eating and drinking animal products can cause health problems mounts daily. But it is not enough to show that using animals for human ends can hurt humans. It was interesting to witness the outcry caused recently by a BUAV spokesman who said that some animal experimentation in the past may have resulted in some benefits for humans. It was as if the whole anti-vivisection position depended on the 'failure' of medical and scientific research! Suppose for a moment that next week a vivisector were to prove that in causing animals pain he could, without ill-effect, benefit humans. Would that work be acceptable to us? Remember that the Nazis performed horrific pressure chamber experiments on human beings in research on high-altitude flight. Their results contributed greatly to advance in aviation, but surely nobody would argue that such experiments were in any way justified, or that similar methods should ever be used again. We reject the methods for moral and ethical reasons - not scientific validity.

While it may be useful to appeal to human self-interest, we really need to look at the philosophy behind Animal Rights if we want to show people how they ought to treat animals regardless of what is expedient or profitable, and it is in this area that the arguments most need developing.

The Meaning of Animal Rights

I think it is unfortunate that we use the label 'Animal Rights' to describe our movement. The word 'Rights' provides those who oppose our aims with an easy target to attack, and it allows them to divert attention from the real issues.

Do you remember the televised debate on the motion "Animals need a Bill of Rights" in which Mary Warnock and Germaine Greer put the philosophical case against the motion? Mary Warnock argued that since rights are a human invention they therefore can have no possible meaning for non-humans. By rambling on at great length about Property Rights her intention was to make the idea of animals having any kind of rights at all seem quite laughable. Germaine Greer wanted to know where we would draw the line - should malaria-carrying mosquitoes have rights, she asked? And what about rights for amoebas? I recall being very disappointed that the speakers for the motion seemed quite unable or unwilling to counter these deliberate and cynical distractions.

The problem lies with the term 'Rights'. The word invites ridicule from those who want to present us as either well-meaning but misguided 'animal lovers', or bomb-planting, acid-throwing terrorists. So what are 'Rights'? Animals, be they human or non-human, do not enter the world possessing them. Rights are not an inherent characteristic like eyes or toes! Consider a person living alone on a desert island, what rights do they have? They have none; the very idea is ridiculous because there is no one from whom to claim them. But if a second person was to join the first then the possibility of each endowing the other with certain rights immediately arises. Mary Warnock was at least partially correct, rights are to do with a form of contract, a promise to act in a particular way, not things which naturally belong to living creatures.

Would it be meaningful to grant rights to animals? It is often claimed that rights can only exist if the 'contract' is mutual - the one to whom rights are given must at the very least be aware of the claims of others. It is argued that the 'contract' is a social one, binding upon all members but irrelevant to those not in the club. However, it is clear that our society does confer rights upon those who are not able or not willing to reciprocate. People born with most of their brain missing, who have no potential to live a 'normal' life, are recognised as having many of the same rights as you and I. Amoral humans who commit murder or rape retain certain basic rights even though they refuse to recognise the rights of others. Society certainly grants some rights to some animals, but in principle, there is nothing to prevent society endowing oak trees with certain rights!

But if we accept that rights can be granted to non-humans, we are forced to face up to Germaine Greer's questions - what rights do we want to confer upon animals, and where will we draw the line? "Rats have Rights!" says the slogan, and you may not want them experimented upon or poisoned in the sewers, but what about mosquitoes, or fleas? A consistent theory of Animal Rights must not end with the furry creatures, it must be based upon logic and common sense, not emotion.

I said earlier that the use of the term 'Rights' allows our opponents to divert attention from the moral issues, but it is important to see it as a label and not necessarily as a description of our position. The Conservative Party are not bound to be conservative, nor are Catholics always catholic in their ways! So if we put aside the word 'Rights' how do we proceed to show that animals ought to be treated other than as objects - to be used at our whim for any human end?

Interests

In his book 'Animal Liberation', Peter Singer argues that animals ought to be shown equal consideration whenever their interests conflict with those of humans. This raises two important questions; what interests do animals have, and why ought we to consider them?

Of course it will be claimed that two humans can communicate their interests to one another, and since both share common experiences it is argued that these interests are well known and understood and can be universally respected - at least in theory. But, it is said, we can know nothing of the interests of animals. This may be true, but we could also claim that one human cannot be absolutely certain that another human has consciousness, or can feel pain, or can suffer. Based on the evidence of our experience, we believe they can, or we think it extremely probable that they can, and so we act accordingly.

So what about animals? What can we say about their interests? Are there certain basic interests common to all animals including humans? I have to believe there are. Animals, by definition, are living creatures which must eat, breathe and respond to their surroundings in order to remain alive. Observing their behaviour certainly leads me to suppose that animals act in a way which is consistent with a desire to avoid being killed, and to avoid being subjected to stimuli which in humans would cause pain. I do not know beyond any doubt whether animals can feel pain or whether they have consciousness or self-awareness, but I think it highly probable that to varying extents they can and do. But of course I do not have to know. Even if I were to think it only faintly possible that a rock could feel pain I would avoid kicking it simply because I have no wish to cause anything unnecessary suffering!

So what matters is not whether I know if animals have interests, but whether I think it possible that they have. It is for those who claim the opposite to prove their case beyond any doubt whatsoever! Further, I would argue that humans do, in practice, act as if animals have interests. The existence of a complex nervous system in all vertebrates suggests that they can experience pain, and to some small extent for some 'higher' mammals this is reflected in some legislation designed to prevent some suffering. Put simply, it is unlawful to seriously mistreat dogs and a few other furry creatures!

But, and more importantly from a moral standpoint, the vast majority of humans act in such a way that suggests they believe even the 'lowest' animal has interests. Humans appear to value animals in a way that they do not value inanimate objects. For example, most humans would avoid kicking (or 'damaging') an animal lying in the street - not because of any possible loss to themselves or other humans, as might be the case with a famous painting, but because they believe the animal has an inherent worth which results from its very existence as a living being.

Do Unto Others

If animals have, or possibly have, interests, how ought we to treat them? Perhaps we should begin by looking at how humans believe they ought to treat each other. Whether or not a religious basis is claimed, we generally start from the principle "Do unto others as you would have them do unto you". If simple self-interest is not always the motive then the principle must be this; if you feel that an action directed towards you is wrong then it is equally wrong to subject another to the same action. We imagine ourselves in the place of another.

Of course to suggest that we imagine ourselves in the place of an animal is to invite the charge of 'anthropomorphism' - thinking of animals as human, and possibly there are people who believe it in the interests of dogs to dress them in the latest doggy fashions. But to dismiss the 'Do Unto Others' principle if applied to animals as anthropomorphic is to miss the point. The principle simply asks that you consider the interests of another and act accordingly, and it is necessary only to believe that the 'other' has, or may have, interests in order to apply the principle. The principle does not depend upon the species of the 'other' any more than it depends upon sex or race.

Conflicting Interests

You have heard the old 'Your Child Or A Dog' cliché - your child and a dog are both drowning, which would you save first? I've lost count of the number of times this one has come up in debate! It is used because the questioner smuggly thinks that they've got you! If you answer "the dog" then you are patently loony and are not to be taken seriously, and if you answer "your child" then you are obviously as 'speciesist' as they are, you have discriminated in favour of a human! But have you? Turn the question back on them and alter it slightly - if your son and an aboriginal girl were both drowning, which would you save first? Should I accuse them of racism or sexism if they were to choose to save their son? Of course not! No one would blame them for putting the interests of their son before those of another child. Similarly I would find no problem in choosing between the life of my child and a dog simply because I value my child's life above the dog's.

Peter Singer is right to claim that in any conflict of interests between humans and animals the interests of animals must always be considered. That is not to say that the outcome must inevitably favour the human or the animals, but that a decision is made which takes into account the interests of both. It is the almost universal disregard for animals in any conflict which gives rise to the tremendous strength of feeling in the Animal Rights movement.

The very act of living involves any creature in a constant stream of clashes of interest with other living creatures, so are there any principles we can use to show how such conflicts ought to be resolved?

Wants and Needs

I have deliberately considered only those interests of animals which any reasonable person would agree constitute their most basic needs - the need to live free from pain and suffering. A 'need' implies necessity. Humans obviously have needs too, but they also have a vast number of 'wants'. 'Wants' do not imply necessity but desire. I need to eat, but I do not need to eat animal products. Some people want to wear leather, but they have no need to do so. The needs of humans are few, but their wants are almost infinite!

Stevenage A/R newsletter

Very often what is claimed as a need arises from a want. We need to be sure that a new shampoo will not harm a person, but the need only exists because someone wants a new shampoo - it is certainly not a necessity!

When we look at the main areas of conflicting interests between humans and animals it is absolutely clear that in almost every case the needs of animals are sacrificed to the wants of humans. So let us consider the circumstances that result in the death of several hundred million animals in this country alone each year:

Several thousand vegans are living proof that it is not necessary to consume animal products in order to live healthy lives, yet it is undeniable that millions of animals suffer and die to satisfy what is nothing more than a desire. And not only do non-vegans ignore the needs of animals, they participate in a grossly inefficient food production system which ignores the needs of humans in other parts of the world.

The needs of millions of other animals are forgotten in the desire for entertainment. Hunting, angling, performing animals - what incredible arrogance to deny animals their most basic needs in favour of such trivial pursuits!

The safety testing of new products before their use by humans is another example of how the interests of animals are disregarded so that humans can enjoy an ever-increasing range of new products. If these products are really wanted there exists a variety of alternative methods to test their safety. If these methods are more expensive the want for safety may have to conflict with the want for profit. At present the needs of animals are being sacrificed to profit.

Vivisection

The principle that I propose is that the wants of one individual ought never to take precedence over the needs of another, and in the examples above the case seems absolutely clear. It is for that reason I have left vivisection until last. Of all the major areas where human and animal interests conflict it is the one where it is at least possible that the needs of one may conflict with the needs of the other.

There will be those reading this who will deny even the possibility that the death of an animal in a medical laboratory could save, or ought to be used to save, a human life and I respect their view. I am simply not qualified to judge the truth of it. And if I admit the possibility, it would be wrong to evade the question as to how I would resolve the conflict.

It helps me to consider a hypothetical case. I can imagine being in a lifeboat with a child who is starving. I would attempt to kill fish to keep the child alive, and in doing so I would put the interests of the child above those of the fish. I would be choosing what I considered to be the lesser of two evils. It is only a small step to move this hypothetical case to the medical laboratory, but I am not promoting vivisection as a general principle any more than I would advocate the eating of fish. There can be no automatic formula to resolve conflicts of need.

Of course the pro-vivisectionists weaken their own case. They claim that all animal experiments are necessary - that they are performed for human need, when quite clearly the need, if it exists, often results from human wants. How many of the major killers are caused in the main by human actions? Isn't it possible that humans have contributed enormously to the need to fight cancer, heart disease and AIDS by their wanting cigarettes, poor diets and biological weapons? They claim that toxicity testing is necessary - I argued earlier that it actually results from a desire to save money. They claim that 'pure' research is necessary - that is, research done in the pursuit of knowledge in the hope that one day it may prove 'useful'. They wish to establish a need before one arises!

Pro-vivisectionists have a difficult task. They must first establish that the need for what they do outweighs the needs of the animals they use. Then they have to prove that, regardless of cost, there are no possible alternatives. And finally, if they wish to put the needs of one before another they must provide scientific and moral arguments to show why, in any conceivable case, an animal ought to be used rather than a human. I believe they have an impossible task!

A Position of Strength

Except for a plea for consistency, this article has been concerned with ideas and some may criticise it for that. But ideas are the foundation of our movement and unless action is based upon a sound ethical position it becomes gratuitous. We will only achieve our aim if we start from a position of strength. Strength comes from the conviction that our arguments are based not only upon hard facts, but also upon sound ethical principles which are reflected in our lifestyles. When our arguments are heard and found to be unshakeable then our actions too will be understood and supported.

WHY THE NATIONAL SOCIETIES ARE NOT FOR ME

by Susan Jay

When I joined the Animal Rights movement two years ago I decided not to join any of the national animal welfare or national animal rights societies as I had heard constant reports of differences, bickering, in-fighting and all sorts of other alarming things. Some may have been more accurate than others so I decided these societies etc. were not for me. I think it would be a good idea to video AGMs so that those who couldn't attend can see for themselves what is being said and done in their name. I was recently shown a copy of a video of the Vegan Society AGM. I saw in the last issue of Arkangel that Ronnie Lee mentioned he was saddened by yet another dispute - this time in the Vegan Society. There was also a report in Arkangel about trouble in the HSA. With some of these disputes you can't help wondering about some of the people's motives - it can't all just be sheer stupidity can it?

Wouldn't it be better if both sides in a dispute used Arkangel to put their case as little 'snippets' here and there don't really explain anything to ordinary members. After watching the Vegan Society AGM video I was none the wiser as to what was going on. A young man came in at the end of the meeting and someone flew across the hall waving their arms informing this man that people didn't want to hear what he had to say. How did he know that nobody in the hall was interested just because he wasn't? The young man may have had something important to say but it was obvious that the members weren't going to be allowed to hear it. They weren't going to be able to make up their own minds. I was later informed that the young man trying to speak was a long standing vegan who'd recently been expelled from the Vegan Society. It would appear to me as an outsider that the whole meeting was a mess and I think people would have done more good by sending the money spent on travelling etc. to good use at a local animal sanctuary. What I couldn't understand was at the end of the meeting someone could stand up and propose that the resolutions weren't even discussed. Even political parties etc. discuss resolutions at their annual meetings. Surely this will only store up more trouble for the future if people aren't allowed to make their views known. What exactly are people afraid of? Is it just purely 'power seeking'?

I'm so pleased that the people running Arkangel have had the guts to stick to allowing anyone to air their views. It doesn't matter if nobody else agrees with me or if everyone agrees with me - at least I've been allowed a fair hearing. If a lot of the articles published in Arkangel had been sent to the national animal welfare societies they may not have been printed for fear of controversy and people daring to differ. Arkangel can be one of the only ways forward.

I still stick to my original thoughts on the matter. Yes, I am a vegan, I am anti-hunting, I am anti-vivisection. I am anti all animal abuse but the national societies are not for me.

ANIMAL RIGHTS TUNNELVISION

by Paul Gravett

I was quite frankly appalled by a lot of what I read in Arkangel #4. To me it typified what I've come to know as animal rights tunnelvision, the inability of animal rights campaigners to understand the world outside their immediate sphere of interest.

The worst aspect of this is Arkangel's defence of giving a platform to fascists. Simon Russell's argument that this allows them to "damn themselves with their own pens" is simply facile because, as the letter from Patrick Harrington demonstrated, they are now extremely cautious about the way they word their statements. Harrington calls himself a "Nationalist" and says he does not believe one race is superior to another, but how many people read the Third Way's magazine and know they stand for repatriation. That means forcibly removing anyone who does not conform to their ideal of the mythical white Anglo Saxon race. What about racially mixed relationships and marriages? Of course Hitler and the Nazis originally believed in repatriation for the Jews until they found out that it was much cheaper to send them to concentration camps and gas chambers - and you can recycle the fat into the soap and make lampshades out of the skin.

I'm afraid if anyone's guilty of putting his boot in his mouth it's Simon Russell, especially when he compares Arkangel to Searchlight.

While I'm no real fan of the latter, it doesn't give platforms to fascists to espouse their despicable ideas, it exposes them. I know Simon that fascists won't go away by ignoring them, but no-one's saying Arkangel should be doing that: you should be exposing and fighting them.

In case anyone is saying "What has all this got to do with animal rights anyway?", I'll explain. Does anyone seriously believe that a tiny bunch of crackpot, flag-waving neo-Nazis will do anything to bring animal liberation closer. All they will do is cause untold damage to the movement because they will alienate from us precisely the sort of people we need on our side. Animal liberation will not occur unless society is radically transformed, so we should be appealing to the most deprived and dispossessed sections in it because they are the only ones who have an interest in bringing about real change. That means the poor, ethnic minorities who suffer from racism, gays who suffer from homophobia, etc. Now, I ask you, what would any black or gay person think of the animal rights movement if they read Arkangel #4 and saw articles by people from organisations that questioned their right to even exist?

It's time that some people in the animal rights movement realised what the world outside is really like. Life for many black and gay people in this country isn't much better than that of oppressed animals. The number of racial crimes has risen dramatically in recent years, and many black and asian people are now virtual prisoners in their homes, too afraid of going out in case they are attacked. In the last four years at least 15 gay men have been murdered because of their sexuality, victims of "queerbashers". None of their attackers have ever been caught since the police are too busy harassing gay men and lesbians for consenting and victimless behaviour. Poverty and homelessness have increased dramatically in recent years too. This unfortunately is the state of the society we live in.

Sometimes animal rights campaigners tend to forget that there is a great deal of human oppression in our society. If the movement never forges links with the truly oppressed - people who share a common cause with the animals - then how can we bring about animal liberation? I do not believe it will come through writing letters to MPs; parliament doesn't exist to represent the wishes of ordinary people but to protect the power and profits of the ruling class. It also won't happen because we all start using cruelty-free products, because that underestimates the flexibility of capitalism in adapting to new trends whilst remaining essentially exploitative (eg. the new vegetarian wonder food Quorn, which is produced by a subsidiary of ICI and underwent animal testing for years).

There is a huge potential for building bridges with other oppressed sections of society. Recently my local group organised a meeting entitled "Animal Rights and Gay Politics" - one of the best attended we've held. The speaker was Peter Tatchell, a leading gay rights activist, who has written articles in the gay press condemning the use of animals in AIDS experiments. Another encouraging development is the recent formation of a group called the Black Environmental Network, which tries to combat the all-too prevalent racism in the green movement. Above all we have to understand that the working class has nothing to gain from the exploitation of animals, it is only those who control and profit from the vast animal abuse industries that we should be fighting.

The Vegan

Unfortunately one often finds an undercurrent of misanthropy in the movement; the idea that all people are evil and if only they could be done away with in some way everything would be all right. This is implicit in Ronnie Lee's opinion that the human population of this planet has to be reduced to 50 million (how?) or in the "Leave out the political comment" article by Paul in Arkangel #4. Anyone who like Paul believes that fascists should be welcome in the movement has to ask themselves one question: could I work alongside someone who I knew was attacking black or gay people? Could any compassionate person really do that?

Sylvia Noble's attack on ritual slaughter contains a fatal flaw which people like her often make - she assumes that "humane killing" is really humane. Anyone who has examined factory farming and the slaughtering of animals for even a short time will see that in fact "humane slaughter" is a myth designed to assuage the consciences of the vast British meat eating public. It has been estimated that about one third of the animals killed in the so-called "humane" way are not adequately pre-stunned at all. That adds up to 250-300 million animals per year. Ritual slaughter should be criticised, yes, but not on the basis of it being more cruel than "humane" methods (which don't work). It should be condemned because to kill animals to eat - however they are slaughtered - is wrong. Phrases that Sylvia Noble uses such as "powerful Jewish lobby", "powerful Muslim and Jewish lobbies and their vociferous supporters", and, above all, "I am proud that people of my own race cared sufficiently to introduce a method of rendering animals unconscious before they are bled to death and am disgusted that British Governments give Jews and Muslims living in Britain the right to disregard the law and slaughter animals by stone-age customs" strongly suggest that she has racist motives.

Lastly a comment on Neil Theobald's anti-abortion article. It is all too easy for those in animal rights to use the "all life is sacred" view to argue that aborting fetuses is comparable to vivisection, etc. It is not, for two reasons: 1) animal rights should be based on the quality of life, not life for life's sake. It has always been ALF policy that if animals are too sick or suffering to be rescued, they should be humanely killed. Abortion is comparable to this, since it is intended to prevent the suffering of the mother (physical and mental) and that of a child who isn't wanted. Sometimes not living at all is preferable to a life of nothing but pain. 2) The difference between exploited animals and fetuses is that the former are independent beings, whereas the foetus is part of the woman carrying it. Since it is part of her body, she has every right in determining its fate. It's also worth remembering that men can just walk away from the situation; they don't have to face pregnancy and bringing up the child. Abortion has occurred at all times in all cultures, whether legal or not. Perhaps in some perfect vegan society of the future it will be unnecessary, since there will be complete sexual equality and perfect contraception. Until then, however, let's not persecute women who have to take the excruciatingly difficult choice of an abortion.

FAKE FUR

by John Harris

Some time ago I wrote a letter to Jonathon Porritt complaining about a fur hat he was seen wearing on his recent BBC TV series. I made the point that the wearing of fur is unacceptable to most people in this country and that there was some incompatibility between his wearing such a hat and his continued membership of the only political party which seeks to espouse the cause of animal rights.

I have received the following reply from Mr Porritt:

"Dear Sir, in 20 years in the Green movement I've met some pompous prats, but you beat the lot. The hat to which you refer is made of synthetic fur. Or is that also a crime in your book?"

This is just the sort of well measured, polite and articulate response one does not expect from someone who has stood for the Green party in elections and sets himself up as a spokesman for the green movement. The anti-fur group Lynx argue that the wearing of fake fur is almost as offensive as the real thing since it still sends out the message that fur is something to which it is acceptable to aspire, and even if fake fur was acceptable how on earth does a viewer of a TV programme know whether or not it's fake?

There will have been thousands of people watching that programme whose knowledge of the green cause is limited and who wish to find out more. By wearing such a hat, real fur or not, Mr Porritt has done us a severe disservice.

GREENWAVE REPLY

by David Milner

(Greenwave Executive Council)

I would like to take the opportunity to reply to all the badly informed or poison minded characters who have written to you about GREENWAVE.

1) Greenwave is NOT a Fascist organisation. We support the ideas of Direct Democracy with delegates from Community Councils and Regional Councils carrying out the wishes of their electorate and de-selected at any time they fail in that duty - hardly the stuff of budding Mussolinis and Adolfs! Some of the people who write to your journal are Fascists and emanate from the same area of politics as Stalin, Pol Pot and Ceaucescau, these people are using the animal rights movement as a cover for their discredited politics.

2) Greenwave is NOT racist. Our organisation is open to people of all racial backgrounds and we challenge Robin Lane and the brave Anons to PROVE we have ever discriminated against anyone for any reason.

3) Greenwave was formed in 1988 some 18 months before the Official NF was finally wound up and so can hardly be the new name for the NF.

4) Greenwave was not replaced by Third Way. This is a separate (and political) organisation, some of whose members are supporters of Greenwave.

5) Greenwave has never held a meeting in Wigan. We are aware that some local branches of the neo-nazi Flag NF have used Greenwave as a cover name for booking rooms they would NOT get using their own name. Since to my knowledge we do not have any skinhead members, I can say that the Wigan meeting was nothing to do with Greenwave.

6) Greenwave supporters have never taken part in racial attacks and again we call upon our accusers to produce evidence. Race does not feature in the policies or activities of Greenwave and I wonder whether some of your correspondents aren't trying to create a myth of racism to discredit our organisation. It would be very interesting to see how Robin Lane and friends would describe these tactics if they were used against the animal liberation movement. In my opinion Robin Lane could teach Saddam Hussein and Baghdad Radio a thing or two, not to mention that early communist Joseph Goebbells - he of the big lie theory. Goebbells has been the mentor of the political Left more than the Right and the racist tag is now on the verge of becoming meaningless thanks to the likes of Robin Lane.

Finally can I appeal to your readers to maintain an open mind and be ever vigilant to the hangers-on from bankrupt Marxist grouplets who would destroy the animal liberation movement from within. Remember the records of these groups and that all they ever succeeded in doing was spending all night arguing who could or could not join - the animals need ACTION not words. Leave these ditherers in the gutter of history where they belong and carry on the good fight to rescue our animal friends. Greenwave will play whatever role we see as assisting the cause of animal rights and we will not wait for permission from the likes of Robin Lane.

The 'Comment' section of Arkangel is an open forum for uncensored discussion and the editor does not necessarily agree with the views expressed. As an increasing amount of articles are received it is impossible to include them all. However, those that haven't been included in this issue will be given priority for inclusion in the next. Articles which incite illegal activities cannot be included, articles which threaten illegal acts will not be included, articles which could possibly endanger the security of activists will not be included and articles which we seriously believe will get Arkangel sued for libel cannot be printed. Allegations that named individuals are drug company infiltrators, hunt infiltrators, nazi infiltrators, communist infiltrators, police infiltrators etc. etc. must be accompanied by proof and legal advice will be sought, possibly delaying the articles' inclusion.

Our last 'Comment' of this issue comes from 'Nabate' in Belgium. "My English doesn't allow me to send you a proper letter, but we were kinda shocked to read under the headline 'Road to Victory' that China's gvt has executed and sentenced to death two person for the crime of having sold protected PANDA. In no way we have sympathy for those sellers of animal but we wouldn't think it's a step forward the victory to sentence people to death. Otherwise your way of doing the magazine inspired us a lot. Congratulations".

Two T-shirts are available from Arkangel, a gold coloured T-shirt with the picture from the cover of this issue and a white 'Unite for the Animals' T-shirt. They are all XL size and are available for £6 each including p&p.

ROAD TO VICTORY

Local authorities throughout England are being urged to adopt an environment led approach to development and planning and to make the greening of urban landscapes a top priority. The advice is contained in new guidelines issued by the Countryside Commission and the Nature Conservancy Council, the two main Government agencies responsible for protecting wildlife and the landscape (Times 30/11/90) * The Environment Secretary announced that Britain is to host a seminar in 1991 to discuss a global agreement to save the world's endangered species. The Government wants such an agreement to be ready for signing by 1992. It was also announced that British contributions to the budget of the United Nations Environment agency is to go up from £4 million to £7 million in 1991 (Times 21/11/90) * A leading peat producer is to sell one of the country's largest lowland peat bogs to the Nature Conservancy Council after a vigorous campaign against peat cutting by conservationists - Fennis, Whixall and Bettisfield Mosses, on the Shropshire/Clwyd border, will become national nature reserves. The Managing Director of the peat firm said the sale was "the result of public pressure" (Daily Telegraph 1/11/90) * Polytechnic directors have launched a programme for the greening of their institutions, with a commitment to promote environmental awareness throughout the curriculum (Times 1/11/90) * Britain is to give £46 million to a new world bank fund, the Global Environment Facility, set up to help developing countries to tackle their environmental problems (Daily Telegraph 28/11/90) * High sales of free-range eggs in supermarkets are leading egg producers to reduce the number of battery hens - recent figures show the consumer is demanding more free-range eggs, which now account for nearly 20% of all egg sales (Western Morning News) * In its first reading of the 1991 draft budget, the European Parliament voted for 1m ECU (£720,000) to be set aside for the setting up of a European centre to develop alternatives to the use of animals for testing purposes. The centre will co-ordinate research in the Community and validate different testing methods (EP News) * A shop assistant working in Che's Great Gear Market in Kensington ordered a woman wearing a £4,500 full length mink coat to leave because the shop is a fur-tree zone (Today 13/11/90) * Hunting has been effectively banned on Kent County Council land. All digging of badger setts for foxes is now banned and anyone wishing to hunt must first get the council's written permission (Focus 21-22/11/90) * The Ministry of Agriculture has announced that pig stalls and tethers for breeding should be banned. From this year farmers will be prohibited from setting up new narrow breeding stalls for sows and from using neck and girth tethers. All existing stall and tether systems will have phased out by 1998 (Daily Telegraph 11/1/91) * Last November members of the National Trust voted for a ban on deer hunting on NT land. Proposals for similar bans on foxhunting and minkhunting were defeated by a much closer margin than in the previous vote 2 years before. In a Gallup poll in December commissioned by the LACS, 83% of people asked believed that the NT should enforce the deer hunt ban. The NT has delayed its decision on enforcement by 2 years, but if the ban is eventually enforced, the Quantock Stag-hounds will face extinction and the 2 other stag-hound packs in Devon and Somerset could be in difficulty (Daily Telegraph 12/12/90) * The numbers of badgers slaughtered by farmers is likely to fall because of a new technique which makes it possible to tell if a badger has TB within an hour of tests (Western Morning News 13/12/90) * Ancient hedgerows are to be protected by law for the first time under new government proposals - the measures are designed to halt grubbing up of the hedgerows, with councils being given the power to make conservation orders on important hedgerows and pay farmers to maintain them (Western Morning News 18/12/90) * All hunting of foxes, deer, mink and hares with hounds would be banned by the Labour Party under new proposals to be unveiled in 1991. Labour also intends to strengthen the law against badger baiting and control the use of terriers in the countryside. A document on the welfare of lab animals and domestic pets has been promised as well (Daily Telegraph 27/12/90) * Hare numbers were expected to rise in 1991, ending long decades of decline because farmers are using less intensive agricultural methods (Daily Telegraph 27/12/90) * Pupils at a school in Stoke-on-Trent have developed a sensor designed to raise the alarm at badger setts, which would cost £45 compared to £300 for those available at present (Daily Telegraph 27/12/90) * The Government has banned fishing for sand eels off Shetland to try and save sea birds which depend on them. The ban follows a 4 year campaign by the RSPB (Daily Telegraph 29/12/90) * Polluters of rivers and lakes now face higher penalties in magistrates courts with the Environmental Protection Act increasing the fines magistrates can impose on them from £2,000 to £20,000 (Times 1/1/91)

(Daily Telegraph 4/1/91) * The adder is to be protected under new laws which will name it an offence to kill or injure it. servancy Council in its review (Daily Telegraph 4/1/91) * New laws to prevent cruelty to animals in markets have been announced by the Government. A new offence of causing injury or unnecessary suffering will enter the statute book, giving horses and other livestock protection in places of sale for the first time. Other new laws order the introduction of minimum ages at which calves can be separated from their mothers and sold through markets and it will become illegal to sell calves more than twice in any 28 day period. Electric goads will be banned for use on calves, young pigs, sheep and horses (Daily Telegraph 16/1/91) * The last fur shop in Swansea, Glynn and Leinhardt, has closed down (Western Morning News 2/2/91) * The Birger Christensen fur shop in New Bond Street is closing down (Times 1/2/91) * Following the launch of a campaign by vegans to persuade companies to stop microbiologically testing their products (a test using meat and milk), Innox have changed their testing to a non-animal method * Animal protectionists persuaded Bromley Council in Kent to call off the cull of Canadian geese in a Bromley Park. The council had arranged for the geese to be killed by a local gamekeeper on 26th Jan this year because they were allegedly making too much mess in the park and attacking people. The animal protectionists are now negotiating with the council to get the geese moved to a sanctuary where they will be more welcome * Moorland Furs of Hebden Bridge, Halifax, which held 12,000 mink, is closing (Turning Point) * The 'Fresh from the Sewer' Teenage Mutant Turtle toiletries were not tested on animals (Turning Point) * The British Heavy-weight champion armwrestler, Katherine Monbiot, is vegan (Turning Point) * World mink production fell from 42 million pelts in 1989 to an estimated 27.35 million in 1990 and the forecast for 1991 is down to 21 million (Financial Times 24/1/91) * New laws have been announced which set minimum standards for the storage of silage, slurry and agricultural fuel oils on farms. The National Rivers Authority welcomed the regulations as "another very helpful weapon in the battle against pollution" (Western Morning News 28/2/91) * The Linlithgow and Stirlingshire Hunt is closing down after more than 2 centuries of hunting (Daily Telegraph 2/3/91) * The Ministry of Agriculture has launched a new campaign against illegal poisoning of wildlife. The campaign is designed to increase public awareness of different types of poisoning and to encourage people to report suspected poisoning incidents to local veterinary experts (Western Morning News 2/3/91)

The number of animals used in medical research may soon be cut as the result of work by researchers in Cambridge who have developed a way to make 'magic bullets' anti-bodies outside a living body by using phages (a type of virus)

COMMON CAUSE ISSUE

No. 7

Spring 92

£1.50

ARKANGEL IS BACK!

After something of a delay, at last we are able to bring you the latest edition of Arkangel. Perhaps we'd better start by telling you something of what has happened to the magazine since issue 5 appeared almost a year ago...

You might be wondering why this is Issue 7 when you haven't seen Issue 6 yet. Well, Issue 6 was just about ready for publication when Viv, editor, typist, compiler, etc., was arrested (for something unconnected with her work on Arkangel). She is now languishing in Holloway prison and would love to hear from you - as would all the other animal rights prisoners (see elsewhere in the magazine for information). Not surprisingly, the police took the opportunity to seize the magazine, the mailing lists, office equipment, and so on. If you need further evidence that their intention was to put an end to Arkangel; they confiscated not the whole word processor - just the keyboard! If you sent an article to us and it's not in this issue at least you know that someone has read it!

Luckily, one very early copy of the subscribers list escaped the round-up. A certain person has painstakingly copied out the list by hand and has managed to get it to us! Unfortunately, the list is very out of date and incomplete, so if this copy wasn't posted to you please write and tell us.

So who are we? Of course our names aren't important, but we have the full support of both of the previous editors, and we see ourselves as "caretakers" for the next few months. We believe it's vital that Arkangel continues, because in its short lifetime the magazine's philosophy and style has become uniquely important to the animal rights movement.

We intend to continue in much the same way. Our policy is to promote unity in the movement and to keep people informed. We provide a platform for anyone who has anything meaningful to say on the subject of animal rights. While we maintain the "no censorship" policy, we cannot print anything blatantly inciting, or where the purpose is clearly to further some political or other "non-animal" end.

Please understand that this issue has been put together under quite difficult conditions, not the least being a lack of material! We urgently need articles to provoke thought and action, and we want information about what you or your group are doing. And we also need new subscribers because we haven't got much money! Subscription is £6.00 for four issues.

Finally, a plea to the high-tech writers amongst you. If you type your articles on a word processor or a computer, and if you can send the text on a 3.5in disk in either MS-DOS or AmigaDos in ASCII format, we would be extremely grateful!

Local Animal Rights Groups

BARNSELEY NAVS (Contact NAVS for local address)

Set up in November 1991 to campaign in all areas of Animal Rights. Received write-ups in three local newspapers and had an interview on local radio. First stall raised £200, they now hold stalls regularly. Public meetings are planned, plus anti-Boots leafletting.

BIRMINGHAM ANIMAL AID 3 GEORGE STREET, BALSALL HEATH, B12 9RG

October 1991 - gave a talk at Birmingham University. November 1991 - picketed the Moscow State Circus at New Arena. There were 80 at the demo on the first night.

COVENTRY ANIMAL ALLIANCE

Organised a public debate on the ALF.

BOGNOR & CHICHESTER ACTION FOR ANIMALS

A member appeared in a documentary by TVS about the unlawful arrest of hunt sabs. They gave a talk to a local WI group who gave a donation for badger protection and some CB's to help in this. Ten days previously, members of a local college leafletted Bognor with anti-turkey slaughter leaflets.

CUMBRIA ANIMAL RIGHTS GROUP

Have set up several public meetings, a talk on vivisection, and have picketed outside Boots.

EAST DEVON ANIMAL RIGHTS

Have held several stalls. They also held a demo in Exeter in November to protest against the start of the foxhunting season.

EAST LONDON ANIMAL RIGHTS PO BOX 216, FOREST GATE, LONDON, E7 9RB

Are attracting new members as public interest and awareness increases. They are taking part in a new campaign against vivisection at the London Hospital.

HACKNEY & ISLINGTON ANIMAL RIGHTS CAMPAIGN c/o ALARA, 58 SEVEN SISTERS ROAD, LONDON, N7 6AA

An active campaigning group that holds regular leafletting and protests against animal abuse.

HAVERING ACTION FOR ANIMALS

Just before Christmas went carol singing in aid of a local dog sanctuary. Also had a leafletting session.

HERNE BAY & WHITSTABLE ANIMAL RIGHTS GROUP 0227 364262

Meets on the first Monday of the month. An active group that campaigns in all areas of animal rights and which has had a good deal of coverage recently on local television and radio. On 1st February, about 25 members handed a petition to the Canterbury MP, Julian Brazier, urging him to support the McNamara Bill. A lively and heated debate followed, but the 'traditional rural fun' - loving Mr Brazier would not be swayed. Still, the local press were present in force, so at least his unfounded and out-dated views have been exposed to the voters.

HERTFORDSHIRE ANIMAL RIGHTS CHARTER CAMPAIGN PO BOX 66, BROXBORNE, HERTS, EN10 6LU. (0426 911785)

Are setting up a hunt sab group and have succeeded in having foxhunting banned on North Herts District Council land following an extensive campaign. They also received local radio coverage concerning the adoption of the group's animal rights charter.

HOWNSLOW & TWICKENHAM ANIMAL DEFENCE GROUP

Putting pressure on all local "Pet Shop" animal dealers to clean up their act. They are running a campaign to make all local hairdressers aware of L'Oreal's animal experiments. Raised £100 at a Christmas Without Cruelty fair at Ealing in early December.

LONDON GREENPEACE
5 CALEDONIAN ROAD, LONDON, N1

Held their Annual Fayre last autumn in London and about 50 people attended the Animal Liberation Workshop. In November they held an Anti-McDonalds march from Euston, through Parliament Square, to Victoria. About 500 people took part.

LOUGHBOROUGH ANIMAL CONCERN
0509 239352

Organising a demo against Fisons, Loughborough on 2nd May. Assemble at Southfields Playing Fields at 1pm for a 2pm start. There will be food, stalls and speakers.

LOWESTOFT & DISTRICT ANIMAL AID
PO BOX 22, LOWESTOFT, SUFFOLK, NR33 8LA

Suffolk County Council posted a partial ban on hunting on their land following a campaign by the group. Good attendances at both the adult and the youth group meetings. The youth group is continuing to flourish and two new school groups have been set up. In December, the youth group had a talk by local wildlife hospital reps. The group intends to start a big local campaign against intensive farms in the area.

MANCHESTER ETHICAL RESEARCH CAMPAIGN

Set up recently to campaign against animal experiments at Manchester University. Has the support of BUAV.

NORWICH ANIMAL CHARTER
PO BOX 30, NORWICH, NORFOLK, NR1 4DT

They had a good response to their day of leafletting against L'Oreal in early October. Later that month they leafletted against the export of live animals. In November they did two days of leafletting in support of the Manifesto for Animals, and they organised an "Animal Rights Workshop" at a local school. They are continuing to campaign against the local cattle market.

MILTON KEYNES ANIMAL RIGHTS GROUP
0908 609647

Would like readers of Arkangel to check if their local Trust House Forte hotels offer their guests trips to hunt meets on Boxing Day. Please phone MKARG with any information.

Letter just received!...

...readers who live in Bucks are asked to write to the address given below urging Bucks County Council to support the motion to ban bloodsports (hunting with hounds) on council land. The motion has been proposed by Ian Watts and is to be debated by the full council on 27th February.

The address is :

Mr Farrart, Estates Officer, Bucks County Council, County Hall, Aylesbury, Bucks, HP20 1YH

There will be a picket of the council meeting at 10am Thursday 27th February until 11am when meeting starts. People are needed to attend this picket.

PS. The picket of our local Trust House Forte Hotel, which takes guests to Boxing Day Hunt meets, was successful - no more trips to meets are on the agenda!

SHEFFIELD CAMPAIGN FOR ANIMAL RIGHTS

PO BOX 407, SHEFFIELD, S1 1ED

Held an anti-McDonalds demo in October, and ran a stall at the Sheffield Vegan Society Christmas Cruelty-Free Fayre.

SHEFFIELD NAVS

In October, about 1000 people attended a march organised by the group. They received plenty of publicity. They also held a demo against Boots on the same day. In December, they held a vigil against animal experiments outside Sheffield University Psychology Department.

SKEGNESS ANIMAL AID

Held a Christmas Fayre to raise funds for their Animal Rescue Centre.

SOUTHEND ANIMAL AID

In the autumn they carried out a successful local campaign against Gandey's Circus.

SOUTH LONDON ANIMAL AID

PO BOX 594. LONDON, SW9 8QG

An active group which campaigns against all forms of animal abuse. Their Christmas Cruelty-Free Fayre in Brixton attracted over 1000 people, including the Mayor and area's Euro-MP.

STEVENAGE ANIMAL RIGHTS

*BOX 6, BOWES LYON HOUSE, ST. GEORGE'S WAY, STEVENAGE, HERTS, SG1 1XY.
(0438 359424)*

The group organised a protest outside SmithKline Beecham's laboratory in Welwyn Garden City in January 92 as part of the National Anti-Vivisection Society's campaign "Free The Beagles".

STEVENAGE ANIMAL RIGHTS

SWINDON ANIMAL WELFARE ALLIANCE

PO BOX 134, SWINDON, WILTSHIRE, SN2 3AF

In November, the group held a protest outside Gerry Cottle's Circus. They received a good deal of publicity, including local radio interviews.

WINCHESTER ANIMAL RIGHTS

Did a sponsored walk in October to raise funds. The response was excellent.

Sabbing News

from the HSA

L a s t season was the best the HSA has had for as long as most of us can remember. (And also, I need hardly add, the most tragic.) Hunts all over the UK were under serious and regular pressure. We expected two or three to close down; in the event the final tally was five closed, and two amalgamated. (In addition to the ones mentioned in Arkangel 5, the Wigtownshire FH in Scotland has also admitted defeat, citing "lack of interest" as the cause. Scotland now has the same number of foxhunts as Tory MPs, i.e. not many.) To counter sab's success, many hunts had resorted to violence: most were treated to shows of strength of considerable proportions. As the Surrey Union's internal newsletter put it: "None of us present that day will ever forget the terrible events on Holmbury

Hill."

Good. Perhaps the message is getting through that violence breeds violence.

But with such a successful season behind us, the big question was could we maintain our momentum? What would happen over the summer months? Briefly, the answers were "Yes" and "Lots of sabbing". Those of you in a rush can skip the rest of this section. Those who want to know more, read on...

Minkhunting

Minkhunts are one of the easiest bloodsports to sabotage, and in consequence they try the hardest to avoid sabs. Years of attention have now ensured that most minkhunts are suspicious of newcomers, and

Sabs paddling at Ytene. Photo Simon Wild

Saboteur arrested at Ytene, Hants. He was held in a police van for over 3 hours before being released without charge. Photo Simon Wild.

The summer began with five Plymouth sabs attending a joint meet of the Devon and Cornwall, the Culmstock, and the Ytene. Badly outnumbered, sabbing had to be broken off before the sabs were, but no kills were reported while the sabs were there. This opening proved to be an exception on two counts: firstly because the hunt outnumbered the sabs, and secondly because they actually hunted. The summer was to be marked by increasing numbers of cancelled meets.

Next was the Ytene. An army of sabs dissuaded them from venturing out of the farm, and the sabs whiled away the day sunbathing, playing football, and cheering whenever Rose "Lovely" Whitcombe, joint master, showed her face. (Hard to identify from other parts of her anatomy, admittedly.)

That was the trickle that started the flood. The Ytene, the Devon and Cornwall, the Culmstock, and the Northants were all soon receiving regular attention. The Ytene changed hunting days (abandoning Saturdays and Wednesdays, then going back to Saturdays for 6.30am meets, then changing again). The Culmstock abandoned hunting except for occasional bye-days. The Northants were confined to kennels by the sabs outside. The Four Shires turned tails and hot-footed it back to the meet just on sight of sabs. The Dove Valley discovered the meaning of cruelty-free living when sabs ensured no kills for them.

Best of all, though, we were still hard at it in August, contrary to past experience. The hunts had been trying all the usual tricks, but to no avail. 'Hounds' magazine saw fit to advise its readers: "The are prepared to juggle meets at short notice. In consequence, summer sabbing usually tails off after a couple of months.

This year was different. The HSA announced a summer offensive against minkhunts, with more information and organisational backing available than in previous years. Many more groups were aware of minkhunt meets, and because the campaign was better coordinated, groups were able to travel further afield. The result was two-fold: more minkhunts were sabbed, and more sabs were present at particular meets.

minkhound packs have had several strikes by dangerous and very mobile saboteurs. All hunt followers ought to be reminded about necessity to double check on dubious enquiries about meets". Aside from "dangerous", we couldn't have put it better ourselves.

Angling

More good news came with the start of the course fishing season. The Campaign for the Abolition of Angling has re-emerged as a force to be reckoned with, and the old alliance between the HSA and the CAA has been renewed. The "anti-angling day" of years gone by was resurrected and transformed into a week-long event. More information, as with minkhunting, prompted more action: demos and sabs took place all over the UK. Irish groups were particularly active (due to a lack of minkhunts). Yorkshire sabs covered matches and also sent individual anglers home when their minkhunt didn't materialise, as did some southern sabs searching for the Ytene. The latter also developed the novel tactic of using an amphibious beatline in sufficiently shallow rivers!

Another trail-blazing event occurred in West London with the first recorded sab inside Metropolitan Police territory. The result was perhaps predictably over-the-top policing, with six sabs arrested, and the others escaping by dint of some hard exercise. The match itself was totally disrupted for as long as sabs were present. Two of the six sabs were subsequently acquitted, and four convicted. All four are appealing.

Grouse-shooting

August 12th was something of a surprise this year: the whole mystique seems to be fading away. The normal "grouse parachuted into restaurant" stories

Huntsman, having lost his horse, wonders if he ought to give angling a try. Unusually astute terrier man thinks 'What a prat' were nowhere to be seen, and even the usually cynical Guardian covered the event seriously (in spite of a ludicrous sabs = indians, shooters = cowboys comparison). Even references to the Twelfth as "Glorious" seemed few and far between.

Actual grouse shoot sabbing was pretty much as per usual: sabs occupied various moors, and prevented shooting from taking place. This sounds mundane (and often is, on the day) but one day of grouse-shoot sabbing saves more lives than a whole season of foxhunts.

The Twelfth is a nationwide effort by the HSA, with groups from as far afield as Ireland and Southern England travelling to the grouse moors. When the great day is past, however, it is up to the locals, and the Yorkshire sabs have been out every weekend since. And now that cubbing is under way in Yorkshire they notch up a cubhunt in the morning and a grouse shoot in the afternoon.

Shires Week

August saw the HSA holding another week of action, this time directed against the country's best (?) foxhunts. These hunts kill phenomenal numbers of foxes, particularly during cubhunting. They are also reckoned to be the most prestigious hunts in the country, and it seemed about time to take them down a peg or two, and show them the meaning of hound control.

Monday saw sabs out against the Quorn's opening cubbing meet. Within minutes of arriving, sabs had pulled hounds out of covert and disappeared into the morning mist. This set the tone for the rest of the day, with the huntsman losing control of his hounds whenever he loitered in one place for too long. The assembled supporters were not best pleased, and there were several scuffles. No sabs were injured, but we were treated to the spectacle of a rider trying to knock down a sab and flattening a supporter instead.

On Tuesday sabs attended the Belvoir, and successfully stopped a dig-out. On the negative side one sab needed hospital treatment after being hit in the face.

Wednesday and Thursday were spent in the company of old favourites the Cottesmore. This hunt obviously haven't yet learnt that violence breeds violence, and there were several attacks on sabs. Several people on both sides required hospital treatment, and the police are investigating the incidents. Arkangel sends its deepest sympathies to the new Cottesmore whipper-in, Gary Williams, who spent 36 hours in hospital.

The next two days were quieter, at the Belvoir and the South Notts. In all, six hunts were sabbed, who would expect to kill up to six cubs per outing - in the event, the tally for the week was three: three too many, of course, but a substantial achievement in the face of violence from the hunt and attention from the police. The week was rounded off by the discovery that the Quorn had cancelled cubbing for a fortnight: the gift of life for numerous foxes and foxcubs.

The final treat, though, was Horse and Hound the following week: "Saboteurs from all over Britain formed a hit squad which attempted unsuccessfully to interfere with hunting with the Quorn, Cottesmore, and Belvoir during cubhunting last week". Unsuccessfully? Dream on.

Northumberland Beagling Festival

Next on the agenda was the Northumberland Beagling Festival. For the uninitiated, this sick event is a gathering of beaglers and beagle packs from all over the UK, during which they spend two weeks savouring the joys of killing hares. This isn't what the general public would understand by the word

A Leveret

"festival" of course, but what can you expect from weirdos who think killing is a sport?

Late News - HSA Bingo

Not that there was much sport to be had this year. Sabs attended a record nine out of twelve days, covering a total of 20 hunts. Support for the visiting packs was dwindling by the last day of the festival, and the final hunt was cancelled.

One of the depressing things about sabotaging beagle packs is their tendency to "riot" after rabbits. There is nothing sabs can do about this, since the rabbit either escapes or is killed within seconds, but for us an animal's life is of equal worth, quarry or not. Northumberland seemed to be filled with rabbits this year, and four were killed, as compared with only three hares, the intended quarry. (One huntsman tried to tell his supporters that one of the rabbits was a hare - desperate or what?)

The week was also notable for very reasonable policing. Several hunt supporters may be facing charges this year, and the tally of sab arrests was down. There were no serious incidents of violence, and we're all looking forward to next year.

Cubhunting

As I write, the cubhunting season is almost over. It's been an interesting season so far, with many hunts avoiding Saturdays like the plague, and very few advertising their meets. Approximately 50 packs have seen sabs, with varying frequency. Some have only been hit once or twice, while others have barely been out without sabs in attendance. With our best summer for years just over, and with a good cubhunting season coming to a close, this year looks likely to be an excellent one. With your help, it will be.

Forget the Sun / Mirror / Express / Mail 'get rich quick' bingo! The HSA is running a far better scheme. All you have to do is join up, get arrested, sue the police, and - bingo! You're rich. Winners so far:

First Prize: Bournemouth / New Forest sabs!

Readers of Arkangel will remember that in March 1990 followers of the South Dorset FH overturned a car containing several local sabs. (For which two hunt supporters have been successfully prosecuted.) A device was subsequently found in or near a shop belonging to a member of the hunt. Dorset police did a stunning piece of detective work arrested the sabs. Eat your heart out Hercule Poirot. The sabs sued for unlawful arrest, etc., and the police have settled out of court, to the tune of £14000.

Second Prize: West London and Oxford sabs!

One thing you need to be a police officer is a sense of proportion. Thames Valley Police displayed that and other fine qualities in November 1989, when they arrested all the sabs they could catch, partly with the aid of a low-flying helicopter. Unlike their country colleagues, Thames Valley Police didn't have the decency to pay up before the case, so now they're stuck with court costs too. The £12000 was awarded in varying sums to nine sabs from the two groups. Rumour has it that this season they'll be wearing t-shirts saying: "Sponsored by Thames Valley Police".

Joint Third Prize: West London sabs!

Two West London sabs have been awarded £500 each from separate incidents, one in Hampshire and one in Leicestershire. Two of the country's most notorious forces wisely settled out of court. As one Hampshire copper bleakly commented: "£500 for an hour in custody? Not a bad rate of pay". Better than police overtime, anyway!

Fifth Prize: Merseyside

sabs!

In the aftermath of the Cheshire Beagles Riot charges, many sabs were on bail conditions not to attend hunts. Cheshire police duly arrested two sabs for breach of bail! Forty-five minutes in custody provided the sabs with £250 each in an out of court settlement.

Who's next? Seriously though, the way most police forces treat sabs is absolutely appalling, and I'm sure we're all glad to see them on the receiving end of British justice for a change. No one should be arrested for trying to save animals from a horrendous death, and money alone cannot compensate for it. (But it helps.)

More late news!

The following report has been sent to us from Oxford Hunt Saboteurs:

POLICE PAY HUNT SABOTEURS £22000 : SECOND COMPENSATION PAY-OUT IN A MONTH.

Only a month after Thames Valley Police were ordered to pay hunt saboteurs £12000 damages, they have caved in on a second case involving wrongful arrest and unlawful imprisonment of hunt saboteurs. The case arose after saboteurs from Newbury and Oxford held a peaceful banner demonstration against bloodsports at the Oxford County Show on Sunday June 17th 1990. Eleven saboteurs were arrested and held overnight at St. Aldates police station, Oxford. The next morning at Oxford Magistrates' Court all eleven refused to be bound over as they felt they had done nothing to warrant such action. Their stand was vindicated in August 1990 when the Crown Prosecution Service decided not to pursue the case.

However, the saboteurs felt that such arbitrary arrests and imprisonment could not go unchallenged, so they launched legal action against Thames Valley Police for wrongful arrest and unlawful imprisonment. They had, after all, been arrested and detained for over 18 hours for no good reason, without so much as an apology from the police. The case against the police, conducted for the saboteurs by John Mackenzie, was due to be heard at Oxford County Court on 25th November 1991. However, only a week before it was due to start, the police decided to back down and pay a total of £22000 into the court. They also agreed to pay costs, estimated to be in the region of £30000...

...surely now they must admit something is very wrong - a police force that pays out over £170000 in a month for unlawful actions cannot claim to have "got the balance right". We urge them once again to reconsider their policy very carefully and to ask serious questions of the senior officers who sanctioned both mass arrests.

As long as animals are persecuted for sport, hunt saboteurs will be active in the field using non-violent and legal tactics to save lives. We will not be deterred by unlawful actions, whether by police or hunt, aimed at bullying us into abandoning that campaign.

International News

Antarctica

A £5.8 million operation to remove debris and toxic waste from American bases has started, following criticism from environmental groups (The Times, 1-10-91).

Canada

Trapping statistics show a 70% decline in animals pelted, and a 66% decline in revenue since winter '87-'88. 990775 animals (worth £10 million) were pelted in '89-'90, down from 3.3 million (worth £30 million) in '87-'88 (Animal's Agenda, October 91).

Only one-third of the official quota of 186000 harp and hooded seals were killed in eastern Canada in 1990 because of it being unprofitable (Daily Telegraph, 5-10-91).

Indonesia

The Governor of Bali has ordered hotels and restaurants to stop selling meals made from endangered sea turtles (Animal's Agenda, October 91).

Italy

To combat the abandoning of dogs, a new law has been adopted requiring all dogs to be licensed and tattooed with identification marks. There are also heavy fines for ill-treating or abandoning dogs and for collecting them for vivisection (Animal's Agenda, Oct 91).

In 1991, the Italian authorities made greater efforts to enforce laws against the killing of birds and the slaughter was drastically reduced, especially in Calabria where hunters were forced to abandon the huts they use for shooting (The Times, 12-10-91).

Japan

According to an opinion poll, 63.6% of Japanese citizens say whales should be protected, not killed (Animal's Agenda, Oct 91).

South Africa

Numbers of the black rhino are increasing in South Africa, where it is being given particular attention (Daily Telegraph, 2-10-91).

South Korea

Jindo Furriers has laid off 37% of its staff, most of whom were mink farmers and fur garment makers.

The Korean government announced it would stop bleeding bears for gall following a public outcry against the practice (Animal's Agenda, Oct 91).

U.S.A.

Evans Inc., the largest U.S. fur retail chain, lost about £700000 during the first quarter of 1991.

The U.S. Interior Secretary suspended the £9 million a year wildlife and wildlife products trade with Thailand because the Thai government failed to enforce compliance with CITES.

Cowhide values fell below 1987 levels as two leading foreign buyers went bankrupt. At least one cattle trade expert blamed a worldwide trend favouring non-leather shoes.

It was predicted that dairy farmers would earn about $3 billion less in 1991 than in 1990, with about 4500 dairy farms going out of business.

According to the magazine "Restaurant Business", U.S. salami consumption has fallen 20% in recent years, and butter and egg consumption went down 3%.

In 1990, U.S. hunting license sales were 52000 down from 1989, and in Texas over the past decade the sale of hunting licenses for doves is down 4%, pheasants down 17%, squirrels down 32%, bobwhite down 34%, and rabbits down 49%.

Euthanasia of homeless dogs and cats fell by about 40% in the U.S. between 1985 and 1990 because of spay/neuter campaigns.

New Jersey has banned the sale of wild-caught exotic birds.

Hudson, New Hampshire has banned the use of steel-jawed leg-hold traps.

Pigeon poisoning has been halted in Evanston,

Illinois following a campaign against it and the Illinois state legislature has passed a bill banning human vs animal fighting, including bear wrestling and bullfighting.

The Famous-Barr Co. of St. Louis discontinued fur sales after repeated protests by the local A/R group (all above: Animal's Agenda, Oct 91).

Hunters were banned from shooting grizzly bears in the Montana Rockies for this winter at least when a judge in Washington issued injunctions halting a government-licensed trophy hunt of grizzlies (Daily Telegraph, 5-10-91).

In January 92, A/R activists chained themselves to one car and wrecked another at the Baltimore motor show in protest at the use of animals in crash and toxicity tests.

Venezuela

The daily newspaper "El Nacional" found in a reader survey that 75% believed the U.S.A. was justified in banning imports of Venezuelan tuna to protect dolphins (Animal's Agenda, Oct 91).

WHAT THE PAPERS SAY

A SMALL SELECTION

Pellet attacks on eight shops

THE Animal Liberation Front are thought to be behind attacks on eight shops in the area last Thursday.

The businesses, hit with pellets through their windows, included a charity shop and a greengrocers.

Butchers and betting shops were included in the night of violence and for the staff of Mawdsley Bookmakers the four marbles fired through their window was the fourth attack they have faced.

Upset with the damage caused at her shop, the manageress of Newfresh Farm Food in Charles Court in Timperley said they would pay repair bills themselves rather than face increased premiums by claiming on insurance.

The shop is predominantly a greengrocers although they do stock a selection of cooked meats.

The Imperial Cancer Research Shop in Stamford New Road in Altrincham had a pellet fired through its large front window, for the third time.

Press Officer for the fund, Mrs Susan Kiddy, said the window would cost several hundred pounds to replace. Bearing in mind that the average weekly turnover of the shop last year was £1,000 she felt that volunteers and supporters would have to work that little bit harder to achieve the same goals.

The Police could not confirm that the Animal Liberation Group were responsible for the attacks. Detective Chief Inspector Hamilton Dalziel said that enquiries were continuing.

Activists strike at produce business

ANIMAL rights activists halted supplies to a Guildford produce business, on Sunday, causing thousands of pounds' worth of damage.

Mr. David Sanders, who supplies eggs, cheese and hams to local restaurants and shops from his home in Willow Park, said his supply vehicles parked at his father's free range poultry farm in Cobham were left out of action after tyres were slashed and the bodywork smothered in paint stripper during the attack.

"Scum", "murderer", and "42 birds now free" were among the graffiti messages sprayed on vehicles, walls and on a chicken house at the farm sometime between 11 p.m. on October 12 and 8 a.m. on October 13. Those responsible also wrote the letters "ALF" with the Animal Liberation Front's insignia and threatened: "We'll be back."

Mr. David Sanders said: "If we were a battery farm we'd almost expect this to happen but as a free range farm, we're trying to do everything the public want and we're still getting visits like this."

He added that the 2,500 chickens on the farm were only kept for egg production and those freed would probably now be eaten by foxes.

Leather shop is attacked by vandals

A Wolverhampton leather furniture store was today the target of vandals for the third time in three weeks.

Bricks were hurled at several windows, cracking one, in the attack at World of Leather, Lower Stafford Street.

The store was left with a bill for £10,000 after the two previous attacks for which the Animal Liberation Front claimed responsibility.

The shop's assistant manager Mrs Christine Harrison said she did not know if the animal rights group was responsible for the latest attack and could not yet estimate the cost of the damage.

Det Sgt Wayne Bernstein of Dunstall Road police, appealing for witnesses, said the incident happened during the night.

RSPCA shocker

A KEY RSPCA figure shocked the charity today by announcing his appointment as press officer to the hard-line Animal Liberation Front. But Robin Webb, new official spokesman for ALF which openly approves law-breaking to save animals, said he intended remaining on the governing council of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. Mr. Webb said, "We are all travelling the same road in the same direction with animal abuse being the common enemy."

FUR SHOPS ATTACKED

An animal rights group, the Animal Liberation Front, has attacked two shops in Tel Aviv, daubing them with paint for their "needless cruelty to animals." Earlier, the underground group attacked a Tel Aviv University building housing animals used in scientific experiments.

OCTOBER 1991

Damage orgy in circus protest

ANIMAL rights activists have been blamed for thousands of pounds worth of damage to shop windows in Leigh, Atherton, Hindley and Golborne.

The action has been connected with a campaign against Gandey's Circus, which started in Leigh on Tuesday. Posters advertising the circus were, or had been, in the windows.

The police are also investigating if the attacks are linked to acid being poured onto the window of Boot's Chemists, Atherton.

The attackers fired marbles or ball bearings at more than 20 windows overnight.

Supt Brian Lees, of Leigh police, said: "Although no organisation has yet claimed responsibility we believe it may have been the Animal Liberation Front."

"We also believe it is connected with the visit of Gandey's Circus."

"I have no comments to make on the purpose of the A L F or any similar organisation but I cannot condone mindless acts of violence against innocent shopkeepers."

Attacked in Railway Road, Leigh were: Monks Travel, Ian Williams Carpets, The Journal, Atherton's butchers, CPS Store and Mawdesley's butchers.

Windows damaged in Leigh Road: Alan Prescott Plumbing, Evans newsagents, Ladbroke's betting shop, Bensons' butchers, Hodge and Sons plumbers.

And in Chapel Street: Ladbroke's betting shop and Fisher's butchers.

Bolton and District Animal Rights Group denied responsibility for the attacks in a phone call to The Journal. On Tuesday they were demonstrating at the circus.

Big con claim over Lucozade

ANIMAL rights fanatics claimed yesterday they pulled off a con over infected Lucozade.

The Animal Liberation Front say they tricked police into warning that five million harmless bottles were contaminated.

The group say they have infiltrated the police's Animal Rights National Index.

And they claim one of its cells fed false information into the ARNL.

An ALF spokesman said: "We did not immediately claim responsibility as we were concerned about the 10 innocent people arrested in dawn raids."

"But as the scheme achieved the desired effects, we decided to claim responsibility."

But a Scotland Yard spokesman said: "We are happy to stand by last week's statement - we are quite certain it was bona fide."

New ALF cell in North Down

A MAN, claiming to represent the extremist Animal Liberation Front (ALF), has told the "Spectator" that the group has set up a new 'cell' in North Down.

In a telephone call to the 'Spectator' yesterday morning (Wednesday), the caller claimed that a new cell of ALF activists had been set up in the area. The move comes in response to the arrest of five people earlier this month, in connection with ALF activities.

The caller also claimed that the group was responsible for smashing windows at a Boots Chemists store, although he did not say where or when.

Yesterday's 'phone call preceded news that a key RSPCA member in England has been appointed as Press Officer for the ALF in Great Britain.

The news was revealed last night that Mr Robin Webb - a member of the governing council of the RSPCA - had officially joined the ranks of the extremist animal rights group.

Speaking this morning (Thursday) a spokeswoman for the RSPCA said Mr Webb had sat through a Society council meeting yesterday in London without mentioning his ALF appointment.

According to the spokeswoman, the revelation came last night in a story released by the Press Association in England.

In a statement to the press, the RSPCA stated: "As an organisation which works to promote kindness and prevent cruelty to animals, and uses all lawful means to achieve these ends, the Society has explicitly and constantly condemned those individuals and organisations who break the law and use violence, no matter for what purpose."

The spokeswoman added that at an RSPCA council meeting in June, Mr Webb had seconded a resolution condemning the actions of animal rights groups which endangered life.

Last night's revelation will be discussed by the RSPCA's governing council on Monday.

TV show claims ALF cost more

ANIMAL Liberation Front attacks are costing more economic damage than the IRA, an author has claimed.

Speaking last night on a BBC news and current affairs programme Public Eye, David Henshaw said ALF attacks have been "enormously effective".

A section of the BBC2 programme investigated a number of recent ALF attacks in Northern Ireland.

Mr Henshaw, author of Animal Warfare, said the group is "doing far more economic damage to this country than the IRA, and by and large a lot of this economic damage is going unreported."

Firebugs blitz drinks factory

FIREBUGS caused a huge blaze at a Lucozade factory in Little Hulton, Salford, it was confirmed today. Although no one has admitted responsibility, the fire may be linked to an alleged animal lib plot to spike bottles of the drink because of the group's ties with animal testing.

Animal liberators deface milk depot

ANIMAL Liberation Front initials were sprayed over eight milk floats during a raid on a Tenterden dairy depot at the weekend.

But the police and Unigate Dairy managers are mystified that the group has not come forward to claim responsibility.

At the Unigate regional head office in Aldershot, press officer Kathy Cuddihy said it had been an isolated incident: "There have not been any incidents of this sort at our other depots and so far the animal liberators have not said they did it."

She added that no animal products were processed at the Tanyard Farm depot in Rolvenden Road. It was simply used for milk and dairy deliveries.

The floats were sprayed with "a corrosive material" and with red paint inside and outside.

Tenterden police Sgt Steve Brown said the floats' tyres had been let down and the seats were slashed.

The initials ALF were sprayed on floats and around the depot, and the windows of the office were also smeared with a corrosive substance.

Officers on patrol discovered the damage early on Sunday morning.

Staff worked throughout the day to clean up the floats, which were ready for the rounds as normal yesterday, with the usual deliveries to 3,000 customers in the area.

NEWS DIGEST

Animal rights graffiti on local shops

TWO CIRENCESTER butchers and a burger restaurant were victims of Animal Liberation Front graffiti over the week-end.

The offenders sprayed red paint on Dewhurst Butchers in Cricklade Street, Jesse Smith Butchers in Black Jack Street and Burger Castle in Castle Street.

"We had this happen to us only a few weeks ago," said Colin Henderson, manager at Dewhurst in Cirencester.

"We've been able to get the paint off but I'm fed up with this sort of thing happening. I can't understand the people that do it."

Animal libbers target shops

ANIMAL liberation slogans have been daubed in paint on shop windows in a string of attacks in the city.

Staff turning up to work today found "Meat is Murder" slogans painted in purple and orange at Dewhurst and Judges' butchers, both on Sincil Street, off High Street.

And Boots on Lincoln's High Street was also hit by vandals claiming to be from the Animal Liberation Front.

Police said today the vandalism was attributed to the animal rights' group.

County force spokesman Sergeant Dave Picker said:

"The windows also had Alf written on them but whether they were from the group or just someone claiming to be them we do not know."

Staff at the three shops were today cleaning off the brightly coloured paint which police say should not have any lasting damage.

Future doubt

THE future of an RSPCA employee linked to the extreme Animal Liberation Front still hangs in the balance.

Activists admit to drink scare

ANIMAL activists last night admitted they were behind a drinks contamination scare which forced 5 million bottles of Lucozade off the shop shelves.

Robin Webb, a spokesman for the Animal Liberation Front, admitted the group were behind the scare and said they had planned to warn people but were preempted by police action.

Lucozade's makers, SmithKline Beecham, use animals in laboratory tests for the firm's pharmaceuticals division.

Move to oust RSPCA man

ONE OF the RSPCA's top officials faces dismissal after agreeing to act as press officer for the militant Animal Liberation Front. Robin Webb, 46, of Swavesey, Cambridgeshire, serves on the ruling council of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals which has always opposed the hard-line and often illegal tactics adopted by ALF.

Arson hits Lucozade

A BLAZE at a Lucozade factory early yesterday was arson, police said.

The fire near Bolton, Lancs, comes only a month after 5,000,000 bottles had to be withdrawn from shops after police foiled an animal lib plot to spike the drink.

NOVEMBER 1991

Activist target abattoir is set to close down

CANTERBURY abattoir, hit by animal rights activists three months ago, looks likely to close in the spring.

In its place will be new offices for the South Eastern Gas Board.

SEGAS has applied for planning permission to demolish the abattoir, owned by FMC (Meat) Ltd and build a district centre to take staff from its offices in Thanet.

It said it already has a conditional purchase agreement with FMC and, if the City Council approves its application, plans to be operational within 18 months.

FMC, which is part of Hillsdown Holdings, is believed to be facing costs of over £2 million to bring the abattoir in line with EC regulations although it conforms to British standards.

But it refused to comment on its closure plans. A spokeswoman for the financial director, Alan Hewitt, said the company had a policy of not speaking to the Press.

The news has dismayed farmers and butchers who now face travelling to Charing, Lamberhurst or Guildford for slaughterhouse facilities.

They see the loss of the abattoir as a matter for regret. They say it will result in extra costs being passed down the line to shoppers and impose stress on animals forced to travel for slaughter.

And a question mark has also been put over the future of the East Kent Prime Stock Show for which carcasses have traditionally been prepared by FMC.

The show chairman, Peter Mummery, said abattoirs had to come up to EC standards which meant investing a lot of money. The Canterbury building would have to be radically rebuilt to meet them.

He said: "The effect on East Kent will be quite devastating. It is doing away with another option for the customer. Butchers still go to Canterbury market to buy livestock and take them to FMC to be killed, but this will cease."

He was also concerned about the effect on animals due to be slaughtered for humane reasons which would have to travel further.

"If animals have to go to Lamberhurst or Guildford it is a long way for them to travel."

Bekesbourne farmer John Ash, who uses the abattoir for his spring lamb trade, said they would have to go to Charing, incurring extra cost, and Bridge butcher Laurie Wakeham said he, too, would have to use an abattoir some distance away.

He said: "I view it with dismay. It is the last one in the area. It will add to the cost. At the moment, I pay for the animals to go to the abattoir and they are then brought to me."

He said that when privately-owned slaughterhouses were closed and the council took over the abattoir, later sold to FMC, they were promised there would always be a slaughterhouse there for them.

A spokesman for the City Council said it was under no obligation to provide an abattoir.

Cllr Tom Castle, who farms at Petham, sends beef animals to be slaughtered at Broad Oak Road.

He said FMC was toying with the idea of closing. "Providing FMC are not contemplating pulling out of Kent, it will not make any difference to us," he said.

Peter Drummond, secretary of the Canterbury branch of the NFU, said the closure would mean substantial extra costs to his members which would have to be passed on.

FMC was firebombed by the Animal Liberation Front in September, causing tens of thousands of pounds worth of damage.

Shrimpers attacked

THE Animal Liberation Front has admitted vandalising a number of shrimping rigs along a Merseyside coastline.

The animal rights activists confessed to slashing tyres and ripping electrics from the tractors of nine rigs on Formby beach in protest against the "horrific killing of fish".

It is believed a local ALF cell of three or four people was responsible for the attack and the burning of two other shrimping rigs on Ainsdale beach last week.

DECEMBER 1991

Wrong road

ADVOCATES for Animals, Animal Aid and the British Union for the Abolition of Vivisection all condemn the recent fire-bomb attacks by the Animal Liberation Front in Scotland.

The use of animals in medical research is an important moral issue which should be discussed openly without fear of retribution.

The only way forward is non-violent, well-informed debate between responsible people.—Les Ward (AFA), Mark Gold (AA), Steve McIvor (BUAV).

Dawn swoops

POLICE Investigating firebomb attacks by animal rights terrorists have made a string of arrests in dawn swoops throughout Manchester and Merseyside. Meat producers and butchers in Stockport have been victims of Animal Liberation Front attacks on a number of occasions in the past two years.

Threat to store: Police are investigating claims that animal rights activists have "spiked" products at the Boots store in Bond Street, Leeds. The Animal Liberation Front said toiletries had been contaminated.

Terror onslaught of animal activists

Derek Douglas reports how the Animal Liberation Front has adopted terror tactics in its campaign for recognition of animal rights

THE Animal Liberation Front claims to have three undercover cells operating in Scotland and that they have been responsible for the past fortnight's firebomb and arson attacks on animal-related establishments in and around Edinburgh and further afield.

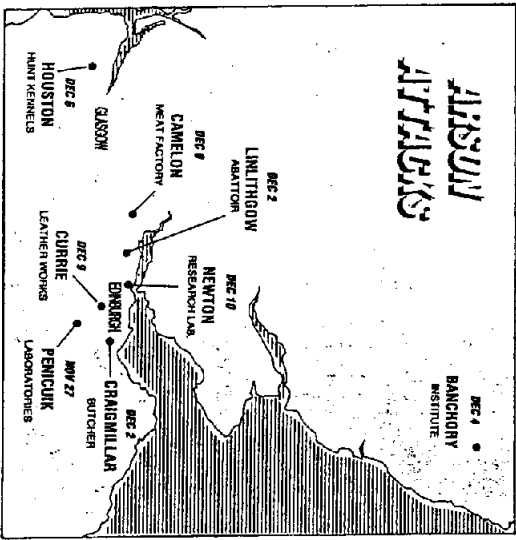

The ALF organisation — the most militant of the animal rights groupings and the one most fervently dedicated to direct action — has not claimed responsibility for the bombings in the normal way by contacting news organisations.

Instead, it chooses to publicise its activities through the medium of its "press officer", Cambridge-based Robin Webb, who yesterday maintained that there was one autonomous cell operating in the Lothian area, another in Grampian and a third in an area which he declined to specify.

He said that ALF direct-action cells operated independently without contact with each other in order to maintain security. They chose, also, not to contact him to inform him of their operations as his telephone was, in all probability, being tapped by Special Branch.

"They don't contact me because I have little doubt that my phone is bugged and it would be possible for police to identify them from voice recordings. Having said that, from all the reports that I have received of these incidents in Scotland there is no doubt that they fall within the ALF's policies and I am quite confident that they are the work of ALF."

Webb's claims come as police forces throughout the country continue to investigate the activities of this sinister wing of the animal rights movement. An undercover surveillance team, the Animal Rights National Index (ARNI) at Scotland Yard was established in 1986 in a bid to monitor the operations of animal extremists.

A year later police achieved a major coup when Ronnie Lee, one of Webb's predecessors as ALF press officer, and the movement's guru and guiding light, received a 10-year jail sentence for conspiracy to cause explosions.

There are currently 13 ALF extremists serving prison sentences, the most recently incarcerated being Michael Shanahan and Barry Horne who were each sentenced to three years on conspiracy charges at Northampton Crown Court four weeks ago. They were stopped by police while carrying incendiary devices.

Today in Dalkeith, police from Lothian and Borders, Central, Strathclyde and Grampian will stage a summit meeting in an attempt to coordinate inquiries into the unprecedented level of animal-activist activity in Scotland.

Their refusal to attribute the attacks to ALF, perhaps in an attempt to deny the organisation the status and publicity it seeks, runs counter to the adamant assertion by Webb that ALF is, indeed, responsible.

Webb, aged 46, who describes himself as an animal welfare consultant, maintains that he has never participated in any of ALF's direct-action attacks.

"I never take part. I would be very foolish to do so. If I were to be involved, then with the high profile that I have I assume I would be very quickly caught and imprisoned and not able to do the job that I do just now."

He said he had discussed his status with colleagues and the "general consensus" was that he was of more use to the organisation as a public figurehead than as a firebomb or arsonist.

The Animal Liberation Front itself does not exist as a properly constituted organisation. Its public face is the ALF Supporters' Group, although such a differentiation may, in real terms, be spurious. ALF-SG has a regular newsletter which is sent out to members (of which it is claimed there are over 2000 with 10%

"We have no money. Activists fund their own actions. The Supporters' Group PO box is used as a point of contact for people who wish to send donations for defence costs and to help prisoners' friends and relatives meet travel costs and so on," says Webb.

Webb says that the three "policies" within which ALF extremists operate are the liberation of animals from suffering, the implementation of economic sabotage of the type currently being carried out in Scotland and the cardinal rule that attacks must not endanger life.

In spite of the very public profile that ALF maintains through Webb, it is viewed very much as a terror organisation by police, security experts and its victims.

Smith, Principal of Edinburgh University, said that the fire at the university's Centre for Tropical Veterinary Medicine had caused damage estimated at more than £200,000.

He maintained that the animal experiments said by ALF to have been carried out on the premises did not take place. The attack, he said, had been a "hoax in form of terrorism".

"The majority of people concerned about work with animals utterly reject terrorism — and it is terrorism," he said.

But Webb is unmoved by condemnation of his organisation's activities. He is an unashamed apologist and polemicist for the Front's attacks.

"Arson has been used as a weapon by ALF since 1976 and no-one has ever been harmed. Before any action is undertaken the area is put under surveillance for a considerable length of time to see when shift-workers leave and where the security people will be and that there is no wildlife being endangered or birds nesting.

check will have been made to ensure that there is nobody on the premises and so far as the fire services are concerned they have their own instructions that they must not place themselves in danger where life is not threatened," says Webb.

ALF's high-minded defence of its activities, however, does not take account of a bombing incident last June when an explosive device was placed under the car of Dr Max Headley, an animal researcher at Bristol University. It exploded and severely injured a 13-month-old child who was passing in his pushchair at the time. The Animal Liberation Front claimed responsibility for the attack.

In its original, 1970s, non-militant guise ALF was known as the Band of Mercy. Its transformation into a fully-fledged terror organisation was celebrated with the publication of its Into the Nineties with the ALF manual. Its final, chilling message to activists was: "What are you waiting for? Get into the bastards." The metamorphosis was complete.

Blaze terror at leather plant

THE Animal Liberation Front are suspected of being behind a fire which ripped through a leather factory today.

Fifty firefighters tackled the blaze which broke out before 5am at the Edinburgh tannery.

Robin Webb, a spokesman for the ALF, admitted the premises fitted their criteria for attack.

And he warned: "There could be more to come."

Central Scotland Police are investigating a similar incident at a Falkirk meat processing plant on Saturday.

"I am fairly confident again both these attacks would be ALF actions," said Mr Webb.

"It seems to indicate a fairly active ALF cell in the area."

But Detective Superintendent Norman Henderson said police did not know who was responsible.

"It is speculation at this time but we are keeping an open mind to all avenues."

"This type of criminal is very dangerous. Members of the public should be very careful and keep an eye out for strangers around their property."

Police said this morning's fire had been started deliberately. CID and fire investigators were combing the site for clues.

Fire ripped through the first floor of the two-storey building at J Hewit and Sons Ltd, 370 Lanark Road West, at about 4.45am. It took more than two hours to bring it under control.

Initially, there was a possibility of the blaze spreading to the main five-

Assistant divisional officer Derek Brannan, of Lothian and Borders Fire Brigade, added: "We are treating the fire as suspicious. Investigations are still being carried out."

Hewit managing director George Barlee said: "I am sickened by this incident — it is just an unnecessary mess."

He said he had not been warned of any possible attack by the ALF and had not believed he would be targeted.

John Robins, of Animal Concern Scotland, condemned the attack and said: "It is my plea for the campaign to stop. If these people have energy to expend they could do it in more profitable and useful ways."

He added: "Lives are in danger. If you set fire to anything lives are at risk. We would not condone this at all."

Today's fire follows a series of blazes at animal research or product centres including an Edinburgh University tropical disease research unit near Roslin and a Linlithgow abattoir.

Extremists free battery hens in raid

By Neil Morris

AN Animal Liberation raid to free 47 battery chickens from a farm may be the start of a Christmas campaign by extremists.

An Animal Liberation Front spokesman said autonomous cells operating throughout the West were likely to be planning more raids on poultry farms in the run-up to Christmas.

Yesterday a poultry farm in Yatton, near Bristol, was attacked and 47 hens taken as well as property damaged.

Around 100 eggs were damaged in the raid on the battery houses containing around 64,000 hens.

A police spokesman said: "We are investigating what happened and keeping an open mind at this time as to who the culprits could be."

Animal experts last night warned that the battery-reared hens would be likely to die if left out for any length of time.

An ALF spokesman said only the number of hens had been taken that could be cared for by its supporters.

"The hens will now be taken to caring permanent homes, allowed to adapt to the outdoors and live a full life.

"I would imagine that in the period leading up to Christmas a number of cells will try to highlight the poultry trade."

£50,000 animal lib fire

THE Animal Liberation Front yesterday admitted setting fire to two lorries packed with frozen meat in Reading, Berkshire, causing £50,000 damage, and taking 400 hens from a farm near Stoke-on-Trent, Staffordshire. The group said the attacks were part of its campaign against the food industry.

Meat fire

RSPCA worker and Animal Liberation Front spokesman Robin Webb admitted that animal activists set fire to two lorries packed with frozen meat in Reading, Berkshire causing £50,000 damage.

On Thursday, September 12, local news was dominated by another series of attacks on businesses by the Animal Liberation Front.

In all, eight Bangor businesses, including Boots and leather shop and several butchers, suffered broken windows graffiti or both.

The nature of the attacks led to some speculation that they might have been the work of a copycat group.

ANIMAL GROUP HITS BUTCHERS

ALF admit raid on varsity labs

THE Animal Liberation Front has admitted breaking into an Oxford University department and snatching lecture notes and invoices.

Members of the group broke into the department of physiology in South Parks Road over the weekend.

They got in by removing panes of glass from a partly-open window.

The documents were discovered missing on Sunday afternoon.

An anonymous ALF member said the papers had been taken as a peaceful protest against experimenting on animals.

A spokesperson for the University said: "We use animals as little as possible but we do use them for training of medical students and the forwarding of medical research.

"The university would never do an experiment using animals if it was not justified."

Det Sgt David Parle, of Oxford CID, said: "The papers are not believed to contain anything of a sensitive nature."

by Gayle Sweet

POLICE are hunting animal rights activists who claimed responsibility for three attacks on Harborough butchers shops, in an anonymous 'phone call to The Mail.

The woman, who phoned on Monday lunchtime just hours after the early-morning attacks, said: "The three attacks on butchers were not a minor act of violence."

"They were an organised statement on behalf of the Animal Liberation Front."

Bricks were thrown through the windows of the shops around 3am on Monday. Hobbs' Butchers in Coventry Road, J S Bates and Sons on Church Square and Dewhurst in the High Street.

Mr David Hobbs, owner of the Coventry Road shop which suffered the attack at a cost of about £400, said it was the second he had had in a year.

"I'm convinced it's the animal rights people, although I don't think they are local."

"It's the same people that sabotage the hunts. It's nothing I can't put right but it's a menace we have to look at."

"It's all to do with people's freedom of choice. If they want to be vegetarian good luck to them, but people should be able to make their own choice."

A spokesman for Bates' butchers, who did not want to be named, said the damage would cost around £1,000, but would not comment on the Animal Liberation Front.

Inspector Ivan Moody of Harborough police said the crime would be dealt with the same as any other crime.

"It's still a crime whether it's committed by activists or not and it will be dealt with the same as any other."

"If we can get the persons responsible, they will be dealt with in the appropriate manner."

RSPCA expulsion

ANIMAL Liberation Front Press officer Robin Webb has been expelled from the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals "for action prejudicial to the interests of the society," Mr Webb said he was considering seeking a judicial review of the move in the High Court.

Hens 'freed' in Animal Lib farm raid

Hundreds of chickens have been taken from a Staffordshire farm by raiders, believed to be Animal Liberation Front activists.

A caller to a local radio station said the birds had been taken away from "squalid and cramped conditions".

Police today confirmed they were investigating damage to hen coops and the theft of poultry from Beechcliffe

Poultry Farm, Beech, near Stone, early yesterday.

Someone claiming to be an Animal Liberation Front spokesman telephoned Radio Stoke.

The caller said more than 400 hens had been freed and taken to a better life, and it was hoped the raid would put the farmer out of business.

The spokesman said an independent cell of the front carried out the raid, releasing the hens from a battery unit.

"All of the hens have gone to homes where they will live out the rest of their lives in conditions far removed from the squalid, cramped and excrement-covered sheds in which they were found," he said.

Staff at the farm have refused to comment.

The ALF raid is the latest in a series in Staffordshire in recent years.

Hundreds of mink were released from a farm at Bednall, near Stafford, about five years ago.

The Compassionate Vegetarian?

by David Lane

I can accept that someone might decide to become a lacto-vegetarian solely for reasons of health. Numerous studies and a great wealth of statistical evidence exists to back-up such a position. I can also sympathise with someone who, by degrees, becomes vegetarian for compassionate reasons. People who take this position regard their abstention from eating flesh as a step in the right direction, and by implication as something less than completely freeing themselves from being a direct cause of animal suffering.

What I cannot accept though, is that someone who claims to be a lacto-vegetarian for compassionate reasons, can be content to remain so. I do not see that it is possible to have knowledge about the dairy and egg industries, and then to think about the issues involved, then to come to the conclusion that to support either is consistent with a compassionate lifestyle. But I will not rely on rhetoric to make my case. Using only basic facts and simple logic I will show that compassionate lacto-vegetarianism is a contradiction in terms!

First some facts about dairy farming. It is a constant source of amazement to me how many people believe that a cow naturally produces an endless stream of milk, and that it is actually a kindness to relieve her of it - otherwise her udder would explode! And of course it would be a shame to waste this almost miraculously nourishing food! But it is for someone else to discuss the value of milk as a food, I want to deal with the process of producing it.

A dairy cow has a natural life expectancy of about twenty years. Those who are not used for veal and who make it to the dairy herd are killed at between four and six years, when poor health or declining yield make her no longer profitable as a food production unit. In order that she produces milk during her short life, she will be inseminated several times and produce probably four or five calves. She will be pregnant for most of her life. It is a myth that cows have one calf then continue to produce milk indefinitely.

Time for some logic. One cow produces say, four calves. Males are largely unnecessary, and in any case only one calf is required to maintain the dairy herd's size. Three of the four calves are killed at a few weeks for veal, or after several months for beef. There is no escape. No pushing the unpleasant facts aside. If you want milk, then someone will eat cattle.

Let's take the compassionate lacto-vegetarian's aim to its logical conclusion - a Britain where no-one eats meat, but where dairy foods are in demand. We have to export all our unwanted calves to countries where...? Silly, isn't it? And I haven't even mentioned selective breeding and drug treatment which produces cows with udders so huge they can barely walk. Compassion? I don't think so.

And it's no good talking about the solution being humane slaughter, banning live exports, or generally trying to get people to be nicer to cows! The compassionate lacto-vegetarian has already rejected killing animals in order to satisfy dietary desire.

Now let's look at eggs. Not surprisingly the situation is pretty much the same as for the dairy industry. Birds live only as long as they are productive, whether battery or free-range. When they are past their best, they are killed and used for foods which the lacto-vegetarian wouldn't touch, like chicken soup or chicken pie. I suppose he or she might be willing to pay more for their eggs so that the hens could be sent to rest homes in the country when their working days are done; would that ease the conscience?

And what about the male chicks?

Everyone seems to forget them. No matter how marvellous the free-range existence planned for the girl chicks, if you're a boy chick you won't even get to day two, unless you're headed for the broiler sheds! Can a system which kills half the population for being the wrong sex, and kills the other half when productivity (ie profitability) falls, be compatible with a compassionate lifestyle? And I haven't even mentioned battery farming.

Perhaps the "compassionate lacto-vegetarian" might like to compare him or herself to the "considerate neighbours", who keep their garden neat and tidy by tipping all their rubbish over the fence! Please, if you want to see a world in which animals are not used and abused for human ends, don't stop at vegetarianism, keep moving along...

(David sent his article to The Vegetarian Magazine first, but had no response. We wonder why?)

A Letter from America

by Lee Hall

It seems to me that the animal rights movement in Britain may be clarified, in one perspective, by the influence and inspiration offered to those of us in the United States. No attempt shall be made here to catalogue the various groups, demonstrations, or activities which are evolving here; rather the mood and sense of the times in the United States will be explored.

That's Entertainment

Of course, the United States is a country that loves amusement. Circuses, dolphinariums, dog shows, county fairs, and even such things as alligator wrestling and crab racing appeal to the various interests of the weekend entertainment seeker. Furthermore, adults believe their children will derive educational benefit from seeing a white tiger in a cage or a killer whale in a pool. County fairs cater for children, who all want to raise the biggest pig or sheep. The reward for the winner is empty, however; the animal is bought by a grateful adult for slaughter. It is a strange process wherein a child learns to love a being, then betray it.

Most people would not tolerate this lack of feeling when it comes to their cat or dog. Yet dog racing continues to be popular in this country, especially in the southern states. Since people in Britain are familiar with this activity, the use of steroids, rabbits as "bait", and the throwaway treatment of greyhounds after their useful career ends are not factors that require discussion here.

Even people who "love" dogs indulge in the strangest behaviour. Dogs are mutilated so they can win prizes in shows. They are battered in the hope they might become good protectors. Their vocal cords are cut if the neighbour in the next unit complains (yes, there are veterinarians who will agree to perform this operation). They are bred by pet shops, deprived of their parents' love, and shipped six to a box, across the country, knee-deep in their own diarrhoea. Meanwhile, innumerable puppies and kittens who already exist are "put to sleep" in animal shelters, ground up in pet food, or sent to research facilities.

The Mystique of the Horse

People in the United States also love horses. In fact, the horse is a sort of a national symbol, like the bald eagle or John Wayne. A horse appeals to the adventurous nature we'd all like to portray. Of the domestic animals, the horse alone kicks, bites, rears, shows the strength to do the opposite of what is desired of it, and often gets away with it all. It may be assumed the horse is not altogether domesticated, and is cherished alternately for its docile nature and its rebellious tendencies.

Wild horses do exist in the U.S., although they are ever endangered. As some kind of distorted attempt to recreate the environment of the wilderness, many sportsmen (and a few sportswomen) have been drawn to western-style rodeos. Although these events can be found throughout the United States, they are most popular in the desert southwest, and semi-tropical Florida, where they are held, typically, in the hottest months of the year. To make sure the bulls and "broncos" are wild enough to please the crowd, artifices like burred groin cinches and electric prods are commonly used. High-speed calf-roping is also part of the event. Injuries, disablement, and pain-killers are common; veterinarians are scarce. When the long day is over, the animals are confined until the next show.

But many people, particularly in the northern states and throughout New England (the northeastern states), have a far more civilized view of horseback riding. Foxhunts regularly occur in certain sophisticated circles. People who "ride English", as opposed to those who have never learned to canter or post, are known for their kindness to animals. Yet somehow their horses seem even further removed from their birthright, their natural state of independence, than western horses. Perhaps a truly powerful hunt sabotage group will appear as the next British influence!

More Hunting

Hunting is a way of life (outmoded, but still a way of life!) in the United States. It is a popular activity throughout North America. It is said to have historical value, and is considered educational for (generally male) children. Complicating this issue is the fact that hunting is tied in with "natural rights" in the psyche of this country. The Right to Bear Arms was an emotional slogan during the eighteenth century, during and around the time of the revolution for independence. That legacy was written into our Constitution and rears its head in many ways today, from nuclear weaponry issues to the backwoods. The lobbying power of the National Rifle Association (NRA) is a consequence of this value system. George Bush happens to be a member of this group, which has strong political influence. Group members espouse such concepts as hunting deer with semi-automatic weapons.

For those who prefer a more old-fashioned approach, we have bowhunting. This cervine nightmare is promoted by people such as rock star Ted Nugent, who has a video out on the "sport", and is associated with such phrases as "whack 'em and stack 'em". If the reader is not familiar with Mr Nugent, let it suffice to say that he has been quite influential with pre-teen and teenage rock and rollers.

The Skin Game

Wearing the skins of animals is also a tradition. Biker groups would be gauche if they showed up at the local bar in cotton jackets, and high society demands furs, leather slacks, ostrich purses, and alligator shoes. Fortunately the glamour of all this, for the rich anyway, is being subtly and openly challenged, usually in the form of disapproving looks from the expanding population of environmentalists. It is still big business, nonetheless.

It is good that the leather issue is coming to the forefront in Britain. I'm afraid that we have not made a public issue of leather or wool in the U.S. yet. I would say that is because some forms of animal abuse are more easily recognised by people, and we are going for the easier successes first.

This is natural, but the leather and wool issues are going to need to be addressed sooner or later, and we are ready to hear your thoughts on these subjects.

By-products of Cruelty

Far more insidious is the use of animal-derived substances in nearly every salable product from shampoo to defrosting fluid. Beauty Without Cruelty products have been introduced into the United States, and we do have some North American companies now which eschew animal testing. Unfortunately, the majority of companies refusing to participate in animal testing (eg. Revlon, Freeman) do use urea, lanolin, etc. in many of their products, so we must always read the labels (one good thing: all products sold in the U.S. must be labelled in specific detail).

What's for Dinner?

The people of Britain introduced the term "vegan" to the United States. It is a new term for us, and one not commonly understood. Although our families know what it symbolises, the staff in restaurants normally do not. We do not find eating establishments with the vegan "V" in the window. We have Tandoori houses, but no Bhel Phoori places. Hindus are relatively rare here, as are vegetarian Buddhists. In the land of steak houses and Ronald McDonald, we are anomalies.

Vegetarianism is understood, and since its practitioners are nearly always health-conscious or Californians, they are tolerated. Remember that smoking is not permitted on our domestic air flights, on any public transport, in most of our airports and public areas (even some restaurants)... our bottled beer carries warnings from the Surgeon General about damage to the fetus... people in jogging suits are clogging city streets... So health reasons, as an excuse for vegetarian habits, are somewhat acceptable. On the other hand, those public service announcements you see on television telling you to "Eat meat" were probably made with inspiration from our own commercial messages ("Beef - Real food for real people", "Milk - It does a Body good", etc., etc.). Methinks the American Dairy Council doth protest too much!

Curiosity Kills the Cat

Animals in experimentation and research have just recently been a concern, and I think this is very much due to the British influence. PETA (People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals) was founded after the success of forces like BUAV, and is chaired by two people, one of British origin, the other a North American. The impetus behind PETA's successes is the Silver Spring monkey case. Twenty years ago, I doubt any attention would have been paid to these monkeys. But little by little our consciousness is being raised. As we live in a large country, it may take a great deal of time before our concerns permeate our social environment.

The Importance of being Public

Music and film stars who have interests in animal welfare are a great help, because they can reach broad populations at once. At first, the importance of animals' lives was an issue for the RSPCA and, more recently, the SPCA in the U.S. Then we began to hear gentle but clear messages from popular figures like Howard Jones. At this time, quite a few public figures are suddenly ready to discuss animal welfare, from mayoral hopefuls (Dave Clark of Washington DC) to sports coaches (Tony La Russa of the Oakland Athletics). Actors River Phoenix, Rue McClanahan, Elvira, Elizabeth Taylor, Ted Danson of "Cheers", El Vez, the Mexican Elvis impersonator, and many others have been heard making public statements in support of animal rights. Musical stars, such as members of the group "Boston", have written animal rights messages on their album covers. And that's not all. Members of the physicians' population (eg. Dr Neal Barnard of Physicians' Committee for Responsible Medicine) are speaking out regarding many ethical issues too long in the closet, including animal abuse in research and the health benefits of avoiding meat and dairy products.

Books and films which have inspired us include Peter Singer's "Animal Liberation" and "The Animals Film". However, they are not seen here as frequently as they are in Britain.

We do hold demonstrations and marches. They are surprisingly large. I say surprisingly, because the police and media always under-report the crowd sizes by thousands. On the other hand, actions by groups like the ALF are rare, and usually limited to areas in the state of California. Not surprisingly, the ALF is listed as a terrorist group by our government.

In the United States, especially in non-urban areas, we hope for changes that many in British cities take for granted. But things are changing, and we credit our British colleagues for much of the inspiration behind this.

To Censor or Not to Censor

by Jim Hepburn

In your last issue you had one article praising your no-censorship policy and another article saying that it merely gave "a platform to fascists". The author of the second article went on to attack Simon Russell's view that the fascists would "damn themselves with their own pens". I have to agree with both views, but I'll agree with the second one first. Fascists have been conning people with their lies and bigotry for a long time, and why should Simon Russell think that suddenly in the pages of Arkangel they should inevitably be seen to be ridiculous (to put it politely)?

But what is the alternative? A nice cosy magazine where you publish only what you agree with? Dead-boring, I should think, and susceptible to the fascism of right-mindedness - being so sure you know the truth that you can't tolerate anyone else's opinions.

There are always problems with no-censorship. You can lose readers, you can be overwhelmed by your enemies, you can lose truth amid lies, you may even end up being less sure what the truth is than you used to be - less sure of your righteousness. Liberty is always risky. But who wants the fascist world where you don't give your enemies a chance to speak? I take Simon Russell's words about the fascists damning themselves to mean that he would rather risk the open fight that liberty requires than turn Arkangel into a magazine of one opinion.

My Guardian this morning has a half-page article in it by Norman Tebbit. Well, what do I want in my daily paper? Think of all the happy, unperplexed people reading the Torygraph, knowing that every word in it is true.

ALF Criticised

by Suzie Barnes

There has been a lot of criticism and condemnation of the ALF recently because of adverse publicity. I have to say that I think it is wrong of people within the Animal Rights Movement to condemn the actions of people who are deeply committed to the cause of the Movement and to ending animal abuse.

Surely we are all working towards the same end regardless of what methods we use, and we should all be in this together. I think that all pressure groups need a section of people within that group who use direct action and, where needed, some forceful action, to show the government/public that we really do mean business and that we really do have a strong case against cruelty to animals.

In my opinion the ALF have not put back our efforts, as some people claim, but in fact have brought the matter out into the open far more quickly than passive campaigning. Campaigning and lobbying of MPs and getting new legislation enforced is also very important, of course, but sometimes direct action can also be effective and the ALF do not willingly threaten human life whilst carrying out their actions. Their motives are only to put an end to violence by other human beings - don't forget that bloodsports, vivisection, the slaughter of animals for meat are all violent actions - tortures deliberately inflicted on animals.

"If you make peaceful reform impossible - you make violence inevitable". J F Kennedy.

Please be a bit more positive and united out there!

Animal Rights

I have been moved to write to Arkangel about my thoughts on Animal Rights, and in so doing, hope to go some way to explaining to the media the feelings and reasons for the actions sometimes taken by Animal Liberation Groups, and hope you will allow me space to do so.

Mrs V. A. Vince

monthly, yearly across continents in extreme discomfort; without food, water, rest, and/or without veterinary attention in order to subject them to a mental and physical holocaust of inhumane proportions in overseas slaughterhouses. Just the tip of the iceberg!

When animal welfarists witness vulnerable animals being mistreated, they can be overcome with what can only be described as an involuntary rising tide of compassion, revulsion, and anger, and an overwhelming desire to liberate the persecuted from the perpetrator/s. No less than one would wish to liberate a helpless human animal, such as a child, from its persecutors.

Occasionally, physical violence breaks out, when in the eyes of "Joe Public", the welfarists tarnish the Cause, along with their image. It is a great pity.

Were the law adequate, AND enforced, in dealing with the perpetrators, many ordinary law-abiding people would not feel the necessity, rightly or wrongly, to take the law into their own hands in an attempt to see justice done! This also goes for offences unrelated to animal welfare.

The answer lies in the media and "Joe Public" bringing pressure to bear upon those who have been officially appointed guardian "Arkangels" for animal welfare, who must be ever vigilant to animal abuse and who are determined to see abusers brought to justice via the courts. It is also up to "Joe Public" to bring pressure to bear upon governments to act upon and to implement rapidly improved welfare codes and recommendations brought to their notice by animal welfarists. It is up to "Joe Public" to bring pressure to bear upon our church leaders, requiring them to speak up and to speak out in support of animals on welfare grounds. Lastly, "Joe Public" must bring pressure to bear upon the judicial system to impose harsh sentences upon offenders found guilty of animal abuse, to act as a deterrent to future abuse of animals, and at the same time, lessening the possibility of new prosecution cases coming to court for trial.

In passing judgement, one questions whether it is necessary, humane or ethical for sentient animals to be experimented on in order to provide cosmetic products with which to vainly adorn ourselves! Likewise, is it necessary, humane or ethical to intensively farm or trap sentient animals for their fur or skins to vainly adorn ourselves! Is it necessary, humane or ethical to "truck" thousands upon thousands of sentient livestock daily, weekly,

When one feels powerless to halt such atrocities that are known to take place, the one "crumb of comfort" comes from knowing that however painful and traumatic the lead-up to death and in death itself is; with death comes peace, and is in itself, a blessing. A blessing from death, and a blessing from life, where many had been denied even the 'right' to express themselves in the natural manner born to them. Bodily, mentally, physically. This was not meant to be. The sooner livestock animals at present classed as "agricultural products" under the Treaty of Rome are re-classed as "sentient", the better. Public pressure on our EC agricultural partners must be paramount and intensified if we are to realise this aim. Another aim must be to eventually persuade governments and the farming communities that the most humane way to treat and to slaughter animals, is for the animals to be killed nearest to the point of production as possible, doing away altogether with lengthy transportation, and exports and imports of all live food animals.

What right has man to exercise his dominion over animals in the way that he has chosen to do? God "made man in His image" so it is said. God is an all-loving, all-caring Father to all things. Just as the following prayer of Saint Basil, from 'A Vigil for Justice and Peace' suggests;

"The Earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof. Oh God belaye within us the sense of fellowship with all living things; our brothers the animals to whom Thou gavest the Earth as their home in common with us".

"We remember with shame that in the past we have exercised the high dominion of man with ruthless cruelty, so that the voice of the Earth, which should have gone up to Thee in song, has been a groan of travail".

"May we realise that they they live, not for us alone, but for themselves and for Thee, and that they love the sweetness of life".

There are people who, cruel though they are to some creature animals, have adoring, adored domestic pets that they treat kindly. Most, if not all, would be truly horrified and upset if their beloved pet was to suffer the mental and physical traumas and indignities that sentient livestock who are kept for commercial gain experience! Many throughout their entire lives. Yet livestock, yes livestock, given time and understanding, can and would become as equally loving and loyal as pets known to domesticity!

If only they who condemn others who seek to liberate the persecuted from man the perpetrator would apply these innermost deeply heart-felt feelings to themselves, then they might understand, just a little, the frustration, concerns and motives of animal welfarists who feel obliged to 'take the law into their own hands'.

In an ideal world, the population might become vegetarian or vegan. Animals such as cows could then be kept for their milk alone; sheep for their fleece, pigs and horses for their dung; chickens, ducks and geese for their eggs, and so on. To be put down humanely on site, not on mass, when their days of useful and natural productivity come to an end. Other animals with no apparent use in the commercial sense, would have no need whatsoever to justify their Earthly existence other than to add variety and interest to life.

However, we do not live in an ideal world, and in the meantime woe betide an animal who is born into this world deemed to be of commercial value!

It would do none of us any harm to mull over in our minds the following by Albert Schweitzer; "Until he extends the circle of his compassion to all living things, man will not himself find peace". And from Jack Richards, in the Quaker Green Concern newsletter; "The stark truth demands that we renounce greed, selfishness, envy, wastefulness, and moral dishonesty, and openly declare a New Testimony of Honourable Lifestyle... A testimony of everyday morality really would be a gobstopper. It would mean, among much else, positively renouncing the arrogant assumption that everything in creation exists for human benefit; the gross fatuousness of claiming to 'own' parts of the planet's surface, the amassing of possessions, the puffed-up pride and vanity of our sureness that a baby is a greater miracle than a new-born gorilla or a kitten. We have to love not only one another but the whole of nature..."

Animal welfarists up and down the country and further afield, want only one thing. A deterrent to animal abuse through the courts. Allowing us to get on with our own lives, which after all should be joyful, not sorrowful, much as the lives should be of those with whom we share this planet, the animals, to whom God "gavest the Earth as their home in common with us, and who love the sweetness of life".

"Man is destined to die once, and after that to face judgement". Hebrews 9:27.

Thank you for listening, and please do try to understand.

Why do you hurt us
With needles and knives
Inject us with poisons
And record our sad lives
Mutilate our beauty
To better your own
While the abscess with pus
Inside us has grown

Blind me in one eye
Rot out my teeth
Implant me with cancer
You don't feel my grief
Slice me and stitch me
You don't feel the pain
For this reason only
You'll do it again

Our lives mean nothing to you
But your vanity is less
Your decorated faces
Are distorted truths of mess
You live a life of comfort
At the cost of dying friends
All our days of torture
Paid for in your spends

Science is so amazing
Yet it takes an animal
To test out the reaction
Of some harmful chemical
Is there no computer
That will tell us just the same
Instead of pain and slaughter
Why make the walking lame

Exhausted fox keeps running
Somewhere to rest and hide
A man on horseback gallops
Twenty dogs run at his side
They'll chase until it's over
The hounds want blood to taste
The ripped and chewed up carcass
Is left to rot and waste

Won't return home tonight
His mate and children waiting
Hope everything's all right
Tomorrow they'll go searching
He could be trapped or hurt

The surface of this evil
I'll do more than skim

This cruelty is so sickening
The barbarism must end
Animals' lives are worthy
Respect them as a friend
Everyone do something
Protect their innocence
Stop these heartless killings

Song for the Animals

by D L Kay

(To be sung to the tune of "The Church's One Foundation". Mrs Kay would like it promoted as a sort of Animal Rights anthem)

*O let us now defend them
With every breath we take.
O let us now defend them
A better world to make.
They have the right to live here
The same as you and I.
So let us now defend them
Or God will ask you why.*

*O let us now protect them
From those who do not care.
O let us now protect them
The Fox, the rat, the hare.
They have the right to live here
The same as you and me.
So let us now protect them
To live a life that's free.*

*O let us now release them
From lab and hunt and cage.
O let us now release them
From this barbaric age.
They have the right to live here
A right we will defend.
So make men now release them
And let the suffering end.*

Non-Violence and Animal Liberation

by Anon

It seems to me that the struggles for animal liberation and for anarchist social revolution are inextricably connected, but that there exists a more fundamental struggle which embraces and extends beyond these mutually-dependent movements. This more fundamental struggle attempts to dig up the very roots of exploitation rather than merely knocking off the bad fruit, and both its means and its ends are summed up in one word: nonviolence.

Neither the struggle for anarchy nor that for animal liberation are necessarily nonviolent in nature (although, I would argue, they ought to be), and it seems that increasingly, where nonviolence is adopted it is more likely to be as a practical tactic than as a fundamental creed or guiding principle.

While the Animal Liberation Front has a policy that no action should cause harm to life, human or nonhuman, there are certainly people within the movement who privately express the theoretical utility of, for example, assassinating vivisectionists by means of firearms; and although physical violence is usually frowned upon, except where used in self-defence, violence and hatred run riot in the minds of many vegans. Such mental violence can be regularly witnessed on demonstrations, hunt sabs, and in some animal liberation literature. Examples include the use of the word "scum" to refer to those who exploit animals and the burning of effigies of vivisectionists, etc.; this may appear harmless enough, but the philosophy behind such actions is essentially false because it involves a distorted emphasis upon the perpetrators of evil rather than the evil itself. It is also a kind of behaviour which seeks personal exemption from any particle of blame.

If we, as a movement, are to develop an insightful conception of the capitalist system and how it operates we must learn to identify the crucial importance of hierarchical power-relations in our society. Although it is clearly the case that exploitation of animals and the environment lies at the very heart of the capitalist system, to take this fact and then reduce it to an ideological antagonism between animal liberationists and animal exploiters is to drastically oversimplify the complex nature of power.

A similar reductionism is evident in ideologies such as Marxism and radical feminism, the former positing a conflict between bourgeoisie and proletariat, while the latter suggests a dichotomy of interest between men and women resulting in patriarchy. Both frameworks of analysis can provide useful angles from which to address certain social injustices, but meanwhile one ought to keep in mind the notion that, in reality there is no sharp, concrete division between ruling class and working class, or between men per se and women per se; rather it would be more accurate to see society as a complex web of power-relations, with the primary protagonist of power being a certain politico-economic / cultural "system" as opposed to any definite set of individuals.

If we are true to ourselves we will admit that no-one is completely devoid of responsibility for the way our society is constructed. We are all very much part of the system, and we all play an active role, to a greater or lesser extent, in perpetuating that system and the cycle of exploitation which goes along with it. We can, of course, try to extricate ourselves from that cycle by evolving a more compassionate way of living but, while we remain part of life and part of society, we inevitably contribute to suffering. Although it is important to recognize this fact it is equally important not to recoil in pessimistic despair. The point is, as Gandhi said, to realize that while "Life itself involves some kind of violence... we have to choose the path of least violence".

It is commonly acknowledged within the animal liberation movement that it would be hypocritical for someone to condemn others for exploiting animals while still continuing to contribute to that exploitation. So, for example, if a person is eating animal products or wearing leather while trying to sabotage a hunt it may be pointed out to them that there is a direct contradiction in trying to save the life of one type of animal while indulging in the products of animal murder. In my experience, such a suggestion normally takes the form of friendly encouragement, which results in the person giving genuine consideration to the contradiction; whereas if he or she were subjected to ridicule or abuse a mental barrier would immediately be erected which can cause hostility and disillusionment. A similar situation arises when someone in an animal liberation group expresses sexist, racist or homophobic views. It is (or ought to be) pointed out that, if one objects to exploitation on the grounds of species, why perpetuate prejudice on grounds of sex, ethnicity or sexuality?

Obviously each case is different, but I would hope that the rule of friendly persuasion rather than damning ridicule applies fairly universally as the most effective approach. The problem, I feel, is that this principle is not extended far enough.

It is always wise to maintain a degree of humility and to remember that the vast majority of us ate meat, drank milk and wore leather, etc. at some time in the past. Vegans are rarely born - they evolve. So just as there was a spark in us which led to our developing a more compassionate way of living, there could also be that potential in everyone. There are no truly evil people, only people who haven't yet found the path to enlightenment - probably because they've been significantly corrupted by power. It is a very pessimistic person who labels certain people "meat-eaters", "vivisectionists", "blood-junkies", etc. and refuses to recognize the potential for change. To demonize someone and regard them as "scum" is to radically degrade one's own moral position by implying the impossibility of such "scum" ever ascending to your level. A more ethical and efficacious position to adopt would be to acknowledge our own imperfections, and the extent to which we can improve our own way of living, while also recognizing the potential for change in others.

To regard someone as "scum" is to dehumanize them, and this is the same tactic as governments employ when they wish to inspire support for a genocidal war-effort. Immediately prior to the Gulf War, Saddam Hussein, as a symbol of the Iraqi state, was demonized in the British media and denigrated as a "pig", "monster", etc. It is necessary for the state to resort to dehumanization in order to gain popular consent for their blatant abuses of power. In other words, dehumanization is a prerequisite for violence.

Although, for obvious reasons, animal liberationists tend to replace speciesist terms of abuse such as "pig" or "mad dog" with the somewhat meaningless word "scum", the effect is the same: the target person becomes dehumanized in the verbal abuser's mind so that we can regard them as inferior to ourselves. They become our "enemy" and therefore something to be destroyed rather than changed.

Verbal abuse is mental pollution, mental hatred, mental violence. It diverts attention from the real "enemy", which does not consist of actual individuals, whether human or nonhuman; and it is ultimately counter-productive, for, as the Italian anarchist Luigi Fabbri has said, "the poorer the argument the more abusive the language".

A temporary release of frustration may be achieved by shouting "scum" at, say, a foxhunter, but the hatred which inspired that outburst will not be defused and the illusory antagonism between individuals will be reinforced.

I hold that the primal struggle underlying all liberation struggles is one against power and domination and ultimately against violence. Thus if we are realistic in our aims for achieving animal liberation, we must set ourselves the task of eliminating violence in all its forms - mental and physical.

By violence I mean any action which is carried out with the conscious intention of causing harm (physical or mental) to a living creature. If, however, the intention is good - e.g., the liberation of animals, the sabotage of property used to exploit animals, or the alleviation of suffering via euthanasia - then the action is essentially nonviolent. Causing accidental injury or death (e.g., unintentionally treading on an insect) also falls into this category, as does self-defence without retribution.

In practice, nonviolence means always questioning the motive behind one's actions. If, for example, one decides to break the windows of shops which are involved in the exploitation and murder of animals (butchers, hamburger bars, Boots the Chemist, book-makers, etc.), then one should be clear that the intention is not to cause mental distress to the owners of those shops, or the people who work in them, but to help animals by making their exploitation far less profitable. In other words, the act of catapulting a butcher's window is not a vindictive act of revenge against the individual butcher, but an act of profound respect and solidarity for the animals who are suffering and those who will potentially suffer as a result of that butcher's shop remaining profitable.

This article was written by a (male) anarcho-pacifist / animal liberationist in December 1991. Any correspondence can be sent to him care of the following address: Polemic, c/o 70 High Street, Leicester, LE1 5YP.

Distress will inevitably be caused to the butcher, but this is a secondary factor and not the intention of the action. The ball-bearing is fired with love, not hatred. Similarly, destroying meat-lorries by fire has nothing to do with a personal grievance against the owners or drivers of those lorries, but is an act designed to damage the profitability of the meat industry.

In short, economic sabotage is nonviolent direct action, but only when it remains non-personal. We are not fighting against people, but against entrenched attitudes and modes of production and exploitation, and this ought to be made as clear as possible as often as possible. Obviously, our intentions will be distorted by the media, who will continue to label us "terrorists". But how can one deny the term "terrorist" when one's intention actually was to induce fear and terror? The answer is to ensure that our intentions are always true to our aims; and the ultimate aim is the elimination of hatred and violence.

Drug-Free for the Animals

by Anon. (from the USA)

If you are reading this, you probably do not consume animal products, wear animal skins, or buy animal-tested products - or so you think. It is discouraging to see animal rights activists smoking, drinking, or doing drugs. Cigarettes, commercial beers and wines contain animal products and they are all, including drugs, tested on animals. To be completely cruelty-free, it is necessary to be straight. Here are the reasons why:

First of all, cigarettes have been, and continue to be, tested on animals in cancer research. It is no secret to us that the same tests might be repeated any number of times. It is also not just one company that tests, they all do. To stamp out animal research we must stress preventative measures; to do that, we cannot support tobacco companies. Also, in the manufacture of cigarettes, the tobacco is hung in a warehouse for a certain period. To ensure that it doesn't dry up, a substance is put on it that contains glycerin, and glycerin can come from sugar, petroleum, or animal fat.

Alcoholic beverages are likely to contain slaughterhouse by-products as well. To process beer and wine, manufacturers often use blood, egg white, and/or isinglass from fish. Alcohol is also tested on animals. Pregnant monkeys have been forced to consume huge quantities of alcohol to determine the deformities it will cause in their offspring. Baby monkeys developed deformed skulls and severe brain injuries. Baboons have been forced to consume alcohol to see if they will develop liver disease. The list of horrors goes on and on. Also, Anheisur Busch sponsors an act at Sea World; Cooks and Miller both sponsor rodeos. Any serious opponent of the abuse of animals in entertainment should at least boycott these three companies.

Drug tests go on despite the fact that rehabilitation centres are underfunded and understaffed. Clinical tests could provide more accurate, applicable results, but the federal government continues to waste money on animal tests. Dogs have their spinal cords cut and are then dosed with P.C.P. During their withdrawal they are subjected to skin burning to test their reaction to pain. Primates, cats, mice, elephants, etc. are forcibly addicted to drugs and undergo cruel, painful tests.

By using drugs, alcohol or cigarettes you are contributing to the epidemic that has caused agony to both human and non-human animals.

Intoxication is NOT rebellion. It is sublimation, debasement, and submission. Be drug-free. If not for yourself, do it for the animals.

Vegans and the Leather Issue

by David Lane

I remember someone once telling me that the animal rights movement is more concerned with class conflict than with concern for animals. He supported his accusation by pointing to our high-profile campaigns against hunting and shooting, and the wearing of fur coats while we appear to neglect angling and the wearing of leather - activities which are far more widespread, but far more affordable.

Perhaps my friend had read the following piece by Germaine Greer writing in The Independent Magazine (13/1/90), "The reasons for the animal liberationists' campaign against fur ... seem on the face of it to have very little to do with animal liberation and a lot to do with class antagonism. No attempt has been made to discredit the wearing of leather, which has increased in Britain during the Eighties, perhaps because a concerted campaign against leather would bring home to most English people just how much they had to lose if they really espoused animal rights." It is a cynical view and I don't accept that it is true for the vast majority of those who campaign for an end to animal abuse. I prefer to believe that our preoccupation with 'soft' issues has more to do with what appears to be extreme and obvious cruelty, and a natural tendency to engage in more easily won battles.

But what has any of this got to do with vegans - after all, vegans don't wear leather (okay - most of them don't!)? The answer is simple. If most vegans have chosen their way of life because they detest all forms of animal abuse it is they who "really espouse animal rights", and it is they who must bring home to people (not just the English) the obscene cruelty inherent in the production of leather, and it is they who must inform them of the very real practical alternatives which exist.

There can be no doubt that the campaign against leather will be more difficult and face more resistance than any other animal abuse issue. Leather is an incredibly versatile material, virtually everyone uses it, and it is very big business. If that's not enough, its use dates back at least 600,000 years and it has played a significant part in the development of human civilisation! But as Dave Macauley writes in The Animal's Agenda (Sept/Oct 88), "However, what has been for centuries a family trade, an art, and a means of survival for indigenous people is now a highly profitable business that depends upon the death of millions of animals each year".

The acceptability of leather, even amongst many in the animal rights movement, is probably due largely to the perpetuation of myths and ignorance surrounding its production. Of course ignorance is bliss - few meat-eaters would care to know the real history of a veal cutlet, and have you ever tried to persuade a vegetarian that there is cruelty involved in the dairy industry?

The first myth to dispose of is the "by-product" one, as in, "Whilst people continue to eat meat, it is only respectful to the animal not to waste its skin." This memorable quote is from Fiona Weightman of Lynx! Forgive me if I state the obvious when I point out that this stance also suggests a moral obligation to use the animal's blood for fertilisers and pet foods, to use its hair for brushes and to stuff furniture, and to use its horns, hooves and bones to put into everything from sweets to soap. The point is that every last part of the animal is sold and used, not out of respect for the animal or to avoid waste, but to make the whole bloody business profitable. The skin alone represents something like 10% of the animal's total value which, it seems to me, makes it pound for pound the most valuable part of the unfortunate creature. I see no difference in principle between buying a pair of leather shoes and buying a piece of steak.

The term "by-product" is misleading. It suggests something which has little consequence in itself and which is only produced incidentally in the making of something else. But, I suggest, even if everybody stopped eating meat tomorrow there would still be a huge demand for leather products, and animals would still be slaughtered in large numbers to provide them - even though the price would rise dramatically.

The second myth has to do with suffering. For many a fur coat will immediately conjure up an image of a blood-soaked baby seal or of a fox suffering in agony in a leg-hold trap; the animal is recognisable and its pain cannot be ignored. The wearer is blatantly indifferent to the suffering they cause. Maybe it's a pity that there is nothing much about a leather coat or a pair of shoes which really resembles an animal. Of course if pressed a user of leather will tell you that it comes from old cows which probably spent contented lives down on the farm. Quite apart from the fact that there is no such thing as an old cow, the leather used to make shoe uppers, jackets, gloves and wallets usually comes from very young animals - chiefly calves. The very best quality leather, the softest and most desirable leather is made from the skin of an unborn calf. Leather production is intimately bound up with the obscene cruelty of the dairy/veal industry which keeps cows in an almost constant state of pregnancy, takes calves from their mothers soon after birth, and subjects the calves to the most appalling trauma and suffering of transport and confinement just to satisfy a human desire for tender meat and soft leather. The cruelty involved in leather production can be no less severe than that involved in fur production, but the scale is vastly greater.

Although cattle hides provide the source of most leather, the skins of goats, sheep, pigs and deer are also widely used. Speciality leathers are made from alligators, lizards, sharks, snakes, crocodiles, kangaroos, ostriches, and many other species. The kind and severity of abuse and the method of killing the animals who possess these valuable skins varies according to species. In South Africa one abattoir processes 700 ostriches a day, while in many parts of the world crocodiles and alligators are caught with giant hooks or are clubbed to death with hammers. Elsewhere snakes are skinned alive.

I write this article in the hope that vegans will be better prepared to argue the case against leather from both an ethical and a factual standpoint. However, experience has shown that rights and wrongs and the explosion of myths often isn't enough. Many people, even when convinced of the truth of all of the above, refuse to accept that there is any alternative to leather - especially for their feet! The 'vegan from the ankle up' is not uncommon and generally gives two reasons for their position - lack of comfort or practicality, and environmental or ethical concerns for the alternatives.

The first objection is perhaps the hardest to overcome. In many ways it is reminiscent of the difficulties we all faced when we first decided to become vegans, it was neither comfortable nor practical. I hated soya milk, and I didn't like vegetables much either! Now I drink soya milk neat, and I love vegetables (but not sprouts!). The point is that taste is acquired and the body adapts to a change of lifestyle given time. If canvas shoes are impractical in some circumstances there are always synthetic or rubber alternatives to leather. I used to find plastic shoes unbearably sweaty, now I don't - my feet have become accustomed to them.

The second objection, concern for the environment, seems on the face it to be a valid concern. After all, we all like to do our bit for the environment! However the details can become extremely complicated. If we accept that we must wear something on our feet then we must also accept that there will be consequences for the environment. Certainly natural fibres such as cotton appear to be preferable to either leather or synthetic materials, but in any case most shoes have synthetic soles. We know about the pollution associated with plastic, but is the production of leather, a 'natural' material, pollution-free? No of course not. Tanneries not only stink, they produce some very unpleasant pollutants including lead, zinc, formaldehyde, dyes, and cyanide-based chemicals.

If all else were equal we might conclude that on environmental grounds leather shoes are marginally better than synthetic ones, although the point would be debateable. But things are not equal. They are nowhere near equal. The leather industry depends upon the deaths of hundreds of millions of animals each year, and as vegans that must be our primary concern.

The campaign against leather is probably the most challenging of all vegan / animal rights issues to address, but up until now it has been badly neglected as a campaigning issue.

Let's do something about it now!

We have all broken free from captivity! Do you see the broken bars and chains? Cruel people who think they own other living beings made us all very unhappy. They had us work for them, entertain them, feed them, look pretty and sing for them, but not because we wanted to. Our days were filled with darkness and monotony, when it was our right to feel sunlight, and live either in lush green jungles, cool fresh ponds or in loving homes.

Will you help to rid the chains from our fellows out there in the world? You can, by not going to circuses containing animals, not keeping birds in restrictive cages or fish in bowls; by not visiting uncaring zoos, eating eggs or keeping dogs if you cannot give them proper exercise. Also, remember not to buy things which children or adults were forced to make for little or no money at all. Be a voice for them. Be their Friend.

Letter from Lynx

Reproduced in full below, is the text of a letter dated 13/11/91 which was sent to a person who runs an animal rights shop from a firm of solicitors acting for Lynx. The solicitors confirmed that the letter is genuine, but said the matter is now resolved. The recipient is happy for the letter to be published, but asked us not to comment. . .

We act for Lynx (Helping Abused Animals) Limited ("Lynx").

It has come to our clients' attention that T-Shirts featuring a slogan and reproduced illustration which are our clients' copyright material are being offered for sale at the Animal Rights Shop at the above address in Liverpool and that you are the tenant of this shop. The slogan in question is "It takes up to 40 dumb animals to make a fur coat. But only one to wear it." The illustration features the lower half of a woman who is holding a fur coat which is being pulled along the ground leaving a trail of blood behind it. Lynx use the illustration and slogan on posters, promotional films and promotional literature, and the copyright of such material rests with them.

Our clients have not authorised you or any other person to copy the slogan and illustration or to reproduce them on a T-Shirt or in any way whatsoever. In so doing you are acting in clear contravention of their rights in this material.

Our clients have asked us to stress that the matters raised in this letter are extremely serious and could result in your incurring substantial liabilities to them. We would advise you to seek legal advice immediately if you are in any doubt about how to respond to our clients' claim.

In any event, our clients require you to cease forthwith from copying, advertising and supplying for sale or otherwise dealing in the T-Shirts or any other material which reproduces the slogan and illustration referred to above.

We must hear from you within 7 days of the date of this letter with the following:

- 1. Delivery up to us of all of the T-Shirts or any other material showing the slogan and illustration in your possession or control.*
- 2. Confirmation in writing signed by you that you* made the reproductions of the illustration and slogan yourself or, if you did not, the name and address of the person or persons from whom you obtained them.

- 3. A written list of the names and addresses of all persons to whom you have supplied such T-Shirts or other material together with the dates and quantities of all such supplies and copies of all invoices or other records relating to such transactions.*

- 4. Your agreement to pay such damages as may be agreed between you and our client in the light of the information disclosed by you in response to numbered paragraphs 2 and 3 above, or in default of agreement such damages as may be agreed by the court.*

- 5. Full disclosure in writing and signed by you as to when, where, how and by whom reproduction of our clients' illustration and slogan took place.*

- 6. Your agreement to pay our clients' legal costs incurred in pursuing your infringements of their rights, such costs to be taxed if not agreed.*

Should you not comply with the foregoing requirements, our clients will take proceedings against you in the High Court for your infringements of their copyright. In those proceedings they will apply for an interlocutory injunction to restrain you from dealing further in the T-Shirts or other material referred to in this letter and for all the relief set out above. Our clients will incur substantial further costs in prosecuting such proceedings and will look to you to recompense them for those costs.

We should again stress that this is an extremely serious matter and repeat that you should seek legal advice immediately if you are unsure how to proceed.

Yours faithfully . . .

BM 4400, London, WC1N 3XX

December 1991

Dear Fellow Campaigner,

I am writing to you and your group as a matter of urgency to ask for help.

You will have been aware over the past few weeks of the vastly increased media coverage gained for Animal Liberation activities. The apparent lull in ALF actions during the preceding four and a half years was merely the result of having no Press Officer as a recognised point of contact.

Previous press officers Ronnie Lee and Robin Lane, together with former Northern press officer Roger Yates, were alleged at their trials to be an integral part of the Supporters Group organisation. This caused immense problems for the SG which exists solely to assist remand or convicted activists in legal ways, eg. with defence costs, etc.

The Press office has therefore been reconstituted as an independent unit, thus protecting the SG from charges of conspiracy and/or incitement. However, this means that the Press Office has no funding.

In one day, 13th November, over £25-worth of 'phone cards were used. The mobile 'phone bill during the first few weeks was over £200. Plus travel, postage, BT telephone and other essential expenses. The amount of media coverage recently obtained surely justifies the outlay - some national societies pay tens of thousands of pounds for far less publicity.

If you think that the new Press Office is filling an important role in an efficient manner can you help with a donation towards running costs?

If you think that the ALF should get across to the public why it does what it does and what its methods and tactics are then please send a donation, large or small, to ALF Press Office, BM 4400, London, WC1N 3XX. Cheques and PO's should be made payable to "ALF Press Office" and crossed. Please send a SAE if you require an acknowledgement or a receipt.

I realise that money is desperately needed in many parts of the animal protection movement but do hope that you will be able to support this appeal both now and in the future. Thank you.

With very best wishes. Yours in the struggle for total liberation,

Robin Webb (Press Officer)

ps. If you would like an ALF spokesperson to address your group or a public meeting please write to or telephone the Press Office to arrange details.

Loughborough Council banned the Boxing Day civic reception for the Quorn foxhunt in the market place (Daily Telegraph, 27-12-91).

There was a dramatic decrease in the number of dogs taken in by Battersea Dogs Home over Christmas 1990 (Daily Telegraph, 28-12-91).

Video films of pit bull terriers fighting were established as obscene under law when a man was convicted of importing them and fined £500 with £500 costs at Southwark Crown Court, London (Daily Telegraph, 7-1-92).

A brewery heiress who gave up foxhunting has left £1 million to the RSPCA (Daily Telegraph, 20-1-92).

The New Forest is to be given national park status (Times, 20-1-92).

Bristol Zoo has stated that it has no plans to keep polar bears in future after two elderly bears were "put to sleep".

ARK ANGEL

FOR ANIMAL LIBERATION

Number 8

Summer 92

£1.80

Okay, no beating about the bush; Arkangel is a little thinner this time, and it costs a bit more too!

Unfortunately, the sad truth is that issue 7 cost more than the cover price to print and post. We only managed to break even by selling magazines and t-shirts at the World Day rally and outside the Living Without Cruelty exhibition (no postage); and through a few donations which were very gratefully received. We want to stress that we make no profit, take no expenses, carry no paid advertising, and as yet have received no legacies! All of the income is used to print and distribute the magazine. The more money we take in, the more Arkangels we can print, and the message reaches more people! So it's £1.80 an issue, and new subscriptions will be £7.20.

Anyway, enough about money. We have tried to maintain the same quantity of content by reducing the size of the print, and by generally squashing things up a bit - at least we're saving paper!

The good news is that the list of subscribers is now pretty well complete, but there could still be one or two people that have not contacted us yet, so if you know of anyone who is complaining that they haven't received their Arkangel recently - tell them to write in!

Unlike any other AR magazine, Arkangel is OF the movement and FOR the movement. It's what YOU make it. We're just here to compile and print what you send us. All you have to remember is that Arkangel aims to do two things - to inform people about what is going on within the AR movement, and to allow free and open debate on matters of interest to AR activists.

One area where we are short of material is Local Group activities. Please let us know what you and your group are doing - leafletting, demonstrating, or whatever! It provides others with inspiration and encouragement, and reminds us that we are all part of a huge, diverse, and active movement.

While Arkangel does not carry articles about, say, the 'detail' of vivisection - numerous books and magazines cover that adequately already - we would gladly print an article about how to stop vivisection! In this respect therefore, Arkangel forms the perfect complement to a magazine such as Turning Point. Remember, we don't commission articles - if you want to see a particular topic covered - get writing!

And finally, a reminder to send your contributions on a 3.5in disk if possible - it saves a lot of two-finger typing. Either MS-DOS or AmigaDOS will do. Of course, as Keith Mann reminds us, not everyone has access to a computer, so your contribution is most welcome in any form. Get writing!

Sabbing News

From the HSA

This edition brings a pretty mixed bag of reports culled (if you'll forgive the term!) from the Spring and early Summer HSA news releases. In particular, there are several reports of violence perpetrated against sabs. The incidence of these attacks doesn't diminish, and as the hunting fraternity is forced further into a corner by our activities the attacks are bound to grow worse. But, to reiterate a point made in the last edition, the hunts will soon learn that violence breeds violence; they can give us all the ag they like - we'll continue to hound them until they've been run to earth for good.

The McNamara Bill

The big disappointment of the season was the failure of Kevin McNamara's Wild Mammals (Protection) Bill to secure a Second Reading. For those of us who were present in the Commons on February 14th, some enjoyment was at least gained from watching the other side cough up the usual guff to justify their fun, and then squirm under the verbal onslaught from the Bill's supporters. Prize for the most revealing soundbite of the day must, however, be awarded to one of the Bill's most rabid detractors; Sir Nicholas Ridley - who, in a rare moment of irony, said "The only thing I've got against foxhunts is that they don't catch enough foxes." Quite, Nick - thanks for rubbishing the 'pest control' argument for the benefit of the entire nation! The failure of the Bill was hailed as a great victory by the pro-hunt lobby - but just what sort of victory was it? A majority of 12 on the vote - a lousy 6%. Do they seriously call that a victory? Even Sir Nicholas Bonsor had the honesty to admit that it was too close for comfort. They can't be that lucky for too much longer - and they know it only too well. Next time...

One final tale on the subject of the Bill; you'll be amused to hear that the Campaign for Hunting - a coalition of the National Hunting Club, the BFSS and the MFA - had hoped to stage a pro-hunting rally in Hyde Park on the day before the reading. However, their plans were foiled by the Metropolitan Police, who feared that the rally would invoke an uncontrollable breakdown in public order. (Odd, that... it's difficult to imagine the police as being in any way sensitive to public sentiment!) In the end, the rally had to be hastily relocated to Stoneleigh Park in Coventry - which is to Hyde Park what Herne Bay is to Monte Carlo - but they had to be seen somewhere, didn't they! To cap it all, the demonstrators were instructed to leave hounds, horns, red coats and top hats at home and pretend to be farmers supporting the Campaign's aims. As Ben Ponton, the HSA Press Officer commented, this is "typical of the arrogant hypocrisy of those who kill wild animals for fun."

More about the Campaign for Hunting

Readers of the Daily Telegraph among you may have noticed a full-page advert placed by the above-named group on February 10th. The ad featured a photograph of a man, identified as an opponent of hunting, shouting angrily at the photographer. Beneath the photo was the headline, "The voice of reason?" On the bottom half of the ad was a list of people who represent the complete opposite of this crazed animal rights extremist - veritable bastions of conservatism, like those well-known bloodsportsmen John 'Rumpole' Mortimer and 'Beefy' Botham. The photo is, in fact, of Martin Bright, a member of the North Downs branch of the HSA. It is a still taken from a video shot at a meeting of the Old Surrey and Burstow during the 1990/91 foxhunting season, and shows - as the ad conveniently neglects to mention - Martin expressing his anger and distress after a domestic cat was run over and killed by a hunt follower in his car. A complaint has been made to the Advertising Standards Authority regarding this misrepresentation, and we'll keep you informed of the outcome at a later date.

As an interesting footnote to this, it's rather ironic that last November three members of the Old Surrey and Burstow were convicted of several offences relating to a violent attack made upon Martin Bright the previous year. The charges included affray, assault and ABH. One of the three, Nigel Trevithick-Wood, is believed also to have a criminal record including charges for theft and fraud. Martin Bright has no criminal record.

Mike Hill

Sunday, February 9th saw the anniversary of the tragic killing of Mike Hill. In memory of Mike, sabs from all over the country took part in an intensive day of action on the 8th, which resulted in all hunting in Cheshire being brought to a standstill. In anticipation of the day, the Cheshire Beagles and the Cheshire Forest FH had decided to cancel anyway - but in the end, all the others dropped out as well. A Cheshire Beagles' joint master, Charles Hardy, issued a statement saying that they had decided not to hunt as a mark of respect to Mike and his family. Given their track record on respect for life and feelings, I'm sure we can draw our own conclusions from that. Just who the hell do these people think they are? Remember that no charges have ever been brought against Alan Summersgill, the huntsman whose action led to Mike's death; the case is ongoing, and on two recent occasions Summersgill has failed to turn up in court to give evidence. Where's the respect there?

The latest news about the demonstrators arrested at Summersgill's home is that the riot charges were dropped after the Crown Prosecution Service advised six of the defendants to plead guilty to Section 2 offences (violent disorder, carrying a 2 - 2 1/2 year sentence) and four others to plead guilty under Section 4 (threatening behaviour, carrying a 4 - 6 month custodial sentence or community service). Sentencing is due on July 13th, and it will be interesting to see - from the type of sentences passed - whether the CPS's advice was worth taking. There are some who feel it might be a stitch up.

Hunt Violence

As I said earlier, there's a long (though far from complete) list of reports in this section, so I'll cover them as briefly as possible. An asterisk '*' in the text denotes that the outcome of any offences, arrests or trials was unknown by the compiler at the time of going to press.

On February 22nd members of Portsmouth HSA, who were attending a meet of the Hursley Hambledon FH, were attacked by terriermen after successfully decoying the hounds with a toy rabbit soaked in fox urine. The sabs had previously achieved great success with the decoy (tacticians take note!); the toy had been kept in a cage with a wounded fox at an animal sanctuary, and on the day the hounds set off in eager pursuit of it as it was trailed behind a sab's mountain bike. The terriermen, however, didn't see the funny side of this. They used washing-up liquid bottles to spray the sabs with what is believed to have been horse urine; several sabs were then beaten up and the tyres of the mountain bike were slashed. Police were called, and promptly - surprise, surprise - arrested two of the beaten sabs, later charging them with assault, criminal damage and Section 5 offences.*

The Staffordshire-based Albrighton Foxhunt is continuing its campaign of violence against hunt saboteurs. Followers of the hunt attacked sabs for the third consecutive weekend on February 29th. Six men were arrested after attacking sabs during the meet at Norbury Junction. One male sab was thrown against a barbed wire fence, whilst a woman sab was dragged around by her hair.* Only weeks earlier, Albrighton supporter Gary Whelband was fined £200 and ordered to pay £50 compensation and £138 costs after being convicted of ABH; he had attacked a Wolverhampton sab, causing jaw injuries and a perforated eardrum.

Huntsmen and followers of the Old Berkshire Foxhunt were involved in the ramming of an Oxford HSA sab's van at a Bourton meet on March 7th. The van was blocked on a farm track by two mounted members, and a pick-up truck was driven from the nearby Lower Earls Court Farm and used to ram the van - shunting it along the track. Later, other supporters drove a fork-lift truck to the scene and threatened to use it to overturn the van. The threat was not carried out, but the pick-up and the fork-lift were used to block the track and hold the sabs captive. After 45 minutes, the police arrived - but they made no arrests. Instead, the sabs were taken to Swindon police station to make statements.* The van is now a complete write-off.

One Peterborough sab was hospitalised and two others required hospital treatment after hunt violence at a Cottesmore Foxhunt meet on March 26th. Sabs described scenes at the hunt as some of the worst examples of hunt violence they have experienced. The 'treatment' included fractured bones, torn muscles and injuries sustained from liberal lashings from riding crops; the hospitalised sab was attacked with an iron bar. Complaints were made to the police, but no members of the hunt were arrested; instead, they arrested three saboteurs, one of whom - Gareth Gee - was held by a police officer while a hunt supporter attacked him and tried to steal his camera. Later, despite warning the police that he was still recovering from a broken arm, Gareth had his arm bent back so sharply by an officer that it broke again. Sabs both locally and nationally are outraged by police behaviour in this incident - and no members of the hunt have been either questioned or arrested. The HSA is advising the sabs about issuing writs for damages against the police and bringing civil proceedings against members of the hunt.*

A West Norfolk hunt supporter has been found guilty of affray and three counts of criminal damage following an attack on hunt sabs and an Anglia TV journalist at a cubhunting meet last September. Mark Fuller - 6'6" tall and tipping the weighbridge at 25 stones - attacked the sabs and sought to destroy both their camera and that belonging to the journalist, who was collecting material for a current affairs programme. Afterwards, Fuller is alleged to have torn the wing mirrors from the sab's van and used them to smash some of its windows. At the trial, he was fined £350 for affray, £250 for each criminal damage charge and £200 for causing damage to the van; he was also ordered to pay £1463 compensation and £150 costs. Not nearly enough. If there was any justice, he'd be serving time now - like some sabs have had to do for lesser offences.

Last August, John Funnell, joint master and huntsman with the notorious Surrey Union - one of the most violent hunts in the country - was convicted of affray and assault causing ABH, and given a suspended jail sentence of two months. He was found guilty of using his horse to repeatedly trample Brixton hunt sab Andy Tuck, who was sitting in an earth where a fox had gone to ground. Andy suffered severe head injuries as a result of this incident, and brought civil proceedings against Funnell for damages. Funnell agreed to settle out of court to the sum of £900 plus costs.

Folkestone and Herne Bay HSA sabs ran into trouble at a meet of the East Kent Foxhunt at Aldington on New Year's Eve. The hunt had got some extra muscle out to bolster the ranks of the terrier men, and at one stage six sabs were trapped in a field as the mob charged. Three sabs managed to leg it back to their van in order to go for help, but one of its windows was smashed by a lobbed cider bottle - which narrowly missed one sab's head. Fortunately, no one was hurt, and revenge was taken a few weeks later when about 60 sabs turned up for a regional hit on the East Kent at Petham, near Canterbury; the hunt was put into complete disarray on that day, and the heavies didn't show up again for the rest of the season. Perhaps they've learnt now that they get as good as they give - or better!

I think that's enough for now about violence. Readers might find it a bit boring ploughing through it all, but it serves a couple of useful purposes; first of all, it reminds us of what we're up against; and secondly, it generates anger - which helps to bolster our commitment in the continuing fight against these scumbags.

Sabs in the Dock

On February 13th, two hunt sabs went on trial at Hexham Magistrates Court charged with Section 5 offences.* Stuart Lord, of Tyneside HSA, and Stephen Jones, of Leeds HSA, were accused of disorderly behaviour at the Northumberland Beagling Festival last September. Apparently, the two conspired to cause "harassment, alarm and distress" to the huntsman by committing the dreadful crimes of shouting at the hounds and blowing a hunting horn! Stuart Lord also had to stand trial for calling Ian Wear, a whipper-in with the Newcastle and District Beagles, a prat - but the CPS abandoned the case at the last minute. Perhaps they agreed with Stuart! Naomi Watson (see below) was due to appear before Hexham magistrates on February 27th - also for calling Ian Wear a prat. That case, too, was abandoned. It seems that poor, victimised Mr Wear just can't get away from it - he's a prat, and that's that! And if that's the worst name he's ever been called, then I hope next season will see him cowering in embarrassment from a barrage of choicer - and no less appropriate - names.

Joking aside, the Northumberland branch of the CPS have had it in for hunt sabs and other animal rights activists in recent years - usually for trivial things. For example, two years ago, Naomi Watson was unsuccessfully prosecuted for allegedly slapping her thighs in order to distract hounds! Tyneside HSA now suspect that there is a deliberate policy within the CPS to criminalise animal rights activists on the slimmest of pretexts. They are helped in this with the knowledge that legal aid will be refused to defendants, thereby forcing them to defend themselves. The Northumberland Police region is now the only one in the country which arrests sabs on the grounds that horn-blowing is an offence under Section 5.

A Last Laugh

The last regimental foxhunt in Britain put up the white flag on February 8th when it was faced with the prospect of sitting down to breakfast with 30 sabs - a prospect to make even the hardest bastards in the Marines shrink! The Royal Artillery Foxhunt had planned a hunt breakfast at the Bustard pub at Shrewton on Salisbury Plain - and they arrived to find that sabs from Bath, Bristol and West Wiltshire were waiting to share in the coffee and croissants. Because of this, hunt officials decided to cancel the day's sport, and hunt members were left with no choice but to box up and bugger off home. Could this be one of the easiest acts of sabotage ever?

Final News: The Co-op Bank

The Co-op Bank has made much noise lately about its ethical stance against animal exploiters. It has ceased doing business with companies involved in fur farming, cosmetic testing and bloodsports (except, for some reason, angling), and this is good to hear. But readers might be interested to hear that Peterborough Hunt Saboteurs recently applied to open a deposit account with their local branch - and they received a reply from the manager stating the following: "We are concerned about the activities of your organisation and indeed, believe them to be incompatible with our stated principles. Consequently, we have taken the decision to close (your) account." Rather an odd contradiction here, wouldn't you say? Is their 'ethical policy' just one big publicity stunt after all? Write and ask them - and if you don't get a satisfactory answer, close your account.

WHAT THE PAPERS SAY

Just a small selection from the last few months

MARCH

● ATTACKS by the Animal Liberation Front put the Thames Valley third highest in the country for ALF-related crime. Ninety-three attacks were mounted against laboratories, butchers' shops and vehicles.

Protestors daub butcher's home

PROTESTORS opposed to a planning application from G. R. Evans and Co. to build a new slaughterhouse at Corwen, Clwyd, attacked the family home of butcher Brian Evans on Sunday night, daubing the front door and his Mercedes car with anti-abattoir slogans in white gloss paint.

"They slashed the tyres of the car and our Mitsubishi pick-up, scratched the paintwork and painted 'No Abattoir' on the house," said son Robert Evans, who discovered the damage early on Monday.

The family business has operated from a town centre location for over 50 years, slaughtering around 100 cattle, 600 lambs and 150 pigs a week for their own shop and for high street butchers in a 20 mile radius. But EC regulations and Glyndwr district council plans to develop Corwen, promoted an application for a new modern abattoir, on an edge of business park.

MOLE KILLERS UNDER ATTACK Members of the Crews Hill Golf Club who tried to rid their greens of destructive moles by setting lethal traps have found the little furry creatures have an ally. Three feet high messages have been spray painted on the greens telling them to 'Stop Killing Moles'.

The Animal Liberation Front has claimed responsibility for the attack on the Enfield course where moles have caused thousands of pounds' worth of damage. The ALF has promised further attacks unless the trappings stop.

Crews Hill general manager Eric Hunt said: 'The message was obviously intended as a warning and it's one that we've taken very seriously. We have stopped using the traps and are looking into other ways of controlling our mole problem.'

Campaign against duck shooting intensifies

MELBOURNE: Animal liberationists in Victoria stepped up their campaign against duck-shooters by destroying hunters' hiding places and scaring birds away before last weekend's duck-season opening.

Head of Animal Liberation's anti-duck shooting campaign Laurie Levy says about 300 hunters' hideouts have been knocked down across Victoria's wetlands so far this year.

He says Animal Liberation will use a plane to scare waterbirds near Kerang in northern Victoria to safer sanctuaries.

Front's warning to butchers

The Animal Liberation Front warned today that it plans to drive Birmingham butchers out of business by a campaign of vandalism.

Extremist animal rights activists have targeted Birmingham for a mass campaign of window smashing throughout the summer.

An ALF spokesman today said the attacks were economic sabotage to drive butchers out of business.

Mr Graham Bidston, assistant director of the National Federation of Meat Traders, said: "Such suggestions of intimidation will not deter businesses from carrying out their legitimate trade."

A police spokesman said: "We take any threat like this very seriously."

"We would urge all members of the public, especially butchers, to be extra vigilant and to report anything suspicious to the police immediately."

Badger trap sabotage

THE Animal Liberation Front has claimed responsibility for a break-in at Polwhele Veterinary Investigation Centre, near Truro, and damaging £390 worth of badger traps.

Police said the intruders cut through chain-link perimeter fencing between 5pm last Wednesday and 10am on Thursday.

Then they cut the wire mesh of 13 cages with bolt cutters.

Before the offence was discovered, police learned that BBC Radio Cornwall had received a call from a man claiming to be from the ALF admitting responsibility.

Letter-bomb at Banbridge

POLICE have warned people connected with hunting clubs not to open unexpected or suspicious mail following the delivery of a letter-bomb to a hunting enthusiast in Banbridge on Monday.

The device, an incendiary bomb, was in a large brown envelope with a Belfast postmark. The incident is being linked to the Animal Liberation Front which has been conducting a campaign of violence in Northern Ireland.

Last October the ALF said that they had placed a firebomb under the car of a Co Down huntsman stating "this marks a step-up in our campaign".

Acid attack on Old Town sealife spot

Becher's Brook is set on fire

BECHER'S BROOK — the best-known jump on the Grand National racecourse — was set on fire last night.

Members of the Animal Liberation Front had threatened to disrupt the three-day meeting at Aintree, but tight security foiled them.

Early today no one had claimed responsibility for setting fire to the fence.

Meanwhile, the Welsh jockey who won the Grand National at the weekend revealed his next ambition. "I would love to win the Grand National again," he said.

Pembrokeshire-born Carl Llewellyn, aged 26, whose family live at Hundleton, near Pembroke, was the toast of Wales when he won on the topically-named Party Politics.

"I wasn't that confident," he said. "There was one hairy moment at Becher's Brook when Brown Windsor fell and we had to side-step him."

His mother Jean said at the family's Dyfed farm last night, "We are thrilled to bits. He had a rocking horse when he was three or four and he's been riding since he was six or seven."

"He has always been ambitious and his hard work has finally paid off."

'We ruined Beecher's'

ANIMAL rights activists say they were responsible for an arson attack that destroyed Aintree's Beecher's Brook, the most formidable fence on the Grand National course. Robin Webb, Animal Liberation Front press officer, said the claim came in a telephone call to his home by a woman.

POLICE are hunting animal rights extremists who have vowed to continue attacks on butchers' shops in Plymouth.

The Animal Liberation Front — believed to be behind the fire-bombing of Dingles store in 1988 — has said it was to blame for smashing butchers' shop windows across Plymouth in attacks costing thousands of pounds.

The organisation has warned that more attacks could follow.

Angry city butchers today condemned the attacks and said they might have to resort to steel shutters to protect their windows at night.

ALF spokesman Robin Webb contacted a newspaper last night to say the direct action group had damaged 15 windows.

He said: "These 15 windows were broken to highlight the plight of the 650 million animals and birds that are sacrificed each year by the meat industry."

"I feel confident that there will be more attacks because the Animal Liberation Front actions will continue as long as cruelty to animals continues."

ANIMAL rights protesters attacked Life Centre with acid and paint on Easter weekend.

Acid was thrown at about 20 windows and letters ALF (Animal Liberation Front) and red paint on paving stones overnight.

Police believe the activists could be the same group who targeted butchers and betting shops last week ago.

Sea Life assistant manager Carol Ellis said: "Apparently it is Anti-Vivisection Week and a warning to say this may happen. They're making as much publicity as possible."

She said all the windows needed replacement did not affect Easter Monday trading.

She believed it was the first time the Royal Road centre, which opened in 1990, had been attacked.

And she said: "We obviously try to keep it as natural an environment as possible. We're not going to let them go out straight away."

Pellets

Inspector Dave Ellis, at Devonport police, said it was thought the damage might have been caused by air gun pellets fired at the windows.

Seven butchers in the Devonport area were attacked during Tuesday night, and two other shops in Crownhill Village and Eastlake Walk were also targeted.

Butcher Terry Wilkes's shop in Beaumont Street, Milnehouse, was hit twice in the space of five days, landing him with a £1,000 bill.

"It is crazy," he said. "We are just trying to make a living. Everyone is entitled to rebel against whatever they want, but to go around damaging property like that will lose them whatever sympathy they may have had. It puts people's backs up."

Butchery chain Dewhurst has had five Plymouth shops damaged, each attacked twice over the past week.

At about £750 to replace the glass each time, the company faces a £7,000-plus glaziers' bill.

At the Albert Road Butchery, owner David Roe said: "I am bloody annoyed. It is all so senseless."

"I haven't contacted my insurance company yet, but it is costing £800 to replace the window."

APRIL

Leather shop brick attack

A MIDLAND leather goods shop was attacked today for the third time in less than eight months.

Animal Liberation Front (ALF) activists later claimed responsibility for the latest attack which caused £8,000 worth of damage to the windows at the World of Leather, Stafford Street, Wolverhampton.

In identical attacks last September and October, bricks were thrown through the plate glass display windows causing a total of £14,000 worth of damage.

The ALF also claimed responsibility for the two earlier attacks. Today, police were bracing themselves in the face of a possible major ALF campaign in Wolverhampton.

The latest attack comes a day after the ALF claimed responsibility for a firebomb attack on the Wolverhampton meat wholesalers Weddel Smith, of Hickman Avenue, East Park.

Smashed windows at the World of Leather store

Activists sabotage milk firm

ANIMAL RIGHTS activists caused £20,000 damage yesterday when they broke into a dairy and damaged 50 vehicles.

Tyres were slashed, windows and windscreens attacked by corrosive fluids and bodywork paint-sprayed with slogans.

The Animal Liberation Front later claimed responsibility for the early-morning raid on the Unigate Dairy at Parrys Lane, Stoke Bishop, Bristol, where a security fence was cut.

In a statement the Front said the attack was intended as "economic sabotage" against the dairy industry.

"It is directly responsible for the veal trade, which condemns over 1,000 calves every day to a journey in horrific conditions to spend their short lives in European veal crates, a system outlawed in this country."

Avon and Somerset Police said inquiries were continuing. The raid meant late milk deliveries for 21,000 customers.

Search after meat depot is firebombed

Forensic experts were today examining firebombs to find clues to the identity of animal rights terrorists who attacked a Wolverhampton meat depot.

Four petrol bombs were planted at Weddel Swift in Hickman Avenue - just yards from where a council worker's family slept.

The cabs of delivery vans were damaged when two of the devices exploded.

Two similar devices which failed to ignite were found in lorries at the depot close to East Park, where dozens of youngsters were playing yesterday afternoon.

Alerted

Superintendent John Carter of Birmingham Road police today made an urgent appeal for witnesses.

Police were alerted after a spokesman for the Animal Liberation Front rang the Express & Star to claim responsibility.

Mr Colin Maiden, caretaker at the council's wholesale market, lives in a bungalow with his wife and four young children, aged between two and eight, only yards from the depot.

He twice heard noises during the night near where the lorries were parked, but didn't see anything.

MAY

Dairy sabotaged

ANIMAL rights activists caused £20,000 damage when they broke into a dairy and damaged 50 vehicles.

Tyres were slashed, windows and windscreens attacked by corrosive fluids and bodywork spray-painted with slogans.

The Animal Liberation Front later claimed responsibility for the early-morning raid yesterday on the Unigate Dairy at Stoke Bishop, Bristol.

In a statement to the Press Association the Front said the attack was intended as "economic sabotage" against the dairy industry, which was "directly responsible for the veal trade"

Animal rights extremists are believed responsible for attacks on commercial premises.

Eight shops were hit including Boots in Green Street, Upton Park, where hydrofluoric acid was used.

Butchers and fast food restaurants in East Ham and Manor Park had ALF, initials of the Animal Liberation Front, spray-painted on their windows and doors.

The Imperial Cancer Research Trust charity shop in High Street North was hit. Bill's fishing tackle shop in Manor Park had the locks glued.

SHOPS HIT BY ANIMAL RIGHTS GROUP

VANDAL ATTACK

ANIMAL RIGHTS supporters have hit Walthamstow High Street with a vengeance.

Shop doors were glued tight overnight, making them impossible to open the next morning, and slogans such as 'Meat is Murder' were plastered all over butchers' shop front windows.

The initials ALF - Animal Liberation Front - were also sprayed.

When traders of at least five premises arrived to open up shop on Saturday morning, they were unable to get in, so tightly were doors glued.

Locksmiths were called to cut away useless locks and replace them.

Painted

Bert Parsons, who runs a butcher's shop in the High Street, told the Guardian that his premises was among those vandalised.

"They couldn't do the lock so they threw a brick through the window instead," he said.

"They also painted the slogan 'Meat is Murder' across the window the night before with thick black paint.

"I don't go around forcing my point of view on that kind of person, so why should they do it to me?"

Mr Parsons said trade was as brisk as usual the following day, although for obvious reasons he was unable to put meat back in the shop window.

By Val Weeks

"We had quite a lot of mess to clear up," he added.

Boots the chemist were also hit, with posters demanding the company be boycotted because of alleged cruelty to animals.

A spokeswoman for the company told the Guardian that the police were dealing with the incident.

"It caused a certain amount of inconvenience but nothing to stop us trading as usual," she said.

A police spokesman said part of the problem in detecting the crime was the noiselessness of most of it.

"A great deal of damage can be done quietly. After all, unless you've got breaking glass, what is there to hear? So far, no-one seems to have heard or seen anything - it just seems to have started up."

He added that the police would like to hear from anyone who has also been a victim of the vandalism attacks or who may be able to help in any other way.

Police probe bomb links

A FIRE bomb attack - similar to the one which destroyed eight lorries at Snelson's Rouncil Lane abattoir last November - struck a Wolverhampton meat factory on Monday.

The Animal Liberation Front have admitted they planted the petrol bombs which exploded in four lorries.

Now Warwickshire and West Midlands forces are collaborating in investigations to find links between the two incidents.

Animal rights raid costs £20,000

Animal rights activists caused £20,000 damage yesterday when they broke into a dairy and damaged 50 vehicles, slashing tyres and spraying corrosive fluids over bodywork.

The Animal Liberation Front claimed responsibility for the raid on the Unigate Dairy in Stoke Bishop, Bristol.

Animal rights activists raid campus

ANIMAL rights activists who masterminded a night-time raid on Warwick University have vowed to return to free laboratory animals.

The Animal Liberation Front members broke in to reach cages they claim contained hundreds of mice and rats.

But the gang was stopped from freeing the animals in the biological sciences block early on Saturday when alarms sounded.

They ran off without being discovered but have warned university bosses - "we will be back".

The gang was also keen to obtain what they claimed would be "documentary evidence of animal experimentation".

It is believed the raiders had inside information about security and had kept the block under surveillance.

A Coventry police spokesman said it was the first incident of its kind at the university.

Responsibility for the raid was claimed by Robin Webb, ALF press officer.

He said Warwick had been targeted through a concern for the plight of laboratory animals.

Butchers van damaged by acid

FURY OVER ATTACK ON SHOP

■ THE damaged van

ANIMAL Liberation Front activists caused thousands of pounds worth of damage in an acid attack on a Sidley butchers' shop on Tuesday night.

Butcher Terence Burt arrived to open up his business at 6.15 on Wednesday morning to find both front windows smeared with a corrosive liquid.

In a rear loading area the firm's unmarked white Transit van had been singled out for attack. Corrosive liquid — thought to be paint-stripper — had been tipped over the windscreen and side windows, and the front and side body panels.

The liquid had been used to etch the A.L.F. initials on the driver's window.

Tyres had been slashed and the windscreen wiper arms bent double.

Mr Burt said: "We have been in business here for 11 years and we have never had a attack like this.

"We are insured of course but this will still cost us money. That van covers 150 miles every day on deliveries.

"But if they think this sort of thing will intimidate us they are wrong."

An empty can of paint-stripper was found in the nearby Sidley car park later.

Incendiary package found in store

A PACKAGE containing incendiary devices brought Leeds city centre to a standstill last night.

Police believe that the device, which was discovered in Marks and Spencer's store in Briggate, which sells meat and other food as well as clothes, may have been planted by the Animal Liberation Front.

The package was discovered in the store at 5.30pm, and the city's main shopping street was closed by the police from 5.30pm to 8pm.

The package was found in the basement furniture department. The two incendiary devices were discovered in the side of a settee and were the size of audio cassettes.

West Yorkshire police said that the package contained two incendiary devices, and appealed to key holders of other city centre shops to come back into the city last night to allow further searches.

Earlier, shops, restaurants and bars in the vicinity were deserted. Police asked Whitelock's First City Wine Bar, which is at the back of Marks and Spencer, to close.

Meanwhile, eight pumps attended a large fire in a city centre shop early this morning. The shop was Stop 'n Shop in York Street.

'Insider' raid on police HQ

ANIMAL activists broke into police headquarters after being tipped off by an insider about inquiries which would jeopardise their campaign.

The Animal Liberation Front raided the Crime Squad office in Edinburgh and removed files about arson attacks on animal research centres in Lothian.

ALF spokesman Robin Webb said yesterday: "If activists were sent to jail they could not help alleviate animals' suffering."

Glue attacks

ANIMAL rights activists claim they glued up the locks to a string of butcher's shops.

An optician's in Headington, and two betting shops were also targeted, according to an Animal Liberation Front spokesman.

The ALF said it hit 11 butchers in Kidlington and Headington.

But only one of Kidlington's three butchers was affected.

Dave Bartlett said his High Street shop had been glued but that he had opened as usual.

He added: "If we get any more of this, I'll stake out the place and catch them."

The ALF said it had targeted the bookies "because they exploit horses" and the optician's because it used animal-tested products.

International News

Australia

Eight captive dolphins and one newborn calf were released into the ocean off the coast of western Australia following the closure of the Atlantic Marine Park and a subsequent release programme (Animals International, Summer 92).

Brazil

The last remaining captive dolphin in Brazil is to be released into the wild through the "Into the Blue" project after the filing of a court application claiming the dolphin was being held in conditions that violated natural laws (Animals International, Spring 92).

Canada

Quebec has banned the hunting and trapping of bobcats and Vancouver City Council is drafting a bylaw banning the use of wild animals in circuses held within city limits (Animals Agenda, March 92). Two large corporations - the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, and Petro Canada, have indicated they will no longer sponsor rodeo events and circuses with performing animals. The city of Toronto has passed a bylaw prohibiting the use of wildlife in circuses and aquaria (Animals International, Summer 92).

Estonia

The first vegan cafe in the Baltic states is to open in Tallin (Vegan Views, Spring 92).

France

The French government is planning to introduce, by the end of 1993, a new charter of ethics to control and limit animal experimentation (BUAV News, March 92). The total number of animal experiments every year in France has been reduced by well over one million between 1985 and 1990 (La Voix des Betes, March/April 92). Studies have been launched for the creation of the first marine national parks in France, in the Iroise coastal area of Brittany, where grey seals breed and 20% of French sea birds nest (Le Monde, 3/3/92). Ecologist parties won 13.9% of the votes in this year's French regional elections compared with just 2.4% in 1986 (Die Welt, 24/3/92). The La Borie dam project in the Languedoc region has been annulled by the Council of State, so preventing the flooding of a valley very important for wildlife (Le Monde, 27/3/92). France has banned the import of terrapins on animal welfare grounds (Telegraph, 31/3/92). The French Minister of the Environment is to introduce parliamentary bills to control genetic engineering, give greater protection to national parks, eliminate pollution from waste disposal and prevent landscape destruction (Monde, 8/5/92).

Germany

The German government has provided about £70 mil between 1990 and 1992 for cleaning up pollution in Bitterfeld region, a heavily contaminated industrial area in former East Germany (Die Welt, 27/2/92). A court in Kassel has declared that universities in the state of Hesse must not force medical students to carry out dissection of animals killed for the purpose. The German Protestant Church has published a memorandum in which it condemns factory farming and hunting, and calls for a reduction in animal experiments and better conditions for animals in fur farms, zoos and circuses. A court in Mannheim has decided that a ban on angling in a nature reserve is permitted. Since 1989, 31 of the 72 furriers in Leipzig have closed down. In Munich there has been a collapse in fur sales with figures the worst ever. The state of Rheinland-Pfalz has stopped the use of animals in experiments for the diagnosis of psittacosis and rabies. The Philipps University in Marburg is no longer to use animals in experiments in the training of pharmacologists and will make use of audio-visual methods and cell-culture instead (Recht fur Tiere, March 92). 75% of researchers in Germany are using alternatives to animal experimentation and 80% of German laboratories have stopped experimenting on animals (Die Welt, 20/3/92). An agreement to reduce by 70% contamination of the River Werra by potash mining has been reached by the German government, various states and the mining company, who will together fund water purification measures to the tune of about £50 million between 1992 and 1995. It is calculated that this will result in the recovery of the animal and plant populations of the rivers Werra and Weser within a few years (Die Welt, 31/3/92). The German government is to bring new regulations into force to control and reduce the use of pesticides in order to protect bees (Die Welt, 5/5/92). In Nordrhein-Westfalen keepers of pit bull terriers and other fighting breeds must in future produce a police certificate of good conduct and apply for a permit (Die Welt, 15/5/92).

Holland

In 1991 the Netherlands Society Against Vivisection increased its number of regional groups from 25 to 33 (Proefkonijn, March 92).

Hungary

The Hungarian Olympic Committee has officially requested that members of their national Olympic team should not attend any bullfight while in Spain for the Olympic Games (WSPA Bulletin, May 92).

Italy

To reduce the number of stray cats and dogs in Italian cities, the Public Health Department is to carry out sterilization of cats and dogs where the keepers of the animals so wish it (Die Welt, 11/3/92). Italians who fail to complete a census of furs or articles of protected species they own or to provide proof of purchase risk a fine of up to £200,000 or 3 months in prison. A new law names 38 protected species for which failure to provide information constitutes an offence (Telegraph, 1/6/92).

Japan

Japan has agreed to comply with the current UN moratorium on driftnetting. Half of the Japanese fishing fleet is to stop driftnetting by June 30, and the remainder by the end of 1992 (Animals Agenda, March 92). The Japan Anti-Vivisection Association now has 1,000 activists, and a No Fur Fund and Animal Rights Centre have also been started in Japan (Recht fur Tiere, March 92).

Philippines

To prevent 1,000 hectares of tropical rainforest being illegally cut down, the Philippine environment ministry has ordered the blowing up of a 5 kilometre stretch of road in the mountains of Nueva Ecija province, as this is the only road in that stretch of forest (Die Welt, 26/2/92).

South Korea

South Korea has agreed to obey a UN resolution calling for an end to driftnetting by 31st December 92 (Animals' Agenda, March 92).

Spain

Bulls which display exceptional bravery in the bullring will be saved from death under a proposed law expected to be approved by the Spanish parliament. The law, which could spare the lives of scores of animals, is part of a number of proposals aimed at stamping out malpractices in the gory spectacle (Times, 29/2/92). Spanish authorities are set to ban all foreign anglers from the River Ebro system in order to prevent litter and the death of many big catfish (Pisces, March 92). New animal protection laws have now been passed by 6 Spanish local authorities (Animals International, Spring 92).

Switzerland

On 16th February, 43.7% of Swiss voters supported a referendum calling for an end to animal tests - a vast improvement on a similar poll taken in 1986 (BUAV News, February 92).

Taiwan

Taiwan has also agreed to stop driftnetting by the end of this year in line with the UN resolution (Animals Agenda, March 92).

USA

In Los Angeles, three people have been sent to prison for selling animals for vivisection after pretending to be offering good homes for them (ISAR Report, Spring 92). A district judge has ruled in Washington DC that the US Department of Agriculture must extend the Animal Welfare Act protection to mice, rats and birds used in research. Maine Fish and Wildlife Department has ceased stocking pheasants for hunters to kill after insufficient pheasant hunting permits were bought. The number of deer hunting permits sold in Tennessee fell from 197,661 in 1989 to barely 190,000 in 1990. The New Mexico Game Commission has approved a plan to reduce the number of hunters in the state by up to 24,000 over the next four years to let Mule Deer populations recover. Hudson has become the first town in New Hampshire to ban leghold trapping. Jindo and Fur Vault salons reported a 15% decline in fur sales for 1991 and the American Fur Industry Inc. has admitted that since 1987 the number of US retail furriers has fallen from 2,400 to 2,200, and wholesalers from 200 to 150. California and the US Fish and Wildlife Service have set up a $1.2 million programme to save the coastal Sage Grub, a favourite habitat of endangered animals. According to a 1991 Gallup Youth Survey, 2 US teenagers in 3 say they support the animal rights movement. Kraft General Foods has closed its turkey slaughterhouse at Tulare, California, dismissing 1,400 workers, because of an anticipated decline in the demand for turkey. The US Fish and Wildlife Service has added the Louisiana Black Bear to the threatened species list in response to a lawsuit by wildlife defenders (Animals Agenda, March 92).

Arkangel T-Shirts

Two different designs are available - a Gold coloured T-shirt, with the picture from the cover of Arkangel 5, and a White T-shirt with the picture from the cover of Arkangel 7 (as shown here).

Both are available in XL only, and cost £6. Order from us at Arkangel, BCM 9240, London WC1N 3XX.

The RSPCA has launched a campaign against bull-fighting in the run-up to the Barcelona Olympics. It will petition the Spanish government to end the bloodsport.

ITV Fri 27 Mar

A man is recovering in hospital after being hit repeatedly with an iron bar while attempting to disrupt a foxhunt, the Hunt Saboteurs Association said. Danny Attwood, 21, suffered serious leg injuries when he was attacked as protesters tried to halt the Cottesmore Hunt near Bourne, Lincs, it said. Mr Attwood, from Peterborough, is being treated at the city's district hospital. Police confirmed that a saboteur had been hurt in clashes with hunt supporters and said an investigation was underway.

ITV Fri 3 Apr

About 30 animal rights protesters marched on Aintree racecourse in what they said was the first step in a bid to ban all National Hunt racing. The group marched just over a mile to the Grand National course in Liverpool behind two banners, Stop the Death Race, and Stop the Slaughter. They were escorted by police during the peaceful action and after arriving at the main entrance assembled in a car park opposite for a brief rally. March organiser Neil Lea said it was only a small-scale token demonstration.

ITV Fri 24 Apr

Anti-vivisection campaigners today call for worldwide protests to mark the World Day for Laboratory Animals. Organisers in Britain say tens of thousands of people are expected to observe a minute's silence at noon in protest at animal experiments. But medical researchers say the tests are necessary and claim campaigners are misleading the public.

Three people have been questioned by police after a spate of fire-bomb attacks on animal-related premises in Scotland last year.

BBC1 Tue 16 Jun

Quorn Hunt workers Alan Betts and Christopher Doherty appeared before Loughborough magistrates on firearms charges brought by the League Against Cruel Sports. They deny the charges.

A Letter From Keith

by Keith Mann

You may have seen Keith's letter in that other great animal liberation magazine "Turning Point", but this is the original un-cut version - so read it again!

We are all often a little disgruntled at the way animal liberation people and groups operate; we're not professional enough, etc. This is probably the case. However, when we compare ourselves to the opposition and to other similar groupings, we are top dog. I'll explain.

Look at the police, they have the officers, they have infinite resources, they have the power to smash anyone getting in the way. They've gone all out to smash the ALF lately with intensive surveillance, phone tapping, house bugs, widespread raids and arrests; mailing lists have been stolen along with piles of other materials and equipment. People lucky enough to be bailed are having to live as internal exiles with all kinds of restrictive bail conditions - they even have to ask the courts for permission to leave their home county.

They're going to such extremes because it's become clear the ALF are a force to be reckoned with. In the last couple of years the ALF has claimed responsibility for closing down the Oxford University cat breeding colony at Nuneham Courtenay when they threatened total destruction of the building after rescuing every cat there; relaunching the Boots campaign after raiding their top security laboratory at Thurgarton (since, hundreds of Boots' windows have been smashed; closing down Sky Commercial Rabbits in West Yorkshire when they emptied the farm of rabbits and burnt it to the ground; destroying years of research on mice when they broke into the Royal London Hospital and took the biggest number of animals ever rescued from a British laboratory - this raid cost the researchers over £1.6 million; ending radiation experiments on pigs after releasing video and documentary evidence of the experiments at the Churchill Hospital in Oxford; destroying around 100 cattle trucks / meat lorries in less than 12 months causing no less than £5.5 million worth of damage and increasing security and insurance costs. Dozens of other vehicles have been similarly firebombed, including the Tropical Medicine Centre in Edinburgh where over £200,000 damage was caused. The "Working Terrier" offices in Wigan were totalled and Xenopus Biological Suppliers in Sussex were written off. In just over 12 months over 1,680 laboratory animals have been given freedom and no less than 1,900 other animals. And in the words of Karen Carpenter and several people with a burning desire to see an end to animal abuse, "It's only just begun."

Despite the authorities' show of strength the activity continues unabated. Animal abusers are at a loss as to a way of beating the ALF, as they hopelessly attempt to defend their actions they either tie themselves in knots by telling the public it's necessary and not cruel, or bury their heads in the sand and pretend it's not happening. Instead of changing tactics - ie. improving animal welfare / ending animal abuse - they attempt to protect their property by spending vast amounts of money on security, which invariably fails to stop some very determined people.

We also win hands down on prisoner support. Most people in prison tend to find out the hard way who their friends are. It's a different story for ALF prisoners. The amount of support I've been getting from my friends and people I don't know is heart-warming. Highlights of the day are mail call and visits. Without the support I get through these mediums I'd be much the same as other prisoners - largely non-existent. It's easy to forget or ignore people in prison, but be assured if you end up off the streets you won't be forgotten or on your own. I've got the best friends I could ever hope for and I'll get out of prison stronger and more determined because I know I've got a lot of people behind me and a movement I love. It's also been made very clear to me that there is a massive support for the ALF and that we are stronger and more determined and better organised than the opposition and we're capable of changing the world, and we're right!

Don't ever feel beaten or alone. There are many people with you always. We will, naturally, have set-backs - the killing of Mike Hill was a "set-back", but if anyone uses his death as anything other than a bloody good reason to do twice as much - we've failed him. The future is ours, let's take it.

I'll leave you with the words of an owner of a fleet of refrigerated meat lorries ("Reefer's"), firebombed by the ALF; "They daubed paint on the wagons and smashed a few windows and they'd put sugar in the tanks. But I never expected them to go to these lengths, never in a million years." They all expect it now, and they know perfectly well why.

Image

by Badger

Image, is all the general public seem to be concerned with. What other reason would there be for their ceaseless appetite for gameshows full of happy middle-class people and colourful commercials proclaiming the goodness of the animal abusing multinational companies? Witness the success of burger chain adverts and the immorality of "We are lucky cows" from a well known butter commercial.

People do not want to see the truth behind the gloss that is modern life. The animal rights movement has to address the problem of image, if it is ever to succeed in bringing about animal liberation.

When people watch demonstrations on television, all they see are what they perceive to be hippies with nothing better to do. They see a scruffy mass who are inconsistent in their beliefs. I was at a demo recently and had the misfortune to be behind a group of students who were all patting themselves on the back for, as they saw it, saving the world. I then watched these same students once back at the rally tucking into their cheese and egg sandwiches. They were as much a part of the systematic abuse and torture of animals as the people who were calling them hippies.

Vegans in the movement need to lead by example and be intelligent, thoughtful and enthusiastic about what they say and how they put themselves across.

Why do so many people in the movement have to be so damn dull and depressing to talk to? Show people they can change if only they put their minds to it, be friendly and outgoing and people will warm to you and only then will they start to listen and see the person inside and not be blinded by their own bigotry.

I realise the subject matter of our cause is horrific and does depress the mind, but if we convey only this image we will just switch people off. We need to educate others in the truth behind the mask of contented farm animals and show them the real life horror that is the vivisection laboratory.

Who do the public see as the intellectual "leaders" of the animal rights movement? Is it caring people who look after unwanted animals in sanctuaries or others who risk imprisonment in trying to liberate animals and damage the animal abuse industry? No I don't think it is, I think they believe the "leaders" who only come out of the woodwork now and again to condemn the latest act of sabotage committed by "misguided people who are damaging the movement", why do the public believe these people, it isn't because they have digested the facts and made a well informed judgement, the only thing that they have considered is the image being conveyed to them through the media. They see a nice cosy man or woman who is no threat to their immoral lifestyles.

To have any hope of reaching these people, we must change our method of presentation to one which they can relate to.

A COMMON CAUSE?

by "Oakhorse"

The arrival of Arkangel 7 was more than welcome and eagerly awaited. In my view there is no other which firstly provides the same inspiration through information and news, and secondly is so instrumental in promoting unity within our movement. Unfortunately, in my experience it is the second of these requirements which is still in need of attention.

Who would deny that the struggle we are part of is frustrating? While I write this, while you read it, animals are terrorised in labs, they are now screaming wildly as they await death on abattoir conveyor belts, they are losing their habitat and safety in the wild, etc. We all want desperately to stop this. Tomorrow is too late, yet we also realise that being unrealistic in our aims is going to deny us the chance of progress. It tears me apart, it tears each of us into despair at times.

Our movement has a variety of beliefs, attitudes and aspirations, and to an extent we must follow those that are our own. But the whole is greater than the sum of the parts - sometimes we have to work together. It is then we have to sacrifice some of our own feelings for the good of the cause. So many times recently I have seen minor disagreements, and even personal dislike affect and undermine the success of pro-animal groups and actions. I think we should all - and that means all - ask ourselves some questions. Ask yourself why you are involved in animal rights. Is your involvement influenced by friends or an image you want to project? Are your feelings and commitment strong enough to mean you're prepared to make concessions on your own satisfaction or enjoyment if it's for the good of the cause? Are you prepared to work with your most hated enemy on a pro-animal promotion, demo, hunt sab, ALF action, etc. as long as doing so is going to help an animal? Or are your own social, egotistical or other personal goals more important to you? These are points we all need to think deeply on, the disruption I have seen due to disunity is horrendous for the animals - and what I've seen cannot be more than the tip of the iceberg. Unnecessary personal bickering has driven people from our movement, and discouraged people from doing more. It undermines what is being done, and is an enormous diversion of energy and resources. These effects are real - I've seen them.

I can honestly say that many of the most wonderful and stimulating people I have met, I met through animal rights, as are most of my best loved and valued friends. But differences are inevitable and must be accommodated. Anyone who is capable of maintaining a modicum of sanity in this world where a holocaust is continually unleashed on animals has no excuse for being unable to deal with the stress of doing something about it.

Many of us make sacrifices for the cause, so is foregoing a little personal gratification in return for a stronger movement too much to ask for? The problem of animal abuse is too important for disagreements to inhibit us, the suffering is forever with us. We are suffering with them. When your commitment to the animals is genuine it is not difficult to rise above personality clashes. I question the motivation and aims of those who find difficulty in this.

The animal abusers are organised. We are going to get much further if we can work on common ground, not merely give vent to the frustration in our hearts.

(We did edit this letter, but only to reduce repetition, not content!)

A Small Betrayal?

by Deborah Bennett

The problem with having a tiny, shady garden in an area highly populated with cats, dogs and people alike is that the birds are reluctant to land on any but the most accessible and leafy points, and if they do that they soon clear off again when a "potential enemy" is moving around. Because of this, the various mini-animals in the garden multiply unnaturally into such huge numbers that plants edible to slugs, snails and greenfly are doomed to a lace-like, shrivelled, then extinguished existence.

Many years ago, before I realised a vegan was anything other than a fibber, I had "in desperation" bought a tube of slug pellets to strew in my damp, stony, snailly and sluggy garden. But the next morning I realised the significance of my guilty act. All around the garden, on the path and paving-stones, writhed and squirmed hundreds of agonised slugs and snails. I never imagined such numbers even existed in this tiny garden. Now each former muncher-of-plants tortuously seethed or thrashed out its last betrayed hours of life. Some had huge bubbles coming from their orifices, others feebly lolled out of their shells, barely moving. I had imagined, if anything, that they would be instantly unconscious, then compost, after eating the efficient-looking pellets - how efficient our brains are of self-deceit! Nothing could save these creatures the pain of their dying moments except for a few hard bashes with a boulder or hammer. But, such was my guilt and self-revulsion at the massacre-field before me, that I turned away even from this last "responsibility". I told myself that creatures this simple could surely feel no pain.

Even now, I go white at the words "slug pellets". Slugs and snails abound in the garden. If I was less lazy, I would pick up the visible ones daily, and take them in a bucket to a quiet common or patch of wasteland. Instead, I pick up pockets of them and put them on hardier or less-favoured plants than the slugs' (and my) favourites - pansies! Often I put slugs and snails on a shady wall where there is a greater hope of birds calling after I have gone.

Another naughty trick is to tip out slugs and snails on the border between my garden and my non-gardening neighbour's, which is lushly overgrown with sumptuous weeds, so there's a 50-50 chance my slimy friends will end up there, no loss to my neighbour, the slugs or the birds. And I am learning to appreciate slugs and snails as individual creatures. When moving one large snail from a pansy plant to a hardier species it deliberately turned its head around and curiously extended all four "feelers". I had a distinct feeling I was being thoroughly scrutinised - by an individual, responsive, conscious animal.

Autumn Flurries?

by Martin Masterman-Lister

I heard today from a totally reliable person that New Scotland Yard's Bomb Squad is touring the pharmaceutical companies of Britain, giving them advice on security against bombs, and ALF activist's actions.

This friend was party to a meeting at which a member of the Yard's Bomb Squad gave a talk to a pharmaceutical company's personnel on how to spot suspicious packaging, what to do with them, who to inform about suspicious packages, etc.

At this talk, the second one this year at this company, the name Ronnie Lee was mentioned, saying that he would be released around November. The officer warned the company's personnel that the police are expecting a flurry of activity in the weeks following Ronnie's release from prison, "...so crimes will escalate!"

The officer also implied that the new Chair of the Vegan Society, Louise Wallace, was "...causing bombs..." by having formerly taken a job at SmithKline Beecham and reporting information gained from her job there.

Snakeskin

by Myrna R Forrester

With the closure of fur shops and fur departments within stores, the battle against the fur trade appears to be won, but I notice that John Lewis stores (and no doubt others) stock real snakeskin products. Although it may be more difficult for some people to empathise with reptiles than with the more appealing furry creatures, the reptile trade involves much cruelty, species can be endangered, and ecological balances upset.

John Lewis claim that the snakes used in their products are farmed and are not taken from the wild, but the Reptile Protection Trust know of no true snake "farms", that is, totally self-sufficient, closed-cycle systems. Some snakes are ranched, where captive breeding is supplemented from wild sources - but the trade in snakes relies heavily on wild-caught animals.

John Lewis say that the snakes are humanely killed by electrocution. Beauty Without Cruelty, the Reptile Protection Trust, and the University Foundation for Animal Welfare all agree that electrocution is not a humane way to kill snakes (or any species of reptile). In fact, there is no sure way to kill snakes painlessly.

John Lewis have stated in a letter to me that they will not buy snakeskin products in future unless they are satisfied that "the product does not come from an endangered species and that the method of killing is entirely acceptable."

Will readers please help to convince them that the reptile trade endangers species and upsets the ecological balance of their habitats and, even more importantly, that there is NO SURE WAY OF KILLING SNAKES HUMANELY, by writing a polite letter of appeal to, Mr P T Lewis, Chairman, John Lewis Partnership, 171 Victoria Street, London, SW1E 5NN.

State your abhorrence at the sale of any goods, in particular reptile products, which have involved cruelty in their production. Point out that there are humane alternatives - synthetic leathers which can also be produced with a "reptile" finish. Ask them to remove their reptile skin products from stock immediately. I believe that enough polite letters of appeal could help persuade them to do so.

GEFMR

Len Arrowsmith

The Campaign to End Fraudulent Medical Research (GEFMR) is dedicated to bringing about the total, immediate abolition of vivisection, on the grounds that animal-based research is unscientific and that its consequent misleading results are harmful to human health. Animal experiments are a scientific fraud because the results can never be extrapolated to human beings. The simple fact is that animals are not like us, their bodies are different, they suffer from different diseases, and a disease induced artificially in a laboratory is never the same as the disease that arises spontaneously in the human body.

It is essential to destroy the myth that animal experiments save human lives. There is undeniable evidence that animal experiments are not only useless and a criminal waste of money, but are damaging to human health.

Since its formation in 1987 GEFMR has distributed thousands of books and videos, and obtained important press coverage. Hundreds of thousands of leaflets have been distributed, and public meetings have been held up and down the country, informing ever-increasing numbers of people about the fact that animal-based research is not science.

In March 1990, GEFMR initiated the foundation of "Doctors in Britain Against Animal Experiments" (DBAE), which is the first society in this country of Doctors, Pharmacists, Medical Scientists and Veterinarians to call for the total, immediate abolition of animal experiments on medical and scientific grounds. DBAE received extensive radio, television and press coverage.

"Alternatives" to Animal "Research"

GEFMR believes that the promotion of "alternatives" as replacements to animal experiments is misleading because it implies that vivisection is useful and therefore worth replacing. It also suggests that vivisection can only be abolished when sufficient replacements have been found. Animal experiments are NOT science and must be abolished. Genuine scientific research is totally different and cannot be compared to animal experiments, which are unscientific.

GEFMR is not against true methods of research and testing such as human cell and tissue culture, and computer simulations of human physiology, but believe these should not be considered as even similar to animal experiments.

NOT CONVINCED!

by David Plews

I felt compelled to write to you at Arkangel in response to a letter in issue 7 by Mrs V A Vince.

I agree with the majority of her comments, but one point in particular is very worrying to me. Mrs Vince says that in an ideal world, the population would become vegetarian or vegan. Fine so far! However, she then goes on to say that animals like cows could be kept for their milk alone, sheep for their fleece, pigs and horses for their dung, chickens, ducks and geese for their eggs, and so on. She states that these animals could be put down "humanely" on site when their days of useful and natural productivity come to an end.

I find this idea horrifying. As a vegan, I look forward to a world where people don't use animal products. Her idea of an ideal world is very different from mine.

People do not need any of the aforementioned products, and I find it disturbing to hear a fellow animal rights supporter talking about animals being kept for human benefit. This can never be justified. The idea of putting them down humanely on site is disgusting to me. Why should they be put down at all?

Mrs Vince quotes a poem which says that animals don't live for us alone. I say that they don't live for us at all! (Or at least they should not have to.)

The two main animal rights, in my view, are; firstly, The Right to Life, and secondly, The Right to Freedom. Both of these are total rights. That is, the right to life means until the animal dies of natural causes. The right to freedom means total freedom - freedom from ownership!

No world which failed to promote these basic animal rights could be called "ideal". What right does a human being have to end the life of any other being, no matter how well it has been treated, or how humane the slaughter? I personally do not think any slaughter can be called humane. If Hitler had killed the Holocaust victims "humanely", or treated them well before their deaths, would his crimes have been any less? I think not.

Only when the world comes to realise that animals are entirely independent beings, not tools for human use - however humane - can animals truly be said to have rights. I think that to talk about welfare suggests that we are superior to animals, and that they need us to look after them. This is not so.

Mrs Vince quotes Jack Richards as saying that we should renounce, amongst other things, greed and selfishness. She is right, for only then will the struggle be over.

Hounded to Death

by Emily
Lynch

Valient she'd run, the hounds on her heels
Exhausted, retreating her legs so unsteady
Returned to her cubs to muffle their squeals
Guarding her earth, teeth bared at the ready.

Thugs with their spades and crow-bars surrounding Enter their terriers to do all their worst.
The terrified vixen her swollen heart pounding
Is pulled from her young by those so accursed.

Her shuddering body all bleeding and torn
Is thrown to the hounds for amusement and thrills.
Her precious life taken on that frosty morn
No feeling, no mercy is shown on those hills.

The vixen whose life so cruelly was taken
Lies slumped in the ditch, her body in shreds.
The young cubs below, their hunger awakened
Left to their fate of starvation and death.

Not ConVincEd (Too?)

by Martin Masterman-Lister

It is wonderful to see Arkangel back in print again. Thanks to all the contributors to No. 7. As an animal rights supporter and a long time vegan, I feel it necessary to reply to some of the statements made by Mrs V A Vince in her article headed "Animal Rights".

Whilst I agree that having "Joe Public" on our side is of great importance, it is not the sole goal of our actions. Many actions and events have taken place, and will take place in the future, which "Joe Public" has been, and will be outraged by, but which have brought us further forward - nearer to our goal of eradicating animal exploitation. Whilst I agree that "Joe Public" writing en masse to Members of Parliament will fill the post bags with voters' views and may sway MPs' voting on current issues, I don't believe it is the only way to end exploitation. I feel, as others evidently do as shown by the rising number of animal rights magazines, societies and vegetarians/vegans, that there are other forms of "gentle persuasion", some legal, some illegal. As for bringing pressure on the judiciary to pass harsher sentences, forget it, they just maintain and enforce a system set up by Parliament.

I discovered animal rights in 1982 when, on leave from work, I happened to turn the television on and saw cattle being loaded into a lorry which was to take them to an abattoir. I knew, don't ask me how, that they had some idea of their fate. I could see in their faces that they knew they were going to die. At that time I was a meat-eating, milk-drinking, leather-wearing omnivore who poked fun at veggies. That afternoon I became a vegetarian, albeit a lax one. Over the years that followed, I discovered that just giving up the flesh of an animal was not the summit as far as animal rights, in my case, were concerned. I had to move further than lacto-vegetarianism.

Gradually, with increasing confidence and knowledge, I did give up animal exploitation products. Notable in this transition was the Mars Bar scare; yes, at the time, I ate Mars Bars too. Without the scare, I doubt that my transition would have been as fast, if as far, as it ended up becoming. Try arguing with omnivores that the Mars Bar scare was a worthwhile strategy whilst eating a milk chocolate bar! You won't get far.

Mrs Vince goes on to state that 'the "one crumb of comfort" comes with knowing that however painful and traumatic the lead-up to death and death itself is; with death comes peace, and in itself, a blessing.' Well, I've heard some ridiculous statements in my time but this one is a classic, especially coming from a supporter of animal rights. Has Mrs Vince considered what she has written?

To make my point, imagine you are an animal in an abattoir or a vivisection laboratory. You are suffering intolerable, chronic, unnecessary pain. You are well aware of your fate, and although the pain is chronic, you remember what Mrs Vince has told you in her article, "that however painful and traumatic the lead-up to death and death itself is; with death comes peace, and in itself, a blessing." "Oh great," you'd no doubt think, "I'll be dead soon, and then it will be no more chronic pain, just death, and with death comes peace. Oh great! It is nice to know that, I'm glad I read Arkangel 7."

Non-human animals are different to we human animals. I don't have any pets, neither do I want any. As for livestock becoming "loving and loyal as pets known to domesticity...", I neither want nor hope that livestock become pets. Livestock is live stock - living commodity - and I don't want any stock or goods in the form of animals. In my ideal utopian world, non-human animals are free from trade just as we human animals are free, because when we are not free, we are slaves or commodities. I would never keep cows for their milk alone, just as I would never keep cows for their ability to keep the grass short. Cows' milk is for calves, not for humans. It was never intended for humans and never will be. The same goes for sheep, pigs, chickens. Through selective breeding, these animals have been chosen for their ability to produce certain commodities for ostensibly human uses. Sheep with tightly-packed wool fleeces are bred for their fleece, just as cows are bred and chosen for their ability to produce milk in ever larger quantities.

How can Mrs Vince write that, "In the ideal world ... other animals with no apparent use in the commercial sense, would have no need whatsoever to justify their Earthly existence other than to add variety and interest to life." I know we don't live in an ideal world, but why should they have to justify their existence now? When I'm out in the countryside, I don't try to converse with animals and get them to justify themselves. They don't have to, I accept them for what they are. Why should they have no apparent use? Why do they need to be useful at all to exist? What use is a human to the world other than in sustaining the human way of life?

Finally, I'm an atheist, so giving religious quotations does nothing for me. Has Mrs Vince ever considered the churches' huge role in animal suffering?

THE NATIONAL NEUTERING AND SPAYING SCHEME

by Bev Cowley

This year, the RSPCA will destroy in excess of 73,000 unwanted dogs and cats. For many, this untimely end will be the final chapter in a life of misery. With the incidence of mistreatment, cruelty and neglect so widespread, the solution does not lie in "mopping up" after society's indifference. The solution lies in the elimination of the circumstances which bring about the suffering. This can only be achieved by the dramatic reduction in the number of animals born.

Domestic animals are our creation. We destroyed the natural habitat of the wolf; hunted it to near extinction and bred it down to a biddable dependant, capable of just about surviving our urbanisation of its environment. Wolves have been forced to trade complex social and family groupings, freedom and wide horizons to become dogs. The majority of dogs exist in cities, in flats, in isolation. Basic instincts are suppressed, expression of natural behaviour chastised as dirty or bad, and these we consider the lucky ones. For many more, a short-lived entertainment becomes a hindrance and they are cast out onto the streets to run the gauntlet of abuse, starvation and injury.

Cats evolved to hunt. Their physiology and nature made them expert predators, until humans - fascinated by their unfettered disposition - stepped in to tame and then denature them. Stripping away the qualities they displayed that we as humans lacked, we sought to subdue that which we envied. So cats were bred, not to fend for themselves, but to be grateful for offerings of the processed bodies of animals we see fit to give them.

Society cannot be relied upon to regulate its treatment of animals. The odds are stacked so heavily against dogs and cats receiving a reasonable life, that the only solution lies in prevention. This involves the rapid deceleration in the number of animals being born. Prompted by this belief, the National Neutering and Spaying Scheme was formed.

The scheme has broadly three aims; firstly to generate funds for the neutering and spaying of all abandoned animals prior to rehoming, then to develop the scheme to provide a cheap or free neutering service open to all - nationwide. Secondly, to establish a network of "rehomers" so as to increase the possibility of resettling unwanted animals in suitable homes. And thirdly, to promote a better understanding of animals, their needs and our obligations to them.

The organisation is new; its task is immense, but the prospect of success makes it a challenge worth facing. It involves no paid staff as funds will be quickly swallowed up by neutering and spaying programmes.

We require committed people and groups to help us raise the enormous funds required, to campaign with us and begin the task of re-educating the public. Leaflets are available, but please send a donation to cover the cost. We need contacts for our network, information and help. There is no glory or excitement in this campaign, and goals will be achieved slowly, but it does, if successful, offer the prospect of a society without figures for reported cruelty of 86,000 per year and the annual destruction of 73,000+ healthy animals.

Farm for Animal Rights

by Peter Gillard

Just the title is enough to send vibrations of anger through the body, I can imagine the "hands thrown up to the face in horror" at the mere suggestion, after all, isn't it one of the main areas of abuse? Well, yes, - and no, I am not about to embark upon a long, drawn-out explanation differentiating between farmers that grow cereals and other crops, and farmers that use animals. (Just for the record, very few farmers do not have a link with animals anyway, either directly or indirectly, since even food intended for human consumption will be sold as animal feed if it fails to reach the required standard.)

No, what I am talking about is ostensibly being a farmer. That is, to look into the possibility of purchasing a registered farm, solely or jointly, as in a cooperative arrangement, and gleaning the benefits that are available in terms of grants, subsidies and income.

Still confused? Let me explain. Farmers for years have at the expense of the tax-payers been getting - and are still receiving - money hand over fist. What I am suggesting is the potential to actually have an effect on animal abuse, and to get paid for it!! The purists amongst you will no doubt consider that to actually take part in a clearly immoral system would be to condone such practices. My response to that is - there is enough money poured into the coffers of animal abusers, farmers, vivisectioners, chemical and drug companies to name but a few, so that if it is possible to direct some funding, however small, into the hands of people who care about animal, human and environmental issues, it can only be for the greater good.

Space and time prevent me from exploring the politics and ethics of my reasoning in greater detail, so in brevity, I will concede that the idea may not appeal to all, and I would further concede that perhaps my ideas might have no major impact on the problem. I will however stress the importance that we should at least consider the idea, as another way of helping the cause.

The basic idea is to purchase a farm. The farm can still generate income, but in a totally compassionate way. I would draw your attention to the recent and on-going negotiations within the EC, namely, the CAP reforms, linked to the Macsharry report. The purpose of these is designed to safe-guard farmers' incomes. There are also areas that can attract financial benefits which will not compromise your stance on animal/environmental issues. Namely a policy of "set-aside" to encourage landowners to refrain from cropping and to hopefully reduce European food mountains. A payment of approximately £80+ per acre is currently being paid.

Then there is what is called the "Farm Woodland Premium Scheme". This is designed to make Britain more self-sufficient in wood production, to enhance the countryside visually, and to encourage landowners to reduce food production. Grants to compensate for the cost of planting, aftercare, etc., plus an income of up to 15 years are on offer. Grants and income vary depending on the acreage planted and species of trees, but, in the best scenario, one can realise around £1100 per acre grant (one-off payment), and an annual income for 15 years of approximately £120 per acre. Not exactly the fortunes farmers are making (despite their tiresome claims of poverty - does anybody know a poor farmer?), but a potential income that one can consider to be cruelty-free.

This of course is just for starters as income can be derived from many ideas - the most obvious being from veganic/organic produce, where demand outstrips availability at the moment.

I am writing this to excite people into looking at alternative ways to help the cause, not as a replacement to what they do now, but as a way of living. I will list the possible benefits of such a project - no doubt they can be added to depending on one's convictions and depth of spirituality.

A unit (farm) taken out of the system of animal abuse would have a favourable impact on the environment. If trees are planted, ponds or wetlands established, pesticides and herbicides not used (grant-aided), it would obviously protect and attract wildlife. Hunting and fishing cannot take place on your land. There would be educational opportunities to show that there is an alternative way to use land. Self-sufficiency; income from the land, growing your own produce, pursuance of alternative energy sources - the list is endless in this category.

I know full well that many have tried and succeeded in establishing similar projects as cooperatives. This article is purely intended to highlight what is available in terms of grants, etc. and to excite people into action if they have ever considered this kind of lifestyle, or were seeking possible alternative (and ethical) incomes.

The atmosphere that can be created in such an environment can also be conducive to expanding one's own spirituality - at one with nature, pace of life, lending time for reflection, time for people, time for Mother Earth (please read Father if you feel this to be sexist!!).

I hear even as I type, the united voices of the pessimists among you, "If it's so good, why doesn't he try it??" The answer, my friends, is I have, and with my wife Kathryn, continue to do so!

A Letter to the Home Secretary

Asociacion para la Defensa de la Erica

This is a copy of a letter from a Spanish group. We reproduce it exactly and ask you to make allowance for the shaky English!

We are sure you have confirmed once more, since 1986, that millions of people in the world thoroughly resent the fact that Mr Ronnie Lee, press officer of "Animal Liberation", remains in jail in England, officially considered as an outlaw by the Court which judged him and sentenced him to spend ten years in prison in those days.

Mr Lee's crime, from the point of view of that court, was struggling on behalf of animals who were victims of human cruelty; innocent sentient beings who had been condemned to endure torture till their death by honest and respectable British citizens who may still think being an animal is some kind of crime of inferiority in itself, deserving to be punished by a superior race.

This is the reason why Mr Ronnie Lee is still in jail, which means his compassion also was and still is supposed to be a crime deserving to be severely punished.

We are not trying to be ironical about these facts. We only hope time has been working on behalf of everybody's mental evolution, including British justice's.

This is not the first time we openly and publicly proclaim our solidarity towards Mr Lee's behaviour. We hope to help building a world where Mr Lee's brave and honest behaviour will be considered as an example by those who are already learning that a form of authoritarianism which includes manufacturing terror and suffering will never lead the world to become a true civilization, but to self-destruction.

Please bear in mind, dear sir, that we belong to a country which is the only one in Europe where cruelty against animals is not considered as a crime in its penal code, and please be absolutely sure that the majority of Spaniards is not proud of having to admit that being a citizen of "animals' hell" includes having to admit also a shameful lack of culture which cannot be justified by one single word of excuse in the present world.

Bearing in mind also that up to now, and for more than a century, England has been leading the way regarding a legislation which protects animals from cruelty and torture, we would be pleased to learn that his case has been reviewed in order to grant him parole and give him the opportunity of proving that, not only morally but intellectually, he deserves living, thinking and working out of a type of cages which by all means has not been conceived to lodge the kindness, vision and generosity of men who respect themselves enough to struggle on behalf of the enlightening power of Justice.

If he is supposed to understand why he had to endure such an experience, we are sure that the duty of English jurisprudence is to understand that while time marches on, human mind advances, not only historically but socially and scientifically, discovering today what were its limitations yesterday. It has taken the spirit of Darwin more than one hundred and fifty years to prove, through micro-biology, that he never invented a theory but that he was the first one in his days who managed to read in life like others read in a book.

May this example serve to become aware that the anti-slavery attitude of Ronnie Lee has not merely been inspired by the suffering of animals, but by a universal concept of Justice that no intellectual mistake will ever be able to discredit or deny again. Because this is today already an indisputable fact, supported by all the most serious humane institutions and organisations in the world, and because England can be proud again of being the cradle of a civilized initiative, we sincerely trust Ronnie Lee will be granted the privilege he so much deserves.

Standing on the defence of ethics as we do, and our efforts being what they are in a country which officially recognises them in spite of the fact that it hasn't applied yet its results to an educational programme which inevitably will have to be modified to match the intellectual demands of the unified cultural level of Europe, we would consider it an honour to have been heard by you in this particular circumstance and thus to have contributed to support a British citizen whose ethical behaviour we respect and admire.

Fight Back Against McDonald's

by "London Greenpeace"

Seven years ago London Greenpeace initiated a campaign against the giant multinational McDonald's. The campaign exposed McDonald's profiteering from the destruction of the environment, wastefulness, exploitation of workers and consumers, murder of animals and the peddling of unhealthy food. A factsheet - "What's wrong with McDonald's? Everything they don't want you to know" - was written detailing these practices.

The response to this campaign has been amazing, thousands of people around the world are now involved, and a World Day of Action Against McDonald's is held every 16th October, the United Nations' "World Food Day".

McDonald's are worried about this widespread opposition and have threatened legal action against a number of groups and individuals - many of whom have apologised in order to avoid bankruptcy, as it is extremely expensive to fight a libel case.

'Well, that explains the bag!'

In 1989, McDonald's began paying spies to infiltrate meetings and events of London Greenpeace, and to follow people home. In 1990, they issued writs against some of the people that had been at those meetings or events. The writs alleged that McDeath had been libelled in the factsheet produced by London Greenpeace, and demanded apologies.

The case has dragged on slowly since the writs were issued, probably in an attempt by McDonald's to wear down and intimidate the two remaining defendants. However, the two have made it clear that they intend to fight the case and will not give in to McDonald's threats, and the case is expected to be heard in early 1993. Legal Aid is not available for libel cases so donations towards defence legal costs will be gratefully received at the address below. More important is to show McDonald's they cannot silence the campaign with threats, and to step up protests against them. Picket your local McDonald's regularly, and in particular organise a picket on 16th October as part of the World Day of Action Against McDonald's. If you live in London come along to a picket of McDonald's Head Office on that day, from 4.30 - 6.30pm, at High Road, N2, next to East Finchley Underground Station.

Vegan Footwear from Alchuringa

Readers might be interested to know about a women's co-operative shoe company that makes totally vegan, non-frumpy and made to measure footwear by mail order.

Alchuringa operates from a small, unpretentious stable block tucked away in the heart of Wales. They offer a wide range of handmade shoes, boots and sandals for both men and women - 40 designs to be exact. Plus a small selection of bags and a couple of designs for children.

There are a variety of colours: black, tan, dark brown, poppy red, dark blue and dark green. The material used boasts all the qualities of leather, ie. weatherproof, durable, light, and it breathes - only it hasn't come from the backs of murdered animals. All footwear is fully lined, and the sole is made from a non-slip crepe material that is repairable. There is a choice of three toe shapes, including the natural curved toe shape.

Orders take approximately 30 days to complete and the staff are friendly, helpful and accommodating - they cater for awkward feet and will re-do orders if you are not entirely happy with the outcome.

Considering all of the work that goes into the footwear and the immense choice, the prices are very reasonable - plus they offer a repairs service.

It all sounds too good to be true doesn't it? Well, send an SAE for a full illustrated catalogue and see for yourself...

Remember that letters to prisoners are opened, read and censored - so please don't write anything that might get them, or you, into trouble!

We ask you to look at the wholesome food we, and all our friends in the other pictures are surrounded by. Isn't it sad that so many people choose to eat animals like us as well as these good things? We cannot imagine why. We've never done them any harm; they don't need to eat us to keep healthy, and doing so wastes an awful lot of land.

Fancy using tons of valuable plant foods to build up our bodies for meat, when the food could be grown to feed all those hungry human beings in the world instead. It doesn't make any sense. These nuts around us are bloodless and cruelty-free. They are good for you....and us. Remember these, and please be a voice for us. Be our Friend.

THE ROAD TO VICTORY

A special police squad nicknamed "The Badger Set" has been formed in Oxfordshire to enforce the Badger Act which gives greater protection to the animals (Times 27/1/92).

Following pressure from conservationists, the fertilizer company Fisons, has handed over 8,000 acres of peatlands in various regions for use as nature reserves (Western Morning News 31/1/92).

The British government said that it would oppose the resumption of the trade in ivory and other elephant products (Times 19/2/92).

Government ministers promised to tighten controls on the import of wild birds and to press for improved conditions for farm animals throughout the EC (Times 28/2/92).

The Red Squirrel and the Dormouse are to be rescued from the edge of extinction under a £45 million, 3 year package of measures to improve the environment and countryside unveiled by the government. The Natterjack Toad and two species of moth also benefit (Telegraph 28/2/92).

More than £1,500 is to be spent on railings, a 4ft high fence and road warning signs to protect 2 swans which have begun nesting at Long Itchington, Warwicks (Sunday Telegraph 8/3/92).

The Environment Secretary launched an £11 million scheme to create a nature reserve on 2,500 acres in Teeside (Telegraph 9/3/92).

The Queen issued a plea to the peoples of the Earth to save the natural environment from destruction in a message to mark Commonwealth Day (Times 9/3/92).

3 coastal mudflats, important to birds, and an inland marsh are to get extra protection. The Exe estuary in Devon, Old Hall marshes on Essex's Blackwater estuary and part of Lindisfarne, Northumberland have been classed as Special Protected Areas for Birds, and all three, together with Chippenham Fen in Norfolk have been designated as Wetlands of International Importance (Telegraph 12/3/92).

Hunt supporter Mark Fuller was fined £1,050 and ordered to pay £1,461 compensation and £150 costs when Hunstanton magistrates found him guilty of 3 charges of criminal damage and one of threatening behaviour towards hunt sabs (Telegraph 14/3/92).

The annual report of the Imperial Cancer Research Fund stressed the increasing role of non-animal research tools in a bid to reduce tests on animals (Telegraph 18/3/92).

Britons are consuming less fat, eggs and meat according to the National Food Survey. Since 1980, egg consumption is down by about 38% per person and meat consumption by about 17% (Times 25/3/92).

At a conference in Kyoto, Japan, the number of species receiving CITES protection was increased to cover 45 types of marine animals and tropical trees. 35 species were transferred from Appendix II (regulated trade) to Appendix I (trade totally prohibited), and the American Black Bear was put on Appendix II. Catch quotas for the West Atlantic Red Tuna were reduced and a resolution adopted allowing greater pressure to be put on non-CITES countries to stop the trade in rhinoceros horn (Le Monde 14/3/92).

18 European countries have launched government-backed projects to encourage people to change their lifestyles in order to protect the environment (Die Welt 1/4/92).

The EC and the nations surrounding the Baltic Sea have committed themselves to adopting stronger measures to protect the Baltic, which takes into account nature conservancy and species diversity (Die Welt 10/4/92).

The Co-op bank is to cease doing business with companies involved in foxhunting, stag hunting and the fur trade under a wide-ranging ethical policy to be launched in May (Telegraph 25/4/92).

The World Bank wants to make about £15,000 million available until the end of the century for environmental protection in the Third World (Die Welt 27/4/92).

Following a campaign by environmental groups, Fisons is to sell off its horticulture division, meaning peat will no longer be extracted from important wildlife areas (Telegraph 1/5/92).

According to a report published by the Broadcasting Standards Council, scenes on TV of cruelty to animals offended teenagers more than those which portray explicit sex and violence (Telegraph 19/5/92).

County wildlife trusts are to be offered grants from a £150,000 fund set up to improve management of special sites. 2,000 hectares of lagoons, mudflats and lowland heath at Minmere - Walberswick in Suffolk is to be designated as an EC Special Protection Area for birds (Telegraph 20/5/92).

Wildlife is thriving on 2,000 acres of unspoiled meadows, woods and wetlands at Gatwick, West Sussex. The reserve has been created over 15 years at a cost of £10 million to promote Gatwick's claim to be Britain's "green" airport (Telegraph 1/6/92).

EuroMP's have voted overwhelmingly for an effective EC-wide ban on animal testing of cosmetics and want Community governments to endorse their decision and outlaw the sale of animal-tested cosmetics from January 1998 (Western Morning News 12/6/92).

At the Earth Summit in Rio de Janeiro, prime minister John Major announced that Britain is to contribute an extra £100 million to help replenish the international fund set up to preserve the world's environment. He also committed Britain to measures designed to tackle global warming, pollution and extinction of species (Telegraph 13/6/92).

Salmon have returned to the River Trent almost a century after pollution and building of weirs drove them away (Sunday Telegraph 14/6/92).

The Earth Summit in Rio de Janeiro ended with more than 100 world leaders endorsing a philosophy to save the planet and a programme to put it into practice. The worldwide pursuit of sustainable development or green growth was sanctioned as the only viable response to Third World poverty and global environment degradation (Times 15/6/92).

Compared with 2 years ago, 45% of consumers are eating less beef, 40% less pork and 37% less lamb (Times 20/6/92).

The government is to introduce measures to restrict fishing for cockles in the Solway Firth. The RSPB has been calling for such restrictions for some time because over-fishing has hit bird populations and other wildlife (Times 24/6/92).

Britain's swan population has risen by 25% in 5 years. RSPB officials believe the increase is because anglers have stopped using lead weights (Telegraph 26/6/92).

Cambridgeshire County Council is to supply £40,000 worth of poplar trees and bushes to farmers in the county in a planting scheme aimed at saving the Golden Oriole. The bird is under threat because of the felling of poplars in its breeding grounds in the Cambridgeshire fenlands (Times 29/6/92).

S CIRCUS

ITCHER est. 19

ARKANGEL EXTRA

You will probably have noticed immediately that this issue of Arkangel is bigger than the previous two issues - and we are pleased to announce that, following various difficulties caused by police action and a lack of money, the magazine is finally able to return to its original size. We would like to thank all our subscribers for having stuck with us through the difficult times, and now Arkangel can promise not only a better magazine, but much, much more.

In the first edition it was stated that Arkangel was not intended to be just a magazine, but that there were plenty of plans for the future for various services to help the animal rights movement as a whole, and local groups in particular. These plans are now in the process of being realized and several Arkangel projects are being set up.

Arkangel Information is a service which provides local animal rights groups with as much information as possible about both animal abuse and animal abusers in their own areas. At present, many local groups only have a limited knowledge about this. For instance, it may be known that a local laboratory performs experiments on animals, or that there is a fur shop lingering on around the corner, but details of those experiments, or the home address of the proprietor of the fur shop may be lacking. Also, a local group may not be aware that a firm in their area manufactures equipment for animal experiments or cages for battery hens.

For this reason Arkangel is getting together a team of researchers who will compile information from science libraries, specialist publications, etc. This information will be stored on computer and local AR groups will be sent printouts relating to their area with future issues of Arkangel magazine. The system will also work in reverse, so that if a local group needs specific information for a campaign they can contact Arkangel and we will do our best to supply it.

Arkangel International is a project for helping the animal rights movements in other countries. The movement in this country is the most advanced in the world and we feel more needs to be done to assist campaigners abroad. Our main aim will be to help set up networks of local animal rights groups in other countries. The strength of the movement in this country lies in local groups, whereas in many other countries the movement seems to be very centralized and often little happens on a local level. We intend to help change that situation for the better.

We also intend to do all that we can to help campaigners abroad - we have already helped to set up the Anti-Bullfighting Committee as a branch of the Comité Antitaurino, which campaigns against bullfights and cruel fiestas in Spain (for more info about the ABC - see the National Campaigns section).

Arkangel Publications has been set up to publish material useful to the AR movement, especially where such material is non-existent at present (or virtually so), or where we can produce it in a form which is especially useful to AR campaigners. One of our first publications, for example, will be a booklet exposing the cruelties of horse racing - a subject about which little is known in AR circles. We also have plans for booklets on the major forms of animal persecution which will be of particular use to school students.

Arkangel will also promote the initiation of various AR organisations and campaigns - where it is felt there is a need. For example, the self-defence organisation 'Make My Day' (see National Campaigns) has been set up with Arkangel support. We are also involved in the formation of a society to campaign against the widespread persecution of the Grey Squirrel.

Of course all of these projects are going to take a considerable amount of money to run properly - even though Arkangel relies entirely on voluntary workers, and so Arkangel Fundraising has been set up to raise the necessary funds. As Arkangel exists largely as a service to local groups, it would be a great help if every local group could devote at least one day a year to fundraise for Arkangel. We are also extending our range of sales goods to include items such as postcards, which we will wholesale at low prices to local AR groups to support their own fundraising.

We intend for Arkangel to continue to act as a positive force within the movement - to help AR campaigners fight more efficiently and more effectively against animal persecution, to keep them informed about what is being done in the struggle for animal protection, and to encourage unity and mutual respect within the animal protection movement.

Local Group Reports

Animal Cruelty Investigation Unit (South Wales)

PO Box 156, Cardiff, South Wales CF5 5YD

The group organised a demonstration in December outside Sun Valley, Wales's largest turkey slaughterhouse. Around 40 protesters from all over the country attended the protest. During the day, a transporter crammed with about 1,800 birds was discovered nearby. Only a few birds were visible, but one appeared to be suffering terribly. The driver of the transporter didn't wish to discuss the matter. Video footage and many photographs were taken, which resulted in considerable media coverage and subsequent public reaction. Reports appeared in the South Wales Argus and HTV Wales broadcast the film. The group made a formal complaint to the Gwent County Council, but their Senior Animal Health Inspector saw no reason for concern! The group intend to continue their campaign against Sun Valley.

Animal Rescue (Liverpool) PO Box 233, Liverpool L69 7CF

Had a very successful public meeting in February, with over 200 people attending. They are now producing "Animals Campaigner" - a regional newsletter for members and the general public. They are currently campaigning against animal experiments undertaken by Liverpool University, live exports, and factory farming. Offers of help and/or donations would be appreciated.

Animal Rights Cambridge 74, Sturton Street, Cambridge CB1 2QA

Organised a successful demo against Laundry Farm with 300 people turning out. They continue with weekly demonstrations outside local branches of Boots, and recently a bus load was sent to parliament to urge their MP to support a boycott of battery cages. ARC has hosted meetings with a number of guest speakers from such organisations as the Animal Cruelty Investigation Group, the Environmental Investigation Agency and NAVS. They will be holding a sponsored swim in aid of the EIA's campaign to save dolphins - please contact Joan on 0223 311828 for details. Animal Rights Cambridge also continue to work closely with Cambridge University Animal Concern and Suffolk Animal Defence. ARC are represented at virtually every animal rights demo, particularly by Hilda who is now in her eightieth year! What does she want? More action!!

The group meets every fourth Tuesday at 8pm, Bath House, Gwydin Street.

Barrow Animal Rights Koncern (BARK!) 44 Ferry Road, Barrow in Furness, Cumbria LA14 2QF

Colin writes, "I am running an animal rights group and local HSA group single handed. I have plenty of supporters that help with leafleting and sabbing but all the paper work, campaigning, letter writing, fundraising is left to me. I have just lost our HSA van, and am in need of urgent funds to help purchase another. I am in the process of organising a benefit gig. If any and everyone that reads this appeal can send me a £1, it would be very much appreciated. Any money received that isn't used by BARK will go towards local animal welfare shelters. Please, please help..."

Birmingham NAVS AD Shop, 78 Bull Street, Birmingham

Recently launched a new campaign against animal experiments at Birmingham University. They have held regular leafleting sessions and information stands, and they need signatures for a petition which is to be handed to the Chancellor of the University. The campaign is to culminate in a national demonstration on October 23rd.

Bromley Animal Defence Group 16 Parkside Avenue, Bickley, Kent BR1 2EJ

Regular stalls have been held in the local high street with very good response from the public. Several demos have been attended, as well as a Christmas Eve vigil outside the Wellcome laboratory in Beckenham, Kent. They are holding a national demo, march and rally against Wellcome Laboratories on 15th May 93. Assemble 11.30am in Harvington Estate, South Eden Park Road, Beckenham, then march to Bromley town centre (approximately two and a half miles) for a rally. Speakers include Robin Webb and Terry Hill. Food by London Vegans. For directions and details contact BADG on 081 464 6035.

Durham NAVS 52 Linden Road, West Cornforth, Ferryhill, Durham

This is a new NAVS group which was launched in November with a renewed campaign against vivisection at the university and one of the hospitals. They held a vigil outside the university, bringing the experiments there to the attention of local people and students. Meetings are planned to take place once a month.

Dartmoor Badger Protection League
Riverside Cottage, Poundsgate, Devon
TQ13 7NV

The group is currently involved in opposing the Ministry of Agriculture's policy of killing badgers to (supposedly) stamp out the cattle disease

b o v i n e tuberculosis.
They also oppose the 'live-tests' for badgers which could result in thousands of badger cub deaths. People are urged to write letters of protest to their MP's,
and to watch out for ministry operatives.

Devon Vegans

c/o The Old Forge, Throwleigh EX20 2HS

A group which promotes the cause of animal rights at a practical level, as well as encouraging veganism.

Dudley Animal Concern

(See also Midland Animal Rights Coalition)

Held a vigil outside Blackpool Circus, and took part in a demo/leafleting session on Boots Action Day. They continue to campaign against Dudley Zoo and have collected over 11,000 signatures on their petition. They hold monthly meetings.

Gosport and Fareham Animal Rights
PH Nelson, 26 Brune Lane, Rowner, Gosport,
Hants PO13 9RA

Held a very successful demonstration against Wickham Laboratories with about 70 people attending - led by Robin Webb. The meeting was addressed by Terry Hill who spoke about the appalling experiments he had witnessed at Shamrock Farm whilst working undercover. The group has held regular vigils outside Garetmar Kennels, the notorious puppy 'supermarket'.

Hackney and Islington Animal Rights Campaign

c/o Alara, 58 Seven Sisters Road, N7 6AA

At a recent public meeting, Terry Hill spoke about his experiences working undercover at Shamrock Farm. The group held a demo against McDonalds, and members have also participated in demos against Boots, London Hospital Medical College, and the Leyden Street chicken slaughterhouse. They need more people to get involved - especially with work on their newsletter. Any help will be greatly appreciated.

Haringay Animal Rights

41 The Broadway, Crouch End,
London N8 8DT : 071 700 2425

This is a local campaigning group who regularly leaflet, hold stalls, and campaign on a wide range of issues. The group is being re-launched after an absence of over two years. They seek new members to re-vitalise the group.

Harlow Animal Rights

40 Millwards, Harlow, Essex CM19 4SG

Held a successful 'cruelty-free' exhibition which included animal rights/welfare and charity groups. The money raised from individuals promoting or selling their own products and services went towards the Animal Aid Education Campaign.

Harrogate Anti-Vivisection Group

PO Box 135, Harrogate, HG1 5RA

The group held their fifth annual Christmas vigil in association with Hazelton Action Group outside the gates of Hazelton Laboratories in Harrogate.

Hertfordshire Animal Rights Campaign

PO Box 66, Broxbourne, Herts EN10 6LU

HARC have embarked upon a national attack against hunting with their National Anti-Hunt Petition. They held a very successful march against bloodsports in October with about 100 people attending. There were speeches from HARC, HSA, CAA, Conservative Anti-Hunt Council, and the ALF Press Office. They have collected an astounding 110,000 signatures for their petition to the Forestry Commission which was received by Labour MP Robin Corbett outside the Enfield Chase Hunt kennels in Broxbourne. Members of the group also went to Edinburgh to put their case to the Forestry Commission about getting hunting banned on their land.

Hounslow
Animal Defence

PO Box 234,
Hounslow,
Middlesex
TW3 2QG

The group is now involved in a general campaign against pet shops, and are urging people to complain about unsuitable conditions. They are aiming to achieve an 'animals' charter' whereby pet shops would be banned. They held a 70 length non-stop swim to raise money for the Environmental Investigation Agency to stop the slaughter of Pilot whales and dolphins. Money from group funds has also been donated to many other animal rights organisations. Members have been attending meetings of the London Boots Action Group and have helped with their campaigns. Street stalls, anti-fur pickets, anti-Boots demos and car boot sales have also been held.

Hull Animal Rights
PO Box 43, Hull HU1 1AA

(Sorry HAR, but all I've got is a slip of paper with your address on it!)

London Anti-Fur Campaign
c/o E.L.A.R. PO Box 216, London E7 9RB.

Co-ordinating regular pickets against the remaining fur shops in London's West End. They would like groups and individuals in the London area interested in taking part in the picket to write to them.

Lincolnshire Animal Rights Campaign
c/o The Rosary, Burgh-on-Bain, Lincoln LN3 6JY.

In early September a stall was set up directly opposite Boots' promotional health clinic with a huge 'Boycott Boots' sign and anti-Boots beagle torture posters and leaflets which received a good response from the public.

Lakeland Animal Aid
PO Box 83, Carlisle, Cumbria CA1 3AN.

The group recently had success in getting wild animal acts banned from Carlisle City Council land. All previous circuses had been demonstrated against and the group say this will continue if any circus returns. They also held a small demonstration next to a display by Cumbria's National Farmers Union which involved sheep shearing. Also participated in the NAVS 'Free the Beagles' campaign which gained an interest from the public.

Leicester Animal Concern
c/o 70 High Street, Leicester LE1 5YP.

L.A.C. campaigns to promote a radical transformation in the attitudes and behaviour of others. Several talks have taken place over recent months with speakers from NAVS, the ALF Press Office, HSA, ACIG and DAARE. They have been able to participate in several days of action against Boots - where there was a 4 hour demo on the ledge above the main entrance, Leicester University Medical Science building and in Anti-Angling week. Various events have also taken place against Boots and the University with information stands and leafleting sessions. A national march and rally against the University's new research building is planned for June. Meetings are held every other Wednesday at the Castle Community Rooms, 2 Taver Street, Leicester.

London Boots Action Group
c/o Alara, 58 Seven Sisters Road, N7 6AA.

LBAG have held numerous pickets outside Boots shops in the London area and tens of thousands of leaflets have been handed out. For further information concerning the campaign against Boots see the article Boots - a Decade of Campaigning.

London Vegans
7 Deansbrook Rd, Edgware,
Middlesex HA8 9BE.

The group organise various socials, and run catering and information stands throughout the London area. Also hold regular meetings on the last Wednesday of every month at the Millman Street Community Rooms, Millman Street, WC1, and produce an excellent diary of events.

Manchester Animal Protection Group
PO Box 155, Manchester M60 1FT.

The MAPG have been extremely active over the last few months. The group travelled to most of the national demos, including the Boots demo in Nottingham and the Crufts demo. They helped organise the two anti-whaling demos in London late last year (see anti-whaling reports). On Christmas Eve, an all night vigil was held outside their local medical school which lasted until midday Christmas Day. It attracted about 60 people over the 18 hours and will now be an annual event. Demos have been held against General Motors, Boots and circuses. A meat-out march is being arranged for July in conjunction with other north west groups. With the Waterloo Cup and Grand National demos coming up things are very hectic. Please get involved!

MAPG Anti-Whaling report: Two anti-whaling demos were held late last year with mixed response. The first was held at Wembley Stadium and although the turnout was not as good as expected, 5,000 leaflets were given out. The second demo was targeted at the lighting up of the Norwegian Christmas tree in Trafalgar Square. Unfortunately, the police pushed the demo back 100 yards from where the official lighting up was taking place - but it was given a mention on TV. The petition is going well but more need to be filled in. Please use the petition on your stalls. For more details, contact the above address.

Mid-Sussex Animal Reform Group
c/o 37 North Court, Hassocks,
West Sussex BN6 8JS.
(0273 502227 Day & 0273 846941 Evening)

MSARG have been holding weekend demonstrations against Shamrock Farm (UK) at Upper Horton Farm, Smallsole, Nr Henfield, West Sussex every Saturday and Sunday from 16th January, between 10am and 12.30pm.

Mansfield Animal Rights PO Box 39, Mansfield, Notts.

The group have succeeded in having circuses on council land banned. A campaign has been started against King Aquarian Pet Shop which used to stock crocodiles and monkeys as well as the more usual kinds of pets and which were in poor condition. The owner has now denied he ever sold crocodiles and monkeys, but he has been shown by the local media to be a liar as the trade was well known. He has spent £2,000 on extra security and changed the name of the shop - so the campaign is obviously having an effect! A demo has been held outside the home of a man convicted of killing a collie dog by stamping on it in the street. Some of the group turned up one Sunday to lay a wreath where the dog was killed. The local press wrote a sympathetic report. The group has also been campaigning against McDonalds and have been out sabbing and leafleting in the town centre.

Midlands Animal Rights Coalition c/o Dudley Animal Concern, PO Box 43, Dudley DY3 3DR.

On the 14th January a protest took place outside the main entrance of the NEC, Birmingham, the venue of the Crufts dog show. A specially designed leaflet was handed out to visitors. On both the day before the demo and on the day itself two members of MARC spoke to the local radio about the protest. Newspapers, including the Times and the Daily Telegraph, also carried reports. Central TV broadcast the demo on both the 6.30pm and 10.30pm news programmes. The campaign will continue ad infinitum. At last, minds have been opened to the fact that there is a connection between the quarter of a million pedigree puppies registered by the Kennel Club every year and the slaughter of homeless dogs and puppies. Also highlighted are the problems of dogs born and bred with deformities just to meet Kennel Club standards, not forgetting the mutilation when dogs have their tails removed. On the opening day of Crufts a group of protesters carrying a banner which read, "Don't breed or buy while stray dogs die", ran into one of the rings inside Crufts. The group are in the process of producing merchandise including t-shirts, mugs etc.

Norwich Animal Charter PO Box 30, Norwich NR1 4DT.

They recently organised a highly successful public meeting in Kings Lynn to help set up a local animal rights group. Following a mailout to district, town and parish councils in Norfolk, urging them to support the RSPCA's campaign on animal circuses, Dereham Town Council became the third council in Norfolk to ban them from their land. Several members travelled to London for the national lobby of Parliament to ban battery cages. Many city centre days of action have been held, along with stands at various fairs and fetes.

Oxford Animal Rights Box M, 34 Cowley Rd, Oxford OX4 1HZ.

The group are currently involved in a major campaign against the Department of Experimental Psychology at the University of Oxford where animals are mutilated, brain-damaged and electrocuted. They are also involved in a campaign against Boots and can provide leaflets (£6.00 per 1000 + pp).

People's Animal Welfare 19 Trinity Street, Gainsborough, Lincs DN21 1HS.

They opened a new shop last summer and raised £328 in the first week. It will also act as a centre for low cost spaying and animal adoption schemes.

South East Animal Rights Coalition 19a Amherst Rd, Bexhill-on Sea, East Sussex TN40 1QH.

SEARC was formed to benefit local groups who wish to co-ordinate with others in the South East region. They distribute literature and information through monthly mail-outs and bi-monthly meetings, and co-operate with groups in organising area events and setting up new groups. Any association is welcome to join, and while the facility is free of charge, donations to cover the cost of production and postage are appreciated.

South Devon Animal Rights PO Box 76, Torquay, Devon.

The group have been involved in several anti-Boots demos. They have held several information stands, and have collected signatures on petitions.

South London Animal Aid PO Box 594, London SW9 8QG.

SLAA have held demos outside St Georges Medical School, Tooting, and the Institute of Psychiatry, Camberwell, and have produced excellent leaflets detailing the abuse of animals which is carried out at these establishments. The group have set up the 'Green Marmoset' Vegetarian Catering Venture which will provide the best vegeburgers in town - amongst other tasty vegetarian/vegan food at AR and other events. For further details contact Lisa on 081 540 6628. For the past few years the group have organised the Christmas Without Cruelty Fayres which have attracted thousands of people and have proved extremely popular.

Stevenage Animal Rights
Box 6, Bowes Lyon House, St. Georges Way, Stevenage, Herts SG1 1XY.

The campaign against Glaxo is continuing and recently several members of the group travelled to London where the Glaxo shareholders' AGM was being held. One member made a speech to about 1,000 people present and gave the chairman a petition of 20,000 signatures asking Glaxo to stop vivisection at their laboratory.

Walthamstow Animal Rights (WAR)
PO Box 2344, London E17 6QR.

A new group who are looking for members to become involved in local campaigns.

Wirral & Cheshire Badger Group

Wirral & Cheshire Badger Group
PO Box 19, Warrington, Cheshire WA2 8TG.

The group would appreciate any help or donations to help them in their work.

West Midlands Animal Aid
3 George St, Birmingham B12 9RG.

They have received intense media attention with their 'Animals First' Dudley Zoo report and have been active leafleting, collecting signatures for petitions and collecting much needed funds on their information stands.

Witney Animal Rights
PO Box 32, Chipping Norton, Oxon OX7 6JE.

Two members attended a Parish Council meeting to raise an objection to a local breeding farm for 6,000 cats which are on sale to laboratories, and a protest was held against the farm shortly afterwards. Oxford's last remaining fur shop was forced to close thanks partly to campaigning by the group. Information stalls have been held frequently, as well as an all night vigil against the abuse and murder of animals at Oxford University and hospital.

Aims to encourage responsible pet 'ownership' and neutering of cats and dogs. The society also rehomes homeless animals.

Animal Aid

7, Castle Street, Tonbridge, Kent TN9 1BH
0732 364546

Animal Aid are once again vigorously campaigning towards educating young people by producing and distributing a new video 'Their future in your hands'. This video is aimed at the 14+ age group and is straightforward and concise, covering a wide range of issues. Available for £9.95. Owing to success of Veggi pledge month '92, the group is repeating it in March with a variety of events planned including a nationwide tour of vegetarian evenings, a poster and newspaper campaign featuring the controversial 'Dying to meat you' image and a special vegetarian booklet free to enquirers. On the vivisection front, a campaign 'Altar of Science' with a series of factsheets about current experiments in major cities which contravene the 1986 Scientific Procedures Act is being produced. Members are being encouraged to take up this opportunity for more high-profile localised campaigning. Humane research cards/leaflets are still available on request. Two forthcoming LWC Exhibitions organised by AA are in Edinburgh 9-11 July and London 11-13 June.

Animal Concern (Scotland)

62, Old Dumbarton Rd, Glasgow G3 8RE
041 3134 6014

Formally Scottish Anti-Vivisection Society, changed to Animal Concern in 1988 to enable them to campaign on a wide range of animal abuse. On going campaigns include; against circuses, local fur shops and fish farms. Also produce various leaflets. Monthly street stalls and social nights are held on a regular basis. Contact the address shown above for dates and a free information pack. Recently launched a new initiative to persuade school children to become involved in their campaign by reducing membership to £2 for people 16 and under.

Animal Cruelty Investigation Group

c/o 83-87 Union St, London SE1 1SG.

Was created to acquire the hard evidence of the cruel abuse of animals in order to curtail such abuse. ACIG investigators strive to expose all forms of cruelty; bloodsports, vivisection, factory farming, the fur trade etc. Successes include; the investigation of 89 year old Prof. Feldberg at the National Institute for Medical Research, London: the exposure of malpractices at the Quorn Hunt and video evidence of a terrified pregnant hind chased into a quarry by the Quantock Staghounds. To minimise the bureaucracy, ACIG has no membership. Instead, a list of supporters is maintained. Supporters are encouraged to contribute via bankers standing order and pay as much as they can afford. All supporters receive a newsletter twice yearly as well as an annual financial statement to keep people informed on how their money is spent. Help is needed in many other ways. In the field, not only right up front taking photos/video footage but also through low-key observation and surveillance. ACIG will gladly give advice and encouragement to anyone who feels they can do this.

Animal Liberation Front

(Supporters Group)

BCM 1160, London WC1N 3XX.

Their quarterly newsletter provides information about the arrest and imprisonment of alleged animal rights activists. Also includes articles/letters from prisoners. The SG raises funds to help pay fines and to pay towards the travelling expenses of relatives making prison visits. Funds also pay for books, cruelty-free toiletries and other needs of prisoners. Produce range of merchandise. Membership £24.00 per year.

Animal Liberation Investigation Unit

PO Box 38, Manchester M60
061 953 4039

Organise inspections on animal abuse establishments to expose and build up information files. Successful inspections over the last few months include; a Halal slaughterhouse, the vivisection labs at London Zoo, two broiler units, a site owned by Wellcome at Grange Farm in Sussex, Sussex University animal house and the premises of Colin French, branded the cruelest man in Britain, having been convicted on 272 charges of cruelty to animals. ALIU also help local activists around the country to conduct legal inspections at their local establishments to gain video and photographic footage. In addition to inspections ALIU have also been busy continuing with the campaign against Boots the vivisectionists, helping with the day of action in June, the demo at the Boots AGM in July and the march against Boots in November. A Boots info pack is available from the ALIU for £1.00

Anti-Vivisection Agency
10 Mildred St, Bristol BS5 9QR.

Holds a unique position in the anti-vivisection movement. As an independent initiative they bring together doctors, nurses and patients to publicly denounce vivisection. Much of their energy over the past year has been directed to the production and release of the compilation album 'How much longer?' Each copy included a free 8,000 word booklet with full colour photographs to convey the urgency of the anti-vivisection cause. Now on its 3rd pressing it has sold around 5,500 copies. Their first public petition against animal experiments (with over 17,000 signatures), was presented by Tony Banks MP. Signatures are now needed for the second submission (50,000 collected so far) and petitions are available from the group.

Anti-Bullfighting Committee
PO Box 175, Liverpool L69 8DY.

Recently set up as a branch of the Spanish anti-bullfight organisation the 'Comite Antitaurino'. The ABC intends to do its utmost to bring about the abolition of the bullfight and other cruel spectacles in Spain. Its first campaign will be to persuade holiday companies and travel agents to include information in their brochures asking tourists not to attend the bullfight while on holiday in Spain.

Animal Liberation Front Press Office
BM 4400, London WC1N 3XX.

The press office fulfils a vital role in the animal rights movement by being available to television, radio and newspapers to explain why the ALF does what it does and highlights the horror and extent of animal abuse. It also provides speakers for public meetings, rallies, debates, etc to dispel the lies and distortions that have built up. Donations urgently needed.

Beauty Without Cruelty
57, King Henry's Walk, London N1 4NH.

Opposes all inhumane treatment of animals and seeks to promote cruelty free alternatives. They recently exposed the live plucking of geese in Hungary with successful media coverage. They are encouraging people to check local shops to see if bedding, etc containing goose-down or feathers from eastern European countries, Germany or China is being sold. They are currently campaigning for an end to the import of wild caught fur into this country. Contact BWC for further information.

British Hedgehog Preservation Society
Knowbury House, Knowbury, Ludlow,
Shropshire
0584 890287

Aims are to assist the practical welfare of the species, to help in wildlife education and to fund research into hedgehog ethology. Now in their 10th year they are continuing to campaign for legislation to prevent cruelty to hedgehogs and now have the support of Emma Nicholson MP who intends to pursue the matter in parliament. They also produce a wide range of goods in their catalogue 'The Hogaloque'.

British Union for the Abolition of Vivisection (BUAV)
16a Crane Grove, London N7 8IB
071 700 4888

Have mounted a successful campaign 'Paradise Lost' to expose the international trade in primates. Two safari parks, Longleat and Woburn were revealed to have sold monkeys to Shamrock (GB) Ltd, to either be re-sold for research or kept in confined conditions for breeding purposes. This received substantial press coverage including the front page of the Daily Mirror. Local campaigners staged a march, vigils and information stands while nationally the group embarked on a 35 date roadshow with 'Gina', a model of a macaque monkey. The BUAV are urging people to send their 'Paradise Lost' cards to the Mauritian Ambassador and to write to MP's urging them to sign EDM 305 on the international primate trade, the Home Office asking for an independent review of all primate use in the UK, Charles Wardle MP, Minister responsible for animal experiments and David McLean MP responsible for licensing the import of primates to the UK. The BUAV are also currently campaigning against General Motors (owners of Vauxhall) together with PETA, to seek an end to the use of animals in 'crash' tests undertaken by the company.

Born Free Foundation
Coldharbour, Dorking, Surrey RH5 6HA
0306 712091

Works to prevent captive animal abuse and to protect wildlife through projects; Elefriends, Zoo Check and Into the Blue. Elefriends' current campaign 'Africa's Forgotten Elephants' is doing well and resources are going towards poorly protected herds in West Africa. People are able to adopt an 'Amboseli eli family' through Elefriends (for full details phone 0306 713320). Zoo Check have received a new report into the plight of Britain's captive polar bears by wildlife consultant Stefan Ormond. The report examines the conditions in the five zoos that still keep the bears (Belfast, Chessington, Dublin, Edinburgh and Flamingoland). In light of this, the group will call for the phasing out of polar bears in captivity as soon as possible. 'Into the Blue' are now establishing a new and even better dolphin centre in the Caribbean. This will be funded by the Bellerive Foundation, WSPA, the Born Free Foundation and British Divers Marine Life Rescue and has the full backing of the Turks and Caicos Islands' Government.

Sabbing News

A national gathering was held on January 22nd 1993 to disrupt the Essex foxhunt. The purpose of such a massive turnout was to challenge the assumed authority of the notorious Estate Management Services, whose rent-a-mob personnel "protect" foxhunts from any threat to their "sport".

Estate Management Services (hereafter referred to as EMS) agents have a legal right to remove trespassers on hunt property, using minimal force, by directing them towards the nearest public access area. However, the EMS have taken it upon themselves to also remove hunt opponents from public footpaths, common land, and neighbouring farms using brutality not consistent with "minimum force".

The disruption of the Essex foxhunt was, in fact, a response to the hospitalisation (through head injury) of a young saboteur by EMS personnel.

Around midday of the Saturday, the EMS thugs became involved in a fracas with a group of sabs at Stagden Cross, near Felstead who disputed the public accessway to a farm. In the ensuing violence a Portsmouth hunt-saboteur was set upon and his head split open - requiring immediate ambulance transport to hospital. An EMS employee was airlifted to hospital in a police helicopter after he was allegedly sprayed in the eyes with a substance used to dampen down fox scents. The hunt later claimed that the substance was ammonia. If this was indeed the case, then hunt-sabs are going to have to seriously consider the implications and possible consequences of someone in their midst carrying such a noxious and potentially blinding substance... However, considering that this allegation was made in the hunters' propaganda weekly "Horse and Hound", perhaps we should take it with several grains of salt - especially since it appeared alongside a piece claiming that a hunt saboteur had "declared he would drive through the police line and at hunt supporters and hounds". (The article continued, "Police fought to seize the keys of the vehicle and eventually the driver turned back" - implying that the driver had indeed already attempted to "drive through the police line..". As one who was actually standing on the roof of the landrover above the driver's door, I can state categorically that the vehicle never moved! I'll elaborate shortly...)

The hunters themselves became trapped in a small barnyard on the property they were hunting. Over 150 demonstrators assembled at the entrance gate and sat down on the road to deny the hunt an exit. With police reinforcements drafted in from metropolitan London, a stalemate followed which lasted three hours in the drizzling rain.

By 3pm, with the demonstrators thinning in number and police numbers approaching 70, the road-sitters were herded back to allow the hunt to escape from the farm. Police then formed a human chain (by each gripping the belt of the officer in front with their left hand, as witnessed during their assault on poll-tax marchers in March 1990) leaving their right hands free to grab and arrest those demonstrators still in the vicinity.

Brighton huntsabs then started the engine of their landrover in order to turn on the heater. Considering that they were completely surrounded by a cordon of "linked" police officers, and that three people were standing on the roof, it seems highly unlikely that their intention was to drive off! However, Police Sergeant 089 of the Essex Constabulary reacted angrily and demanded the engine be turned off - which it duly was. Sergeant 089 then began frantically clubbing a group of huntsabs who were trapped inside the police cordon, and in a rash and sudden move he smashed the landrover's driver's side window and snatched the keys from the driver's hand. The driver's eyebrow was gashed by flying glass and required stitches. Then later, as we attempted to turn off the road to go to the hospital the police created a roadblock and forced us back.

Not surprisingly, the police then demanded all documentary evidence taken by the demonstrators of their comrades' arrests - of which there were 26 - going so far as to mount roadblocks so as to search vehicles and confiscate film and videos from witnesses. Unfortunately, they can do this under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act - although those present had a sneaking suspicion that the intention was to suppress any evidence of the window-smashing incident by Sergeant 089. The League Against Cruel Sports' Laurie Payne had his video film confiscated, along with the Anglia Television reporter's footage.

Hired Thugs

Hired security firms are becoming increasingly common on hunts throughout southern England. The Old Surrey and Burstow (based in Felbridge, East Grinstead, Sussex) and the Surrey Union (from Oakwoodhill, Ockley, Surrey) are now employing the services of brown-shirted henchmen - disturbingly like Adolf Hitler's private army of Brownshirts, forerunners of those genocidal psychopaths the SS (but don't let that put you off!).

The Secretary of the Portsmouth Green Party, Jason Fazackarley, was punched to the ground and kicked by hunt supporters during a meet of the Hursley and Hambledon foxhunt at Privett, near Petersfield, Hampshire. Kenneth Mansbridge, 38, of Battery Hill, Winchester, claimed "self-defence" stating, "I only kicked him and punched him once." Referring to the six others charged with assault (and later cleared because of insufficient evidence) he added, "There were only the two of us there. I didn't see anyone else attack him." The jury returned a unanimous verdict of unlawful wounding.

Perhaps the most sinister aspect of these violent attacks was Portsmouth Crown Court Judge Michael Addison's comment that Mr Fazackarley, who was at the meet in connection with a Green Party conservation report, "Brought the misfortune on his own head." Was that a joke Judge? Mr Fazackarley suffered serious head wounds - not very funny... but perhaps huntsabs are considered fair game for hunt-thugs?

SABBING ANGLING

The number of sab groups which include angling in their activities is increasing. On the whole, anglers are less likely to get pleasure from the suffering they cause than are hunters. They enjoy the mindlessness of trying to outwit fish - encouraging them to impale themselves on hooks - and don't tend to be inherently violent. This is a bonus if you are a small group as you can sab a greater number of anglers than you might otherwise wish to confront if they were all blood-crazed terrier boys. Also, sabbing angling can make a satisfying end to a day earlier spent dealing with mammal hunters!

A number of different tactics have been effectively employed so far:

1. One of the best has got to be the use of a canoe or rowing boat to make the anglers pull in their lines and to disturb the fish. They may not even realise you're sabbing them unless you've got a purple mohican!

2. The fish can be disturbed by throwing medium-sized stones into the water - not huge rocks which might stun the fish.

3. Standing behind anglers, having a noisy chat about how many they've caught, can cause a shadow which disturbs the fish.

Pre-feeding is not now thought to be a good idea, chiefly because unless huge amounts of food are used you will only attract fish and encourage them to feed, and over doing it may leave uneaten food which will rot and cause pollution.

News from the ALF Press Office

by Robin Webb

The media, encouraged by the police (ARNI?), from time to time venture across the border from biased reporting to outright fantasy. Of course, the ALF has long been plagued with biased journalism, although the Press Office can now contain it to a certain extent, but fantasies are more difficult to control.

'Today' newspaper for 17th November 1992 carried a headline 'ALF torch chickens' above an item which claimed that 'a lorry load of chickens were burned alive' near Driffield on Northumberside. In reality seven refrigerated meat lorries belonging to T Soames & Son of Middleton-on-the-Wolds were destroyed by incendiary devices during the early hours of Sunday 15th November. Damage was estimated at £250,000 and one of the trucks was loaded with...wait for it!...FROZEN chickens. The letter written by the Press Office and faxed to 'Today' the same day the article appeared was ignored. Incidentally, notelets featuring four of the seven lorries are now available from the Press Office at £2.20 for 10 cards with envelopes, including post and packing.

Another example was the incident on the 6th December at Newton-on-Trent in Lincolnshire where 'animal rights activists' shot and killed two pigs and wounded a third, also firing at the police when they arrived at the scene. The pig murderers were later admitted to be poachers but the media never carried that...

The lesson to be learned from this is that whenever the ALF or other 'animal rights activists' are accused of harming life it just ain't true. Please check with the Press Office if you are worried about going out with a pasting table after reports of that kind and we'll make sure you get the true story to pass on to any member of the public who either asks or 'has a go'. It has to be said that activists do sometimes get things wrong. Two recent examples are the house being painted because it was thought to be owned by a Shamrock Farms employee - who had moved several months before, and the person who received threatening telephone calls after a badger digging case...same name, same block of flats but twice the age and no relation!

As if the media-trips into cloud-cuckoo land and genuine mistakes aren't enough the police seem to be up to their old tricks of hushing things up. Economic sabotage in the West Country leading up to Christmas had the lid put on it news-wise (see article headlined 'Police special unit targets animal lib as threat grows' under the 'What the Papers Say' section elsewhere in this magazine). At the time of writing this article a couple of other actions haven't received the coverage they deserve... First, at about 2am on Sunday 14th February 1993, J Cole's chicken slaughterhouse at Leyden Street in London received a St Valentine's Day visit. 150 hens were rescued, all the knives and other instruments of murder were taken and the whole interior contaminated with used engine oil and creosote. Eight activists were involved in this combined liberation/economic sabotage operation having entered through the roof. Doors seem to be too much of a nuisance these days... The second action in question happened only hours earlier, at about 8pm on Saturday evening at Shamrock Farms, Small Dole, near Brighton. Over 30 activists paid a visit and smashed the lights at the main entrance, ripped out the cables from the fence to the alarm bells inside, made all the windows disappear and scattered miscellaneous debris all around the inside of the perimeter. This, in addition to the regular weekly demos, must be at least a little unnerving for the animal abusers there - if not, why not?

The Shamrock action was carried out despite the place being guarded by Group 4 Security who were on the premises during the whole 20 minutes or so that the raid lasted. Police have said that they respond to calls from Shamrock Farm within 3 minutes but none arrived (or none were called?)... Who isn't earning their money?

Some raids carried out since the last edition of Arkangel include the early Christmas morning visit to the University of Essex, Colchester. The first report to the Press Office at about 8am on the 25th December said that about 200 mice had decided they no longer wanted to live in the animal house, so some human friends drilled through the doors and helped them to move home. Many more mice would have gone with them but a police patrol car arrived which necessitated a premature departure for the seasonal activists. Later, anonymous reports put the number of rescued mice at 300 with the University putting it at nearer 500... an unusual twist.

Back in September 1992, in the early hours of the 30th, 2 geese, 2 ganders, 11 Aylesbury ducks and 2 Muscovy ducks were rescued from the City Farm on Reading Lane in Hackney, East London. The farm was due to close and the birds sold for slaughter. All are now in safe, loving homes. A leather jacket found at the farm was also taken to be properly and decently disposed of.

The north of England hasn't been idle either. McDonalds was emptied for at least two hours on Christmas Eve 1991 following a bomb hoax which was followed later by 3 separate attacks on its windows. Various butchers shops have also been hit with one attracting attention 3 times in six months. That one now has metal shutters. Everton Football Club up on Merseyside were due to host the Everton Valley and Terrier Show but had an early visit on the 23rd August. Buildings were damaged, slogans painted and a warning given of further attacks if the club continued its association with bloodsports.

Down London way again, on Monday 10th August, 31 birds: 4 hens, 3 quail, 1 pigeon and 23 white doves were rescued from tiny crates in Kilburn's Bangladesh Bazaar. It was believed they were going to be sold for home execution. The owner unfortunately didn't understand the original message and got more birds, so Thursday, 13th August brought a new ventilation system and interior paint job courtesy of the ALF.

Sunday, 5th July was a busy evening for the West London ALF. The Berkhamstead home of one of Boots' directors was paint-bombed, Professor Feldberg's car was covered with paint stripper, Boots stores in Stanmore, Eastcote and Ruislip Manor lost their windows, whilst during the preceeding week at least 8 butchers and Boots shops in the Northolt, Greenford and South Ruislip area had windows smashed, with a further 3 Boots stores finding their locks even more secure than usual with the aid of superglue.

These are just a small selection of incidents worth mentioning in addition to the press reports reproduced elsewhere in Arkangel. Many other actions are undertaken on a nightly basis up and down the country. Even if ARNI do try to hush things up, lives have still been saved and the economic damage is just as costly!

Rumour has it that someone is going to produce a 'Diary of Actions 1992' and the same will no doubt be true of 1993 - so the information won't just be filed away.

Another urgent problem is that the press cutting service only picks up reports that use the phrase 'animal liberation' and even then some free or more obscure local newspapers and many specialist magazines are missed. If you see ANY reports or articles about 'animal liberation', 'ALF', 'animal rights activists/extremists' or whatever, please send them, together with the name (title) and date of the publication they appeared in, to the Press Office as soon as possible. Free newspapers and specialist journals like 'Poultry World' are particularly important. Also of great importance is that all actions are reported to the ALF Press Office! The reason why cuttings are so critical are twofold. Firstly, it helps maintain as full a record as possible the actions carried out. Secondly, if a reply to an article is necessary the relevant letter may be written without undue delay.

Another function of the Press Office is to provide speakers for public meetings, rallies and local groups. If your group would like to invite an ALF spokesperson and cannot afford the travel expenses, please still ask, it may be that the visit can be subsidised. Although run as economically as possible - no computer, fax machine or word processor! - the Press Office is desperately short of funds. For legal reasons it can have no financial support from the SG although, of course, there are no differences between us when it comes to aims and objectives. If you can help with a donation your assistance would be greatly appreciated. A merchandise list for mail order goods is now available. To obtain one please send a SAE to ALF PO (sales), BM 4400, London WC1N 3XX.

Being readily available by telephone (British Telecom 0954 30542 / Mobile 0836 310763) has certain advantages, including the opportunity to speed up help for new animal rights prisoners or those whose circumstances have changed. Any information of that nature can be 'phoned through to the Press Office and details will be passed on at once to both the ALF Supporters Group and SARP. Don't forget to send cards and letters to those in prison... they give their freedom for what they believe in and fully deserve all the support we can give them.

Just about the last action to be reported as this article draws to a close was the rescue of fifty dogs and seven cats from a farm at Llanrhystud, near Aberyswyth. All are now in good homes but four people have been charged with burglary. The place raided had been described by Puppy Watch as the worst of its type that it knew of.

In closing, please don't forget to send press cuttings and other information about actions to BM4400. If you can spare a donation or do a fundraising event that would be most welcome.

The final message is for the activists themselves. Thanks to you all for making the work of the Press Office necessary. Take care and stay free.

Marianne McDonald TV2198, HMP, Parkhurst Road, Holloway, London N7 0NU.

Sam Remington, Young Offenders Centre, Forbury Road, Reading.

Ed Sheppard, HMP Bullington, PO Box 50, Bicester, Oxford OX6 0PR.

Arrested on 2nd Feb and charged with 'Conspiracy to cause criminal damage by fire'. They have been remanded until next month.

Keith Mann NE0316, c/o ALIU, PO Box 38, Manchester M60 1NX.

Keith has been in police custody since his arrest in October 1991 after being arrested in Kent on arson charges. His co-defendant in that trial is now serving a six year sentence. Keith's sentencing has been delayed as he is currently involved in other trials around the country.

Dave Nelson A8030, & Alistair Mullen A8028 both at A Wing H6 HMP Maze, Lisburn, Co. Antrim, N.Ireland BT27 5RF. (Write to separately).

Dave and Alistair were both convicted in May 1992 for criminal damage and arson to battery sheds and bloodsports targets. Dave received three and a half years and Alistair two years.

Chris Tucker RR1914, HMP Brixton, Jebb Avenue, London SW2 5XF.

On 18/11/92 Chris was convicted of affray and sentenced to 15 months imprisonment. This resulted from an incident when a smoke device was activated inside a McDonalds restaurant causing several thousands pounds worth of smoke damage. Chris spent a short time on remand but was released on bail.

Darren Thurston, Edmonton Remand Centre, 9660-104 Ave, Edmonton, Alberta, T5H 4B5, Canada.

Darren has been on remand since June 1992, charged with 'Break and enter, mischief over $1000', in connection with an ALF action at the University of Alberta Bio animals kennels where 29 cats were rescued and $100,000 damage was done on June 1st 1992. He also faces one charge of arson regarding an incident on 15/12/91 at Billingsgate Fish Company where 3 delivery trucks were destroyed causing $100,000 damage. While in custody, Darren's flat was raided for a second time and as a result he now faces a further charge of 'possession of a device to steal telecommunications'.

Jonathan Paul, Spokane County Jail, 1100 W.Mallon, Spokane, USA.

On 3/11/92 he was jailed for refusing to testify at a secretive Grand Jury in Spokane, Wash. The Grand Jury is 'investigating' the successful activities of the ALF and is one of several which has been subpoenaing witnesses in Washington, Oregon and Michigan states. When he maintained his right to remain silent he was cited for contempt of court and jailed. He will remain in jail until the judge decides to release him or until this particular grand jury is over in December 1993.

Remember that letters to prisoners are opened, read and censored - so please don't write anything that might get them, or you, into trouble!

Animal rights group attack town shops

TWO shops in Stevenage town centre came under attack from a newly formed cell of the Animal Liberation Front on Tuesday night.

Windows at Boots and McDonald's restaurant were daubed with etching fluid — a corrosive substance which although harmless to the skin eats into the glass.

Attacks

The ALF afterwards issued a statement claiming responsibility for causing damage. They said the attacks were part of a nationwide campaign against Boots for the use of animals including beagles in two testing laboratories in Nottinghamshire and against McDonald's, which as one of the largest fast food businesses was responsible for the death of many millions of farm animals and birds each year.

An ALF spokesman said: "It is intended as economic sabotage to encourage companies to find a way to continue without relying on animal abuse."

He added that members of the same cell also attacked Boots store in Hertford that night.

A spokeswoman for Boots said the company provided a policy statement for its customers on animal testing, which was never done for its cosmetics and toiletries. It was only carried out in pharmaceutical laboratories when satisfactory alternatives did not exist.

Boots' policy was to support both financially and with technical help the development of alternative forms of testing and it was working to get these accepted by the government and other authorities.

Damage

Both companies said the police had been informed but McDonald's added that the damage to the Stevenage restaurant was "minimal."

A police spokesman said three windows at Boots were affected and the incident was first discovered when staff reported for work on Wednesday morning. Both cases were being treated as criminal damage.

ALF attacks the 'start of a big campaign'

by PHILIP THORNTON

THE FISH farming industry in the Westcountry is preparing for attacks from animal rights campaigners after arson incidents in Dorset.

The Animal Liberation Front has widened its activities from its normal targets of butchers shops and research laboratories to businesses involved with the fish trade.

Two Dorset fish merchants have already been hit by petrol bomb strikes and police have warned firms to be on the guard against attacks.

An ALF spokesman called police to claim responsibility and police were stepping up vigilance after another attack near Bournemouth yesterday.

DC Mark Dobbs, of Wareham CID in Dorset, said the latest attack indicated a campaign.

Robin Webb, spokesman for the ALF, said: "If there are fish farms in Devon and Cornwall then certainly, with the recent activities against the Ministry of Agriculture in Cornwall, I would have thought that the cells responsible for that could equally carry out attacks against fish farms."

Mr Webb stressed he was never informed about any future action, only told when a local ALF cell had claimed responsibility for an attack.

The Dorset attacks were at a fish merchants in Swanage and a fish smokery near Dorchester where two lorries were set on fire.

The alleged ALF activist who phoned the police said: "This is a new campaign to make sure the public knows about the issue. It is going to be big."

Devon and Cornwall police said they had received no reports of any possible attacks in the two counties. Recently the ALF have claimed responsibility for freeing two pine martens from Paignton Zoo, burning MAFF vehicles in Truro and breaking eight Plymouth butchers' shops windows.

WESTERN MORNING NEWS (Aug)

Animal lib in Mac attack

ANIMAL rights protesters etched slogans in acid across two St Albans shop windows early last Friday morning.

Shocked staff at fast food restaurant McDonalds in St Peter's Street turned up for work to discover the words "MacLiar" and "Meat is Murder" sprayed across the window.

The same protesters, believed to be from the Animal Liberation Front, are thought to be responsible for an attack the same evening when they poured the same acid over the window of Boots the Chemist.

Andy Butler, manager of McDonalds, was disgusted with the damage to the window, which needed to be replaced, costing £1,900.

Town centre store targetted by animal rights supporters

ANIMAL rights campaigners have targetted a WGC store in their latest round of activities in Hertfordshire.

Members of the Animal Liberation Front etched slogans on 10 shop windows in St Albans and Hemel Hempstead together with 'Boots kill beagles' at Boots the Optician, in Howardsgate, WGC.

The damage was discovered by a WGC police patrol vehicle in the early hours of Friday morning.

An ALF spokesman said: "The ALF is particularly active at the moment in the Herts area.

"This will continue as long as animal abuse continues."

Police Inspector Michael McLean said: "It is a criminal offence and as long as offences occur we will record and look into these matters."

A Boots spokesman confirmed: "There has been some damage to our store and the matter is now in the hands of the police."

Fire cost '£1¼m'

A fire which police believe was started by animal rights activists caused £250,000 of damage. The local group secretary's office of the National Farmers' Union at Springfield Gardens, Spalding, were badly damaged in the blaze which took fire crews more than two and a half hours to put out. Police believe that members of the Animal Liberation Front may have started the fire. ALF graffiti was found daubed on walls.

Meat is Murder protest mars opening of shop

ANTI meat slogans were splashed across the window of the new Dewhurst shop in Folkestone, hours before its official opening on Friday.

The words Eat This at Your Own Risk and Meat Is Murder appeared on the Sandgate Road shop window.

The daubing was reported to police at 6am on Friday.

It is believed the messages were left after 9pm the previous night.

Sgt Brian Bennett, of Folkestone police, said there was no evidence to suggest the Animal Liberation Front was behind the incident.

Officials from J H Dewhurst would not comment during the opening of the £80,000 revamped store.

FOLKESTONE AND HYTHE EXTRA (Nov)

ALF glues shop locks in protest

THE Animal Liberation Front (ALF) has said it was responsible for superglueing all the locks of the Boots stores in St Ives and St Neots on Saturday morning.

The ALF's press officer, Robin Webb, said the act was part of a long-running campaign against the high street chain to cause as much disruption as possible.

"In this instance, the stores were unable to open on time," he said. "It is all part of a long-standing and on-going campaign against Boots."

"The cruelty-free image they portray is false. They say they don't test their products on animals — this may be the case. What they don't advertise is the fact the ingredients are tested on animals."

Charity shops hit in attacks

ANIMAL rights extremists are targeting cancer charity shops in a violent pre-Christmas campaign.

They have been smashing store windows in north-west London, daubing them with slogans written in acid and gluing locks. Animal Liberation Front teams are touring streets with a list of stores to attack, including Imperial Cancer Research Fund shops and pet stores.

Abattoir arson probe

Detectives were today hunting arsonists who set fire to an isolated slaughterhouse and left Animal Liberation Front slogans daubed on the walls.

Police said two separate seats of fire were found at the slaughterhouse at Stourton Caundle, near Shaftesbury, Dorset.

An incendiary device, which had failed to ignite, was found inside one of the stores.

ALF pledge on dairy arson

by MICHELLE TOMPKINS

The Animal Liberation Front has vowed to continue with a fire-bombing campaign against dairy farming firms after claiming responsibility for a blaze in Lambourn.

An ALF spokesman, Mr Robin Webb, said any companies associated with the industry were "considered legitimate targets" because they help maintain the veal trade.

He confirmed that ALF activists were behind the recent arson attack on Warren Farm, Lambourn.

CID officers admitted that there had been several similar attacks across the country in the past year.

"There have been about 13 jobs of a similar nature in neighbouring counties," said DI Phil Busby, of Thames Valley Police.

"They haven't been at places where vivisection or animal experiments take place — obviously it's someone who's got a thing about farming in general.

"We have no reason to believe it was anyone other than the ALF."

Warren Farm is run by Genus, the beef farming arm of the Milk Marketing Board. Four bombs, linked to a timing device, exploded in the firm's office block and another two were found tied to tractors in the yard.

The extremists dragged 15 gallons of petrol into the offices, but a serious blaze was prevented when staff spotted smoke. Damage was mainly confined to office equipment and paperwork.

"It was only luck that someone spotted the fire early and the petrol didn't ignite," said DI Busby.

Mr Webb said: "The dairy industry is probably the cruelest area of farming — it's directly responsible for veal industry, which most people in this country find abhorrent.

"The Milk Marketing Board is the body that promotes the dairy industry and they must take responsibility. The general public is not really aware of the scale of animal abuse that goes on."

sheeting.

Members of the controversial freedom group found six colonies of mice in what they referred to as the company's "barbaric pest control industry."

The letter said that 40 rodents were captured "in the short time available to avoid security patrols." The statement also claimed that activists had unearthed evidence for the first time that Rentokil

"experiments on wild animals to produce their genocidal poisons."

And the ALF has demanded the company releases the rest of their mice and adopts a "more humane approach to so called pest control, otherwise they will return. The stolen mice are now housed as pets.

Farmers join forces with police to end country crime

By Andy Smith

FARMERS and police in the West are joining forces to fight a growing farmyard crimewave.

A special operations unit has been set up to receive information about rural crime — including threats from animal extremists.

Police hope that with the help of those who live and work in agriculture they can end outrages in the countryside.

In the past two months, there have been four attacks on poultry farms by the Animal Liberation Front and several occasions where hunt saboteurs have used violence.

But other farm crime, like turkey theft at Christmas, sheep rustling and expensive farm machinery being stolen, is also on the increase.

"Farmwatch, the rural equivalent of Neighbourhood watch, has been running for years with some success," said a spokesman for Devon and Cornwall police.

"Now we have extended it with the help of the National Farmers' Union to monitor all sorts of farmyard crime."

'Justifiable' to act outside law when legal measures fail - ALF

ALF ADMIT ARSON ATTACK ON FORESTRY COMMISSION

THE ANIMAL Liberation Front has claimed responsibility for last year's fire bomb attack on Forestry Commission property, according to a report in the Surrey and Hampshire News.

Last December the Forestry Commission's Alice Holt research station, near Farnham in Hampshire, was the target of an incendiary attack.

The police found a number of petrol containers with timing devices attached, one of which went off destroying two offices.

The ALF's publicity officer Robin Webb told the newspaper that the organisation was responsible for the 'direct action' and that it was justifiable to act outside the law when legal means of persuasion had failed.

The reason for the attack was the commission's 'rejection out of hand' of attempts to be persuaded to ban hunting on their land, with a contributory factor being the 'commission's policy of culling what they deem to be pests and vermin,' said Mr Webb.

Asked how the ALF could justify its attack, Mr Webb replied that 'unlawful direct action' had long gone hand-in-hand with situations where legal political action had failed.

He added: 'It is regrettable that lawful attempts to persuade the Forestry Commission to do what 200 local authorities have done - that is, ban hunting on their land - have failed.

'A great many of our supporters work within the law, but some see direct action as a necessary part of their campaign when other measures

Terror tactics: the ALF come clean about 'direct action' fail to have any effect whatsoever.'

According to Mr Webb the offices were targeted, because 'life would not be endangered and it would cause financial damage to the commission'.

A leading expert on tree diseases at the commission lost 30 years of research work in the blaze.

Activists blamed for escape

ANIMAL Rights activists have been blamed after two rare Arctic foxes escaped from a wildlife park.

The three-year-old foxes, Claude and Colin, went missing over the weekend.

They escaped from Riber Castle Wildlife Park, near Matlock, through a section of fence which was weakened by Animal Liberation Front activists 18 months ago.

One of the animals was recaptured today by Matlock police but the other is still on the loose.

DERBY EVENING TELEGRAPH (March)

Acid attacks on butchers' shops

CITY butchers have been warned to be extra vigilant following a spate of attacks on their premises by animal rights activists.

Shops across the city were attacked in the early hours of Tuesday morning by extremists from the Animal Liberation Front, who sprayed acid and daubed slogans on windows.

This was the second wave of attacks this year.

The earlier attack saw over £35,000 worth of damage caused to the Meat and Fish Market.

The Animal Liberation

Front yesterday claimed responsibility for 18 attacks on butchers across the city and warned there could be more in the near future.

Press officer Robin Webb said: "The Peterborough cell of the ALF has admitted carrying out the attacks as part of the organisation's on-going campaign against the meat industry.

"These kind of attacks are on the increase across the country and now happen on a nightly basis."

Police have warned shopkeepers who could be at risk from attacks, such as butchers, leather and fur shops, to take extra care.

Detective Inspector Chris Stevenson said: "There isn't much shop owners can do unless they have round-the-clock security.

"But we are asking them to be extra vigilant and are appealing for anyone who has seen anything suspicious to come forward."

Det Insp Stevenson warned activists they could face a jail sentence for criminal damage.

Mr Webb claimed the campaign of attacks is necessary to the ALF cause.

Slaughter of the Innocent

by Louise Wallis

Diary entry 27/11/90 "One beautiful young male dog was rendered unconscious by injection of phenol barbituate until he was only just alive with a very slow heart beat. A rod was screwed into his sternum (chest bone) to obtain a bone marrow sample and then he was taken immediately into the post-mortem room. Still alive, he was placed on a sloping draining board with his head hanging over the sink. A man then sliced into his neck and severed both main arteries so that the blood gushed away, draining the dog of his life. Unbelievably, the atmosphere in the room was light-hearted and jovial as the team went about their work, cracking jokes as they hacked the dog apart. Only a few minutes earlier this dog had been alive, looking around and sniffing the air for smells; now he was simply a lump of meat. All his vital organs were removed for analysis, including his eyes. Each foot was sawn off with a hacksaw as the anti-viral compound being tested was suspected of causing damage to the dog's pads."

"This is one of the most shocking and upsetting experiences I've ever had. What I cannot comprehend is how these people have become so completely desensitised; for them this is an everyday job."

Two years ago I witnessed this calculated and cowardly murder of a young, healthy beagle dog, whilst working undercover in the toxicology laboratories of drug company SmithKline Beecham based at Stock in Essex.

Although it is obviously an experience that I would prefer to forget - I can't. I have been forced to re-live every painful detail of this memory, ever since SmithKline Beecham announced in November that they have killed twenty-four of my friends. The twenty-four beagle dogs I looked after whilst working for them as a trainee animal technician. Twenty-four individual beings that I came to know and love through caring for them on a day-to-day basis over several months.

When I had been faced with no choice but to leave them behind, I made a promise to myself (and to them) that as soon as my mission was complete, I would try everything I could to save them from the terrible fate I'd witnessed. The information, photos and video footage obtained during my investigation were finally made public by the National Anti-Vivisection Society (NAVS) at a national press conference in September 1991.

Shortly afterwards, the "Free the Beagles" campaign was officially launched by the NAVS who hoped to persuade the company to release the twenty-four animals, unharmed, at the end of their experiments. Leaflets, badges, t-shirts and other promotional materials were produced, and demonstrations organised, with accompanying press coverage and publicity, outside various SmithKline Beecham laboratory sites. Pressure was exerted on the company mainly, however, in the form of a massive postcard campaign. Tens of thousands of special "Free the Beagles" postcards addressed to SKB's head office were filled in and despatched by concerned members of the public - undoubtedly the largest post-bag they will have ever received.

An internal SKB memo (dated October 1991), warning their own employees about the campaign and attempting to reassure them about the dogs' welfare, was subsequently leaked to the NAVS - revealing that the company was getting seriously worried about its image. By this time, all public statements and comments to the press were being handled by Alan Chandler, SKB's Manager of External Affairs - ie their Public Relations Department - at their London head office. Senders of the first postcards were privileged to receive personal and lengthy replies; but as the campaign gathered momentum and the mail-bags grew heavier, information was less forthcoming - usually no response at all.

SKB admitted that the dogs were still alive and being used by the atherosclerosis research group; "the beagle dogs in question.... are all fit and well, and are making an important contribution to the search for medicines to reduce hypercholesterolaemia (elevated levels of cholesterol in the blood) and to treat atherosclerosis, a disease of the arteries involving fatty deposits on the walls of the blood vessels."

This statement reveals both the absurdity of using healthy animals to study human disease, and the company's primary motive - money. Drugs, of course, are not needed to reduce cholesterol levels - a change of diet will do that. And furthermore, dogs are not going to tell you anything about their toxic effects in human beings. Lastly, it is evident that drug companies are not remotely interested in our health or concerned with preventing disease - since their profitable drugs would then be rendered redundant. It is actually in their own interest to undermine our health and to promote disease.

An insight into the powerful vested interests involved is given by Peter Cox in his second book "The New Why You Don't Need Meat" which has just been published:

He writes, "Since Britain has one of the highest death rates from coronary heart disease in the world, the British market is certainly worth grabbing. Comments a Stockbroker, 'The drug companies want people to ignore dieting even though it is much more effective than drugs for 90% of people. Ideally the industry would like to prescribe anti-cholesterol drugs to everyone with a family history of heart disease - the market is enormous.' And one doctor, who has just been whisked off to Rome for a lavish drugs company sales pitch, adds 'Anti-cholesterols are the hottest property in the drug world and people are being hounded into their massive use even before some of the long-term trials are completed'."

Hounded indeed. And so we return to the story of the twenty-four dogs. In June 1992, heartened by the admission that the beagles were still alive, but anxious that time might be running out (laboratory beagles are usually killed at two years), I telephoned my former boss and head of the SKB dog unit, Dave Neville. He was reluctant to talk to me but promised to call me back. Needless to say, he didn't. I immediately followed this up with a letter, a personal plea, addressed this time to Lynda Westall, senior animal technician and the woman responsible for offering me the job in the first place.

I set out my concerns for the dogs and reminded her that ex-experimental animals are sometimes taken home as pets by staff who have grown attached to them. I also cited the RSPCA's well publicised success at re-homing to members of the public 426 beagle dogs which had been bred specifically for experimentation (this became a national news item after laboratory animal breeders Alpha Sirius Ltd went bankrupt). Finally, I emphasised that the release of these dogs would undoubtedly be welcomed by all sectors of the community, thereby bringing SKB a considerable amount of favourable publicity.

It seemed a reasonable enough request but it was nearly four weeks before I received a reply. Predictably, this came not from Lynda, but from the ubiquitous Alan Chandler. Whilst choosing deliberately not to answer any of my points, he instead attempted to reassure me that SKB was, in fact, committed to animal welfare, stating that, "All animals receive the same dedicated care." As if that wasn't bare-faced enough, the man went on to stress that the company was continually trying to reduce the number of animals used, adding derisively, "Thus your concern for the early retirement of some of our animals through our releasing them to a domestic environment is both premature and counter to our efforts to constrain the numbers used."

Now that we know the dogs are dead, having been killed very prematurely at only two-and-a-half years of age, this statement can be seen for the disgraceful lie that it is. SKB obviously has never had the slightest concern for reducing numbers.

After receiving this letter, I grew further disillusioned about the prospect of the dogs being released but at least I felt "where there's life, there's hope." A naive view perhaps, but I never thought Beechams would be foolish enough to slaughter the dogs at a time when they were the subjects of such a concerted, high profile campaign. It was a cowardly act of arrogance which insults and patronises public opinion.

The shocking news of their execution came by telephone on Tuesday 17th November 1992, only hours before I was due to give a talk at a public meeting on vivisection organised by the London Boots Action Group. Later that day I received a copy of SmithKline Beecham's letter to the NAVS informing them of the dogs' deaths. I have reproduced the second half of this extraordinary letter below:

"For scientific and veterinary reasons, the beagles you refer to in your letter could not be released at the end of the study.

Furthermore, we felt that the potential difficulties encountered in attempting to rehabilitate research animals such as these were contrary to humane (sic) practices. They were untrained for a home environment and could have experienced traumatic (sic) or possibly dangerous events in trying to become pets. This danger could have extended to a potential owner.

Consequently, following several internal reviews, the dogs were euthanased at the end of the atherosclerosis study.

Thank you for your interest and concern. I hope we can continue to work together in the future for the benefit of humans and animals alike."

I was rendered speechless with anger as I read these blatant lies. The sheer depth of cynicism and deception contained in those few passages is quite astounding, especially the use of the words "humane", "traumatic", and "euthanased". The latter, of course, implies an act of mercy, ie putting the subjects out of their misery. It is even suggested that these timid and gentle creatures could have become vicious and "dangerous".

It is this complete reversal of the truth that hurts the most because I KNOW how those trusting and loveable dogs, my friends, will have gone to their deaths. In reality they will have been heavily sedated to prevent them from instinctively resisting their murder; thus immobilised, they will have had their throats brutally cut open so that they bled to death. And then, when every last drop of life had bled from them, their prostrate bodies will have been completely dismembered; their still warm vital organs despatched to various departments to be preserved and analysed; and the entrails and left-overs chucked into plastic bin liners to be incinerated into nothingness.

As with all cases of pre-meditated murder, the scene of the crime will have been meticulously cleansed and scrubbed by those involved, and not a scrap of evidence will have been allowed to remain. Not a single trace will have been left behind as a testament to these dogs' existence. Twenty-four lives will have been coldly and systematically transformed into sterile and meaningless statistics.

WE can make sure that the memory of these beautiful animals will live on. For although they are now dead, there is still hope - hope for the millions of other laboratory animals waiting to be freed from death row. This showed itself in the packed public meeting in London when I had unexpectedly to relate the painful news of the dogs' deaths to an expectant audience. My emotional talk was received with displays of grief, anger and disbelief, and people evidently felt moved. Moved to channel these strong feelings into positive action.

Despite my sorrow, I feel more determined than ever. Determined to ensure that the dogs' deaths will not have been in vain. We must make sure that those responsible at SmithKline Beecham will live to regret their decision - the objective being not revenge, but justice.

The time has come to call for an official nationwide boycott of all SmithKline Beecham products. We can make their worst nightmares come true by cutting their profits. They've already shown that they don't care about animals, our health, or public opinion, so let's attack something they do care about - money.

SmithKline Beecham is one of only two major pharmaceutical companies which as well as manufacturing drugs, sell consumer products. The other is, of course, Boots. Unlike Boots however, they do not own any high street shops. Whilst this appears at first to be a disadvantage, it means SKB can be found in most high street shops and chemists, thereby increasing the opportunities to distribute information and raise public awareness. The more shop-owners informed, and the more customers dissuaded from buying certain brands, the greater a public issue the boycott will become. And, by association, the issue of vivisection itself.

Best-selling brand names include Lucozade, Ribena, Horlicks, Aquafresh, Macleans, Brylcreem, Badedas, Pure & Simple, Silvikrin, Vosene, Beechams Powders, Day & Night Nurse, Cough Caps, Settlers, Germolene, Oxy-10 and a whole host of veterinary products. Vets' surgeries are an obvious place to display pro-boycott material setting out the reasons for it.

There are many SKB sites (laboratories, factories and depots) spread throughout the country. These are mainly situated in the south east, but that makes regional campaign co-ordination much easier. Simultaneous demonstrations and pickets can be organised to coincide with the boycott.

A brand new group called "Life Before Profit" has been set up to co-ordinate the boycott campaign and to produce leaflets and posters which can be distributed by local animal rights groups.

Because it is a new group it has no funds as yet and therefore I would like to appeal for donations, simply to help with the postage and printing costs. Ideas, suggestions and offers of help would also be much appreciated. If sufficient interest is expressed a planning meeting will be held in the near future.

GENERAL MURDERERS

by General Motors Boycott

The public are becoming increasingly aware that many cosmetics, household products and drugs are tested on animals, but how many people realise that car production is also linked with vivisection? General Motors, the US parent company of Vauxhall and Opel, perform horrific experiments on live animals including dogs, pigs, rabbits, hamsters, frogs, guinea pigs, rats, mice and crayfish. GM have pledged to continue these experiments and it is up to us as animal rights activists to do something about it, either as individuals or in our local groups. We must act to stop GM torturing and murdering animals.

What does GM do to animals?

In so-called "impact experiments", pigs were restrained in a sling then smashed in the chest or abdomen with a metal disc driven at between 20 and 30 miles per hour by compressed air. In the strange euphemistic language of the vivisector, this is known as a "pneumatic device". In fact, it is an instrument of torture which causes severe internal injuries. Dogs had alcohol dripped into their veins, their chests cut open and a metal object thrust into their exposed hearts at up to 40 mph. Mice and rats were forced to inhale exhaust fumes and other poisonous substances in "toxicity tests". In the most recent experiment we have details of, the tops of ferrets' skulls were cut off with a dental drill to expose their brains which were then "impacted" with a metal rod. Some of the ferrets stayed alive for 7 days.

Despite GM's claims that, "No animals are mistreated or in pain", these experiments clearly cause an immense amount of suffering, especially as, according to a postgraduate who spent 4 years at a GM laboratory before blowing the whistle on them to the US animal rights group PETA, the experiments were sloppy and often carried out with inadequate anaesthetic, resulting in the animals regaining consciousness and screaming in pain.

The Pennsylvania connection

Activists may remember that in 1985, the US government closed down the baboon head injury laboratory at the University of Pennsylvania, where unanaesthetised (or partially anaesthetised) baboons had their necks and heads snapped and smashed using a "pneumatically driven impactor". Among other things the laboratory was criticised for unclean instruments, conscious animals watching other animals being injured, researchers smoking and playing music during brain surgeries, mocking and swearing at injured baboons and leaving animals unattended after experiments. The laboratory was run by Thomas Gennarelli and Thomas Langfitt.

At the GM laboratory, James Lighthall, who carried out the recent ferret experiments mentioned above, published a paper which referred to the Gennarelli and Langfitt experiments thirteen times. Are these the sort of experiments that GM wish to be associated with? Or perhaps similarly gruesome things go on inside GM's own laboratories? Even more shocking is that GM appointed Thomas Langfitt as Chair of the GM Medical Committee on Automotive Safety and that in 1990 David C Viano, a GM researcher and President of the Association for the Advancement of Automotive Medicine, presented Thomas Gennarelli with a "Merit Award" for his head injury experiments.

The evidence

In a 1992 letter to a concerned customer, Vauxhall's Director of Public Affairs, J A Spalding, claimed that GM had undertaken "some research involving animals over ten years ago and this was mainly toxicological". Vauxhall had said similar things to local newspapers in response to demonstrations outside Vauxhall showrooms. So, to help people and groups who are faced with doubters or with incorrect press statements from Vauxhall, I will summarise how we know that GM are involved in vivisection:

1. From papers in scientific journals, such as Journal of Trauma, Vol 27, No 3; Journal of Neurotrauma, Vol 7, No 2, 1990; and Journal of Neurotrauma, Vol 5, No 1, 1988.
2. From a US Department of Agriculture report which shows that GM used almost 20,000 animals between 1981 and 1990 including 1990 figures of 10 pigs, 69 ferrets, 528 rats and 189 mice.
3. From details from the ex-GM researcher mentioned above.
4. From GM themselves. In letters to US customers, GM admitted using animals in experiments and at the 1992 AGM the Board of Directors urged shareholders to vote for a continuation in GM's use of vivisection.

Do animal experiments improve car safety?

There is no relationship between laboratory experiments and what really happens on the road. Ferrets, pigs and dogs do not drive cars. Humans do. For data relevant to humans, just go to any hospital casualty department or travel down a busy motorway and see what cars do to people. Indeed, all other car companies have rejected animal experiments and prefer to use humane methods such as dummies, mathematical models and the investigation of real-life road accidents. To perfect their dummies, some companies have used human volunteers in non-injurious tests. Furthermore, GM has a poor safety record. 7 out of 14 vehicles on the April 1991 "Highest Death Rate" list, which the US Insurance Institute for Highway Safety compiles from data from fatal crashes, were GM models, including the top four killer cars!

General Motors have said they will continue to use animal experiments. General Motors is a business, out to make profits. To change their policy we have to hit those profits. Now is the time to act. GM had such a terrible financial year in 1992 that they forced their Chair and Chief Executive to resign. The recession is badly affecting the whole car industry. Let's make sure that we affect GM's profits even more.

What you can do:

1. Don't buy a Vauxhall or Opel, and tell everyone you know why they shouldn't either.
2. Write to, or visit your local dealer to express your disgust at these tests.
3. Write to Vauxhall and GM to tell them why you are boycotting their cars.
4. Organise a demonstration outside your local Vauxhall showroom. Invite the local press along. Display banners and placards and dress up as animals and vivisectionists to attract more public attention. Give out leaflets - available from us.

We are also thinking of organising a national day/week of action later in the year. Watch out for details.

The animals cannot speak up for themselves. It is up to us. Get active!

Optimism, Effort and Animal Liberation

by Max Watson

Another year has passed, and we know what that means in terms of animal abuse - the torture and death of countless numbers of animals worldwide. We can easily feel our efforts are futile, or feel depressed about the future; this is often reflected in people's writings.

However, let's remember the successes. Nearly all forms of animal abuse have people acting against them - from vivisection to animals in entertainment, and from the meat and dairy industries to fur production. Pickets, boycotts, marches, demos, stalls, cruelty-free fairs, investigations, hunt-sabbing, civil disobedience, undercover infiltrations, campaigns, and illegal direct action (economic sabotage and animal rescue) are all having an effect.

While some animal abusers are becoming defensive (eg. McDonald's propaganda leaflets), others are actually on the run (eg. Colin Blakemore regretting his choice of career).

This is a start. But there's a long, long way to go. Animal liberation is not just a philosophical theory, it is a realistic possibility - it is ACHIEVABLE, but only if we all decide to put in as much time and effort as possible - total dedication for total liberation.

We should constantly look to improve ourselves on behalf of the animals. If anyone really thinks they lack the knowledge to be involved in the previously mentioned activities, groups like Veggies, Co-ordinating Animal Welfare, and the ALIU can all offer assistance.

We're not rewarded personally for our efforts, but we must get strength and determination from Mike Hill's death and the imprisonment of other animal rights activists. We've got to show the scum that we'll fight animal abuse full time, and as efficiently as they perpetrate it. Don't dwell on the misery of animal abuse - spend the time fighting it.

Who Cares if Vivisection Works?

by David Lane

I am opposed to vivisection. I want to see an immediate and complete end to it in all its forms. I want it abolished today.

My reasons are simple and absolutely clear. I do not accept that a human being has the right to subject any other being - human or non-human - to pain, suffering or loss of liberty to further their own ends. In short, I believe in human and animal liberation and in human and animal rights.

To me, vivisection is a self-evident evil. It falls into the same category as human slavery and torture. It is quite simply wrong - and that's all there is to it!

However, there are a few people within the animal rights movement for whom this is not enough; or rather, the question of morality (for that is what 'self-evident evil' implies) does not arise. They concentrate solely on the damage that vivisection does to humans. To them nothing else matters. They ask, "What's in it for us?" and they get the answer, "Nothing! - It causes damage to the health of humans, it always has, and it always will." And they rest their case. But it is a human-centred case, based on self-interest of the worst kind - a speciesist concern for expediency. It has no moral foundation. It is an attitude that tolerates no debate, no questions.

Not long ago, someone from an anti-vivisection society was quoted as saying that in the past, some animal experiments may have provided certain benefits for humans. "Traitor! Resign!" these people cried! I once dared to write that I am "simply not qualified to judge the truth" of such claims (a Biology 'O' level wasn't much help to me); I was violently attacked - verbally anyway - others haven't escaped so lightly.

Perhaps at this point I had better restate my position (for reasons of personal safety!). Not only do I not know if experimenting on animals can benefit humans - I don't care if it can, in fact I don't even ask the question. In keeping with my usual style I'll try an analogy...

I read once that the Nazis performed many experiments on human beings, experiments of the most sickening kind. One of their aims was to develop high altitude flight in aeroplanes, but humans couldn't survive at such low pressures. So they placed human subjects in pressure chambers and quite literally blew them apart. The agony those people must have endured is unimaginable. But the Nazis learned from those experiments, and people have flown in pressurised aircraft ever since. Did the experiments contribute to advancements in aeroplane design? It seems so. Did the ends justify the means? Absolutely not! Would you or I have sanctioned such experiments - even knowing what "benefits" might be gained? Absolutely not - we would rather walk! (But knowing what you now know, will you refuse to ever fly again...?) The point is simple. When someone suggests that humans should be forced to suffer and die so that you and others might benefit, you say, "No!" To argue about the actuality of the benefit is to be inhumane. It is to accept the possibility that the suggestion is valid. I say it isn't.

I do recognise, however, that we are in the business of achieving change and that we must use whatever tactics might be necessary to abolish all vivisection - wherever and forever. (I trust it is understood that we will not inflict pain on the innocent in order to end pain to the innocent.) It is therefore absolutely vital to familiarise ourselves with all of the arguments against vivisection - moral and medical.

I realise that to most people outside our movement the medical argument takes precedence. The multi-national drug/vivisection businesses spend a fortune spreading their propaganda and feeding lies to those desperate to believe them. The Cancer Research Campaign will stop you dying from cancer - just give them a fiver and some animals will die in your place (except they forget to mention the animals - just in case you've got a conscience). So if you can't convince someone of the moral wrong of vivisection - if they have no regard for non-human beings - then by all means use their self-interest against them. Prove to them that animal experiments are worthless, misleading, gratuitous and ultimately harmful to humans. Believe in the truth of your arguments, arm yourself with the facts, but don't ever forget why you are arguing. Vivisection is just plain wrong.

But suppose you are one of those who condemns people like me for "philosophising". Do I weaken your case? Do you deny the possibility that others might be persuaded by an argument about right and wrong? Personally, I found the moral case against vivisection far easier to accept than the prediction that the next painkiller to be developed by Boots won't work, or will ultimately harm humans (and if you've followed my reasoning so far you'll know that I don't want Boots to develop any more painkillers at the expense of animals!). So what's your problem?

You are on very dodgy ground - putting all your eggs in one basket is never good tactics anyway (to use a non-vegan cliché). I've always thought that anyone with a firmly held belief ought to be prepared to have it challenged, it helps to stop you being dogmatic and to defend a belief often strengthens it and refines your arguments. You say that no animal experiment in the past, the present or the future has ever or can ever benefit humans. Of this you are certain, and on this alone you base your whole case against vivisection. Now I can't say for certain that it won't snow in London in July, or that there isn't a God with a long white beard, so what if one, just one, animal experiment out of countless millions should be proven, beyond doubt, to be of some small benefit to humans? Your argument is destroyed, but mine is unaffected. Impossible? Couldn't happen? Oh well, I was only asking!

My motive for writing this article is not to attack one small element of the movement but to plead for unity. It saddens me to see any condemnation of approach or tactics, as if only a few know how to end animal abuse. "You're wasting your time," is a theme all too often evident in the Comment section of this magazine. I'm not a Christian, but I welcomed Andrew Linzey's book "Christianity and the Rights of Animals"; it helps me in discussions with Christians. I'm not a follower of Hans Ruesch, but I've read his books and they have proved an invaluable source of facts.

Diversity of approach makes our movement grow and makes it strong. Each of us, no matter what our strengths and interests, can have a profound and unpredictable effect on others. One of the most dedicated and active members of our movement that I know was introduced to Animal Rights when he saw a butcher's shop daubed with red paint. He wanted to know why anyone should do such a thing - and he found out! He talked to me and I got involved too. I'm a teacher and have anti-bloodsport posters in my classroom - now some of my ex-pupils go sabbing... Don't make the mistake of thinking that what we do is just a drop in the ocean; rather, see each action as like a pebble thrown into a pond - with ripples spreading far and wide! None of us are wasting our time, so let's stop condemning each other and let each do whatever they feel is right in support of our common aim - the end of animal abuse.

Just Say "I Don't Know" ?

by Noel

There would appear to be a detrimental split emerging within the anti-vivisection movement, caused by the alleged libelling of Peter Singer by Hans Ruesch and Rome's Lega Anti-Vivisezione. In defence of Ruesch scientific anti-vivisectionists are denouncing Singer as a "phoney" and "pro-vivisection" for his refusal to denounce vivisection as scientifically unreliable. It is being claimed that the moral ethical issue (promoted in Singer's book Animal Liberation) has no place in the front line of the anti-vivisection movement. And of course on the other side are the ethical purists arguing that the scientific argument is a 'red-herring' and a distraction from the real argument - that it is morally wrong to use animals in experiments.

Only time will tell what effect this split will have on the anti-vivisection movement. Yet it has highlighted an important point, the point being that we cannot expect one person to hold all the answers to all the questions.

Whenever Peter Singer has been asked about the scientific arguments against vivisection he has had to admit that he doesn't know the answer. According to a representative of the Australian 'People Against Vivisection' group (writing in the CIVIS International Foundation Report Nr.13) Peter Singer, whilst appearing on Australian national television, stated he did not know if "safety testing" on animals was the only method of testing available. Now rather than seeing this as Singer's admittance that vivisection is a positive force for medical research, I would say it shows that the scientific area of the anti-vivisection argument is not his strong point. I feel rather than giving his answer he should have referred the questioner to another source.

The animal rights movement covers a wide range of issues and no one person can be expected to know all the answers to all the questions. Each one of us has certain issues that we can speak on with more confidence than other issues. Therefore it is to no one's shame if, when asked a question that we can not answer, to say, "I'm sorry, I don't know the answer to that but may I refer you to bla bla bla who will be able to answer that question for you." - Rather than giving an answer that can later be used against you and/or the movement as a whole.

Boots - A Decade of Campaigning

by the London Boots Action Group

Hopefully, most Arkangel readers will be familiar with why animal rights campaigners and anti-vivisectionists have been campaigning for so long against Boots. Briefly, besides the nationwide string of chemists for which it is most famous, Boots is a major pharmaceutical company with two laboratories (one in Nottingham - their home town, the other ten miles outside at Thurgaton) where animals are routinely tortured to develop new medicines. The purpose of this article is not to detail the horrific experiments carried out on animals, but to examine the effectiveness of campaigning over the years. Anyone who wants more information on the experiments themselves should contact one of the groups listed below.

Over the years, Boots has been the target of almost every type of campaigning imaginable: ALF direct action (raids and economic sabotage); local groups; national societies; and "inspections". Some have been highly successful, others have not, but it is important we learn the lessons of the past decade, which can be applied not only to Boots but to the struggle for animal liberation as a whole.

Some campaigns are more easily winnable than others. We can picket a local fur shop or pet shop knowing that if we drive away enough business it will close down, but clearly a company that makes a profit of £120 million in one year from selling drugs isn't going to cave in quickly. Nevertheless the anti-Boots campaign is immensely significant in public education. No other drugs company has retail outlets which we can picket. Furthermore, the campaign reaches the crux of vivisection, namely medical research.

Recently, Boots has tried to project a cruelty-free image by claiming that its own-brand cosmetics and toiletries are not tested on animals. Whatever the accuracy of that claim - for example, the finished product may not be tested but the ingredients certainly are - the undeniable fact is that Boots is one of the country's leading vivisectionists. We have to explain to the public that cosmetics testing, the significance of which has been grossly exaggerated by certain groups, accounts for less than one per cent of the total number of experiments performed in this country. The real issue is drugs testing: does it work, does it produce safe drugs, does it improve human health...? These are the questions we will have to address if we are ever to smash the lie that our well-being depends on torturing animals.

Boots was founded as a drugs company in 1888 but it took nearly 100 years for them to be exposed as vivisectionists. On 19th June 1982 their Thurgaton laboratory was raided by the ALF and 12 beagles who were going to be used in heart research were rescued. As a result of this the BUAV (which had just been "radicalised") and Animal Aid called for a Day of Action against the company on 13th November. A march was organised through Nottingham to the head office and groups were asked to demonstrate outside their local branches.

Boots' reaction was hysterical: they sued the BUAV for libel and issued a total of four injunctions in an effort to stop the Day of Action going ahead. The libel writ was withdrawn and the injunctions failed to prevent the march and demos, but ever since the BUAV and Animal Aid have never organised or reported any anti-Boots activity. Behaving like the scum we know they are, Boots advised other animal abusers to use injunctions to gag campaigners. Furriers, meat traders, grouse moor owners and laboratories have all used this tactic over the years.

Throughout the 80's Boots was a prime target for direct action. Chemists all over the country had locks glued, windows smashed and slogans daubed on them. In May 84 two of their chief vivisectionists had their homes "redecorated". A Day of Action was organised by the recently revived Co-ordinating Animal Welfare in June 88 in which 36 groups took part and 90,000 leaflets were distributed.

The next major development occurred on 3rd November 90 when the ALF again raided the Thurgaton lab. Despite the whole site being monitored by cameras, movement sensors, alarm systems and constant security patrols, they managed to rescue eight beagle bitches. A press statement was issued warning Boots that this was "...only the beginning!" Just days later on 12th November, the Animal Liberation Investigation Unit (ALIU) carried out its first inspection of an animal abuse centre - yes, you guessed it, the Thurgaton lab. Beagles in the outside holding unit were filmed and documents taken. Unfortunately the police arrived before the activists could get away and, despite the inspection being legal, 43 people were arrested and charged with burglary, theft and criminal damage. All the charges were dropped in court two months later.

The raid and inspection have galvanised the animal rights movement into action against Boots. 1992 saw an unprecedented amount of anti-Boots activity: a Nationwide Day of Action in June; a picket of their stores in July; and the first national march through Nottingham for ten years in November. Boots "Action Groups" have sprung up across the country and are putting the company under intense pressure; last year London Boots Action Group alone held over 100 demos and gave out over 130,000 leaflets.

Boots' reaction to all this has been to keep their heads down and hope it will go away. They seem to have learned that writs and injunctions won't work. In time for last year's Day of Action they produced a leaflet, "The Boots Company and Animal Testing", in which for the first time they publicly admitted conducting animal research. Despite this some of their employees still believe they don't use animals, apparently because on starting work there they are shown a video which makes this dishonest claim.

Since 1990 there has been a national boycott campaign against Boots. They will only stop animal testing if their profits drop. This doesn't just mean boycotting the chemists and opticians, but also the other businesses they have acquired - Halfords, Fads, Homestyle, Children's World, and Do It All (which they own jointly with WH Smiths). They also own Crookes Healthcare and Farley's. For a full list of their subsidiaries write to one of the groups listed below.

The ways we can put them under pressure are as various as our imagination. Armchair activists can ring up Boots the Opticians (number in the phone book), book an eye test and forget to turn up. This costs them about £15 per test and if enough people do it regularly using a variety of false but believable names, addresses, dates of birth, and phone numbers, we can really put our Boots into their profits.

For the more peripatetic amongst you who like shopping, there's the opportunity to go into one of their stores and cram as much into a basket as possible. Once everything has been rung up at the checkout, simply say you don't want the goods because of Boots' cruelty to animals and walk out. Not only has everything got to be deleted from the till, but someone will have to waste a considerable amount of time putting the items back onto the shelves. Believe it or not, the record for this stands at over £250 - try to beat it yourselves! By the way, both of these stunts are completely legal.

1993 will see no let up in the campaign. There will be another Day of Action on 19th June and the AGM will again be picketed. Attacks on Boots' stores - currently running at more than two a day - will no doubt continue to increase. Last year was not a good one for Boots the vivisectors: on top of the actions against them the recession continued to bite deeply into their profits. This year promises to be no better - perhaps it's time they got out of the animal torturing business?!

THE NATIONAL

ANTI-HUNT PETITION

by Niel Hansen

Each year in Britain, 200 foxhunts kill 20,000 foxes. Half of those hunted are dug out and baited with terriers after attempting to find sanctuary in their earths. This can take up to six hours. The exhausted animal is then thrown to the hounds, shot or "bagged" for another day's "sport".

Each year, young hounds have to be taught to kill foxes. This is done by throwing them six-month-old cubs to maul. Hounds showing no inclination to hunt are shot.

Hunts claim to keep down the number of foxes while often encouraging them to breed to ensure there are enough to hunt!

We have launched a major new national campaign to help end this carnage, and we would like to invite your readers to help.

In a democratic society, the views of the majority should prevail - and 80% of the British public would like to see hunting banned. We must constantly remind our elected representatives of this fact until they finally take action.

Readers can help by writing an urgent letter to their MP at the House of Commons, London SW1A 0AA calling for a hunt ban.

We have also produced a petition calling on the Government to ban hunting. Copies of this petition, along with other suggestions as to how readers can help Britain's wildlife, are available in return for a stamp from the National Anti-Hunt Petition, PO Box 66, Broxbourne, Herts EN10 6LU.

DIRECT ACTION

by Moya

I used to hate the League Against Cruel Sports. I remembered one time reading how much they had spent on some investigation or other - which had uncovered some useful information - but all that money (I think £80,000) could have set up dozens of hunt sab groups with quality reliable transport. While I tucked into pasta on Friday nights to give me energy for sabbing the next day, and woke up unfailingly at ridiculous times on Saturday mornings to run to exhaustion, get wet, cold, muddy and blistered, to risk injury or worse, the thought of them not getting involved gave me a sense of despair for these well-meaning part-timers.

Recently I thought differently. Anyone who calls our political system "Democracy" is sadly mistaken. It's not even the correct term for it. And the voting system, party system, influence of industry etc. etc. make the comparison with democracy laughable. Yet we're close to a position where we can, against this power, get foxhunting banned. Okay, so it's only foxhunting - a small part of the enormous malady of animal abuse, but for one point, would you say that if you were a fox? And secondly, it's something better than nothing. McNamara's Bill came so close, and prospects are now even better. Hunt sabs intend to close foxhunting using other means - admirable and to be supported, and they have helped close hunts. But as someone who has been involved in particularly intense and successful sabbing of a hunt which continues to bounce back, I'm well aware of the difficulties presented. And closing them down must be our target. Saving foxes here and there is fantastic, but the hunts have to be eliminated completely, and stopped once and for all.

Despite the crazy political system we're up against, facts can't be ignored, and even the inmates of the House of Commons are forced to face them. If the LACS hadn't splashed out all that dosh on getting facts together, the pro-hunt argument wouldn't have been annihilated and would continue to maintain a foothold in the light of no strong opposition.

Supporting evidence in its masses is essential to overturn an established situation and attitude.

Take vivisection. ALF have done some incredible things in their time. They have undoubtedly saved countless animals from vivisection and have even closed down specific parts of the industry. Their commitment and policies are exemplary.

But again, we need abolition. Imagine if the ALF was enormous, and saved 100,000 animals a year. That would still mean over 3 million unhelped in Britain. But what if we get abolition? Okay, so maybe it seems a dream to you, but the scientific evidence is enough to show it should go for mankind's benefit alone. Can the public ignore it forever? Can our governments? They've never really been tried properly, but the signs are good. I vote we go for it.

I hope in reading this you don't interpret any 'anti-direct action' motives. Frankly, I think the notion that non-violent direct action "sets the movement back ten years" is utter crap, and there's no evidence to support it. To believe it, is to play into the hands of our adversaries. As I mentioned earlier, I've sabbed with every ounce of commitment and I support the Front. I've written and sent Christmas cards to prisoners.

I just want changes to be permanent.

The advantages that industry has over small, low-budget groups like ourselves is that they can buy respectability. They can employ full-time forces to present misleading ideas for an easily duped public, forces who speak as though they are the intelligent ones, the ones who know, the ones who have sorted out what is really going on. The ones to listen to. If we get our act together we can fight that. Okay, so they buy the images and the fraudulent research studies, but we've got truth. Is that not a powerful tool we can use for our cause? Is it not a weapon from which there is no real escape?

We all work in our own ways, but I strongly believe knowing our business is essential. I disappoints me how many genuine people have not read 'Slaughter of the Innocent' and are unable to argue their beliefs coherently.

I urge everyone to get informed. Information from magazines like 'Turning Point' is an excellent way to start. When the truth gets out, there will be so few places left for the opposition to hide.

In Defence of the Press Officer

by Keith Mann

Many people will have seen the recent publication entitled "As Long As There Are Slaughterhouses.... Then There Shall Be Battlefields", which describes itself as an historical look at the actions against animal abuse from 1991 onwards - which indeed it is. Personally I have no problems with that; in fact, I think it's generally a very pleasant read. One section did disturb me a little however, namely; "Who is Robin Webb we wonder?" This attacks

Robin for speaking to the press about ALF actions, and also makes some points which I feel should have been made in a personal letter to, say, Arkangel or perhaps to Robin himself, and not anonymously in a publication designed, I presume, to be positive.

I believe without reservation in the need for an ALF spokesperson, and have to reply to the offending article.

To begin with, it is suggested that Robin set himself up as the ALF spokesperson / Press Officer without consulting anyone else. In fact, discussions were afoot sometime before he took over the previously vacant post, and Robin, being conversant with the ALF, and not involved in ALF actions was the best person for the job. Previous ALF spokespeople have all fallen foul of the law because of their (alleged! - Ed.) involvement in illegal acts. Robin will simply explain the ALF to those who want to know - without breaking any laws - and so retain the job and his liberty.

In October last year, a press conference was organised for Robin and a handful of others who saw the need for a press officer. Unfortunately, the police were doubly busy around that time, and just prior to the conference some who were due to attend were imprisoned for their (alleged! - Ed.) nocturnal activities. The press conference was cancelled but Robin announced his position regardless.

There are a number of reasons why the ALF needs a press officer, one of which was mentioned in the article; the press generally can't be trusted. They lie, it's all part of the dirty job they do. Consequently, activists who have trusted them in the past have, on occasion, suffered for it, and activists who have trusted them recently may yet do likewise.

Press coverage of actions can be as important as the actions themselves, and an explanation of why the actions take place is vital in highlighting the cruelty of animal abuse.

Some activists consider the actions themselves to be risky enough without putting their liberty in the hands of reporters, while others either don't like speaking to them or are not confident enough to do so. With a press officer all the problems are overcome. If, for whatever reason, the person(s) responsible for questioning Robin Webb's position doesn't want media follow up of their actions, Robin can be told to make no comment when approached by the press, either over the mobile phone, which is a safe method, or by passing on a message. I'm confident Robin will oblige.

I do believe it is of benefit to have someone to speak publicly about the reasons why people are prepared to take risks on behalf of animals, rather than to say nothing, or to risk losing activists who have put their trust in reporters.

who is Robin Webb we wonder?

It seems as if he has set himself up to be the self appointed spokesperson for the A.L.F. How such a position can arise when he states the A.L.F. is "not so much an organisation, more a state of mind", is beyond us.

What is it that enables him to talk to what has patently become our enemy - the press (anyone who still doubts this should check out the amount of evidence in the up and coming cases which comes directly from the press) on our behalf?

By acting autonomously, individuals escaped from representation, side-stepped careerists and would-be leaders. Yet they keep arising, speaking NOT on behalf of the activists, but on their own behalf, their own interpretations of what has happened.

'Press Officers', like journalists are mere commentators, accepting the validity of the media, regardless of the media's blatant mystification and fabrication of the facts. By having a figure to identify with, the media are freely able to perpetuate the myth that there is an organisation - as if Webb was appointed.

The press officer is just another role high in the "right on" credibility stakes. Although we wouldn't want to slag off Robin personally or question his honesty or dedication - the joke of it all is that the media spend much of the time discussing his appearance. What isn't so much a joke is that heavy prison sentences have been handed out to four individuals in the past, in part for their roles as press officers.

The current police interest in Mr. Webb surely isn't coincidental. All the lurid and scandal surrounding Robin Webb and his membership of the RSPCA council was in REAL terms, totally irrelevant bureaucratic bickering. Animal Liberation will not come about through a more radical RSPCA (or any other pressure group for that matter), more protest marches simply asking for or legislative laws. Total liberation will be brought closer through revolutionary practice and change. Change which will demolish hierarchical relationships and ideologies - so that humans no longer necessitate "their right" to use and abuse animals and each other as they wish.

Parliament, the RSPCA, the BUAV (etc) and most importantly the media will never be mediums for such an idea - since it is too threatening to their own cosy niche in the status quo.

What individuals acting under the name of the A.L.F. have consistently done is demonstrated actual acts of animal liberation and initiated a process of attack against those who deliberately profit, financially or through sick pleasure, from the hierarchical domination of other species.

Our real hope is not in more widespread publicity, not in radical notions or campaigns but in the extension of the struggle to encompass the breaking of all hierarchical relationships.

The fight for animal liberation is part of a fight back against the reduction of life into commodities. We are either debating, negotiating, asking pretty please and waiting for permanently postponed change or we are acting towards revolutionary liberation - an exercise that includes liberating ourselves.

The idea of a press officer, reflects societies way of 'legitimate' campaigning. All too often people fail to learn from others, or even their own mistakes. The traditional forms of organisation and 'weapons of combat' are known by Power and they are vulnerable to the arms the state possesses.

We receive a great many letters and articles, and we try to include as many as possible. Please remember that articles will not be published if:

- * they are intended to incite others to commit criminal activities
- * they threaten illegal acts
- * they endanger the safety of activists
- * they name "infiltrators" or "traitors" without proof
- * or if they are seriously likely to get us sued!

Time For Change

by ABC

As world populations rise, and resources become harder to exploit and plunder, the plight of all animals will become a far greater concern. Commonsense and a humane approach needs a priority label.

In Man's quest for better lifestyles, comfort and well-being, issues which need greater consideration than they already receive have been shelved, ignored and dismissed.

Distant rumblings of concern began in the late 70's. People were becoming aware of the escalating number of domestic pets which were being given a one-way ticket out of this world. The rumblings continued into the 80's, but the all-powerful RSPCA said nothing, they ignored the sounds of unrest and concern - of course they would - they were the main perpetrators of death.

The rumblings continued, and then eruption - when it was discovered that the organisation was treating destruction as a means of controlling domestic pets. The problem had become too big to contain and the UK was swamped with animals who were unwanted, turned out, beaten, starved and abused.

The RSPCA blamed everyone but themselves for this uncontrolled mess. We were guilty of irresponsibility and ignorance, and lately the failure of dog registration. In this turmoil and conflagration ABC was born (1986) - in anger and determination that animals deserved better lives, and surgical help for what Nature decreed was their purpose - procreation in large numbers.

The "Final Solution" is not the answer, spay/neuter is!

The arguments for this form of salvation has its critics. Comments such as: "Too traumatic, too painful for the animal," and "What if the operation is inexpertly done, a life of constant discomfort for the animal?"

ABC says, "What right have we to play God and take away the life which he gives?" These fears are acknowledged by ABC and we realise that veterinary surgeons under pressure of work could delegate sterilisation to an inexpert junior vet, thus saving his time for more complex operations. At the present time spay/neuter in the form we are familiar with is the only way, but research in America has come up with a chemical sterilant which can be administered by injection for both male and female animals. Although still in its testing stage, the outlook for an alternative to the spaying operation will be welcomed with open arms in the UK as a cheaper innovation. The Humane Society of the United States has already conducted tests on wildlife: horses, deer and other small animals. Further injections will be given to dogs and cats from four selected sanctuaries.

ABC has been promised information and results once it is determined whether the injection could be the alternative needed to control the birth explosion in domestic pets. In approximately six months time HSUS will have confirmation that the chemo-sterilant is available for worldwide use.

Each year that passes brings more and more animals into the world without a hope of survival for thousands of them. The sheer reluctance of the RSPCA to meet the problem head on and to use the resources so willingly donated by the public is tantamount to fraud.

Spay/neuter critics who feel that the subject is controversial and should not be undertaken should put themselves in the place of an animal about to die, not because it is ill or suffering, but because it is healthy, young and fit - but unwanted. Which avenue would they choose? Eternal darkness before a chance to live, or the help of a happy, trouble-free life? As Kim Sturla of the Peninsula Humane Society in California said, "Come and pick up one of the dogs which we have to kill every day, hold her as she is injected with poison, feel the life leave her body. Then look me in the eye and tell me that this is right." ABC rests its case.

A Plea For Tolerance

by "Tom"

"I have striven not to laugh at human actions, not to weep at them, nor to hate them, but to understand them." Spinoza.

In a recent newspaper article about women in the animal rights movement, one activist - when asked if her views might make people think animal rights supporters had a screw loose - said: "These days, I'm only interested in what people who think like us think." ('Who cares what happens to animals?', The Guardian, 30th April 1992). The rest of the human race, then, has ceased to figure in her scheme of things. They are not even worth thinking about.

This seems like rather an extreme and cynical attitude to adopt; yet I have come to believe that this attitude is shared, to a greater or lesser degree, by many other activists. Few of us can deny, for instance, that we have felt the stirrings of something inside us - annoyance, disgust, anger... perhaps even hatred - whenever we have seen other people tucking into veal cutlets, or queueing outside a zoo. Against the virulent disease of worldwide animal exploitation, we are a small army of antibodies; and because the disease is so rife, infecting virtually every cell of human society, it is easy for us to cultivate an attitude of intolerance towards other people: people who - perhaps for no other reason than sheer ignorance about animal abuse - do not yet comprehend or support our views.

This attitude may, then, be understandable - but does that necessarily make it acceptable? The important question we need to ask ourselves is: Does the adoption of such an attitude do anything to help persuade more people to "think like us"? After our conversion to the cause, the obvious rationality of it makes it easy for us to forget that we were - with very few exceptions - all once part of the disease ourselves. Now that we are part of the cure, we have a responsibility to ensure that our message is passed on persuasively and incontestably. Instead of alienating others through dogma or affectations of moral superiority, it may pay many of us to take a mental step outside of our cocoon of self-righteousness, and to try to think ourselves back into our pre-animal rights frame of mind: to recall the things that served to re-shape our way of thinking.

Let me now state my own case, as I'm sure it echoes the experiences of many. I've been an animal lover since I was a child, but up until four years ago I saw no real contradiction between this and the fact that I ate animals, wore animals and watched them at zoos and circuses. I spent my childhood and early youth in South London, where I was comfortably isolated from the reality of things like factory farming and hunting; my only contact with farm animals had been at the butcher's shop, where one didn't buy a chunk of an animal's corpse - one bought a joint of meat. I, like my parents and their parents before them, had been brought up to accept a particular set of beliefs regarding the use of animals for food: 'They eat each other, so it's only natural that we should eat them... we couldn't survive without meat in our diet... and besides, the animals live contented lives on the farm, and they are killed quite painlessly'; and so on.

The question that these animals might have 'rights' was never raised, because it just wasn't regarded as a relevant issue for human consideration; any thoughts that there might be suffering connected with animal exploitation were conveniently shut away in the attic of our collective subconscious, along with all the other bits of repressed guilt accumulated over the years. Phrases like 'humane slaughter', and fairytale depictions of contented farm animals helped (and, of course, still help) to complete the deception. The law of the jungle was sacred, and any who choose to disagree with it were usually regarded as drop-outs or members of some obscure lunatic fringe. For generations, people have been brought up on these misconceived beliefs - and the majority of people still adhere to them. It took me until my mid-20s to discover the demon behind the mask; for this, I have to thank some undogmatic vegetarian friends, who helped and guided (rather than bullied or shamed) me into facing the truth. It still pains me to think that it should have taken so long - but the vital point I want to emphasise is that it wasn't my fault that I hadn't understood these things before; it was just the way I had been 'conditioned' by the society I had grown up in.

It is this 'conditioning' that presents the animal rights movement with its greatest challenge. We have to demolish a huge wall of prejudice, ignorance and indifference whose foundations and buttresses are an age-old, culturally-ingrained belief that human survival is dependant upon animal exploitation. If we turn away from this wall in the belief that it is too strong to tackle, then we might as well give up hope of ever achieving our objectives; in short, we might as well turn our backs on the animals whose rights we espouse... and this is what any attempt to dissociate ourselves from others amounts to. You can't treat a disease by ignoring it.

No matter how slow the process of change may feel, the animal rights movement is gathering momentum from year to year. The sooner we can cast off the impediments of intolerance and antagonism, and the sooner we can begin to be more objective and understanding in our approach to those outside the movement, the faster our beliefs will spread, and the more chance they will stand of becoming an integral part of future cultural awareness.

FORGET UNITY!

by Alistair Mullan

Time and time again we have heard the call for unity within this 'movement', usually after ALF actions have been criticised by spokespersons from some of the national societies. We're told that there's room for both ALF activity and for parliamentary and educational campaigns in the struggle. I would have to say though, that unity is absurd when we consider the differing elements within the 'movement' - from the ALF through to the RSPCA. But it's not just absurd, for I would say that such a proposition could endanger our ability to achieve animal liberation.

Of course there is room for all types of campaigning. The questions that have to be asked are: how effective are they, and whether we're wasting a lot of energy on them. It may be an unfortunate reality with political and educational campaigns, but it seems to me that we're always hanging on, waiting to get that bit further down the road to victory - but in most cases it never seems to come and if it does it is usually only a small step with so many conditions that it is turned into a side-step. Most of the national societies, namely the BUAV, Animal Aid, RSPCA, CIWF, Lynx, LACS, the Vegetarian Society, and to a lesser extent NAVS, seem to spend endless amounts of money on campaigns geared to the public, the media or politicians. Yet we know that politicians don't really give a toss. The general public tend to stay immersed in apathy and ignorance in this 'free market' TV culture. They may be shocked by major media exposures, but it quickly becomes "yesterday's news" for them in their busy lives. The powers that be are happy for us to play within their media circus and political arena because they know they can keep us in check so long as we don't step outside those limits.

They have the money, the clout, the newspapers and TV to make sure they always come out on top. But the national societies still believe they can make progress through these avenues. No matter what they say about being for animal rights/liberation or what their real motives might be, one only has to look at what they actually do; activities aimed at getting society to reform its own treatment of animals - a society whose very fabric is based around the holocaust of animal abuse - and at the same time they condemn the direct action tactics that go beyond this sphere and really do make a difference.

For it is only through direct action and ALF activities that things have ever looked like changing; the reduction in numbers of animal experiments through ALF raids breaking down laboratory walls and exposing vivisection; the closing down of fur outlets through fire-bombings and disruptive picketing, butcher's shops through constant hassle, pack hunts through persistent sabbing; the destruction of labs; the stopping of animal research programmes; and of course the rescuing of thousands of animals.

In the last couple of years the level of economic sabotage has soared, with thousands of windows broken all over the country and fire-bomb attacks on the meat industry. If there's any doubt about the effect this is having on the animal abuse industries we only have to look at how they and their state sponsored protectors have reacted. Scared and desperate, they have gone over the top with numerous arrests, court cases, raids on offices, closing down bank accounts and PO boxes, confiscating mail, publications and equipment, constant surveillance and police harassment in the past year in a bid to stamp out the new found vitality in direct action. A vitality that is shown, not only in illegal actions, but in the growing number of inspections and investigations of animal abuse establishments, as well as the harder edged, more confrontational approach to picketing - with roof-top protests, sit-ins and disruptions. These new tactics, highlighted mainly through the work of Animal Liberation and the ALIU, have shown how we can outmanoeuvre the animal abusers and their protectors and make life very difficult for them, thus increasing the momentum in our fight for animal liberation.

In the early eighties, following the high public profile of ALF raids, it was the newly formed animal rights groups around the country that made the running whilst the national societies tended to lag behind, being mainly influenced by grassroots activity, making them more radical. However, in the late eighties / early nineties the table have turned with the national societies taking the upper hand and influencing local groups and activists with their now much softer approach. It's as if the powers that be had been losing control of the strong-feeling, animal-loving minority in those early years, but have now regained it courtesy of the national societies. The initiative to confront the animal abusers head on seems to have gradually drained away from us. It's time to regain that initiative, as has already been happening with Animal liberation and the ALIU, with tactics which will really hit the abusers where it hurts - and this means much more emphasis on direct action tactics. Can we really afford not to do this? What would those incarcerated animals think if they saw 22,000 activists marching through the streets for them? Not a lot I would imagine, but they might see the potential there to achieve their freedom. As it says in the Animal liberation newsletter, "The animals are crying out for us to get our acts together - they are literally dying for DIRECT ACTION."

Whilst I would say there is still a role for activities like leafleting, stalls and demos, I believe we must persuade and encourage all local groups and activists, not already enlightened, to take back the initiative and re-invigorate the fight for animal liberation. Alternatively, they can be led around by national societies, going through endless weekly routines of leafleting, stalls, letter-writing and marches, and being dragged away from their real potential through numerous 'National Days of Action' and futile campaigns which are mapped out for them to plug away at for years on end. Surely all of us, who are genuine activists in the fight for animal liberation, have a responsibility to see that this does not happen. If we stick to our guns it won't matter how much hassle the opposition give us, for we are now starting to realise our full potential. We are becoming stronger and more determined all the time, and we know we are capable of winning and will, because we are right!

(Alistair asked us to stress that the "Direct Action" which he refers to means actions which are within the Law.)

What's Our Duty?

by Emilie E:son

(Press Officer of the Swedish ALF)

People in the radical AR movement breathe, talk, sleep animal rights and direct actions, drive up and down the country with rescued animals. We take high risks all the time. Many of us believe it's our duty to rescue animals and carry out economic actions. And a duty it is.

As I see it we have a second duty - to support all those in the movement all over the world who need our support. This support can look different, it could be just to donate money to the ALFSG, the ALF's press officer Robin Webb, SARP and Arkangel. Actually, I believe especially Robin Webb could do with some support - for himself as a person, and as the press officer. I know he has had a hard time with the police and other problems such as phone tapping, house search and so on.

Robin Webb is a great asset for the ALF and he needs all the help he can get!

Support is also to write letters and postcards to the AR activists in prison. They must not be forgotten. Everyone can afford a piece of paper, an envelope and a stamp. For years I've been in touch with AR prisoners. In the beginning it was just "support" from my side. But as time passed it became a two-way support and I learned a lot about various things I didn't know before.

It saddens me that there are actually some people - very few - who believe it's a waste of time and money to run the support groups and to write to prisoners. That's a lot of crap! I don't believe supporting will steal time from animal rescues. Actually, I believe if we support the prisoners during their hard times they might get so much strength that they go on working for animal rights when they get out of prison.

But there is another important matter when you support a prisoner. The prison personnel understand that the prisoners are not alone and they won't treat him/her badly because they know that it will come out to the public sooner or later. But most of all, we show unity when we write to prisoners, and that unity and solidarity is number one in our struggle. We have big enemies against us, but together in solidarity and unity we can fight back.

* (Here Emilie suggests that you do something highly illegal and write and tell prisoners about it. We had to omit that paragraph for obvious reasons!)*

I wish all AR activists, in prison or outside, a very good year full of direct actions for the animals' sake.

The Animal Rights Coalition

The Animal Rights Coalition is, to put it simply, a national network of all the local animal rights groups. There are over 250 local groups in Britain.

The coalition was set up in response to the lack of communication between local groups. Better communication will ensure that a group can call upon people from other areas to support their demos, etc. A good example of this would be the demonstration at Gerry Cottle's Circus during its three week stay in Liverpool over the Christmas period. Campaigners were present every night leafleting. In order to make it easier for the Liverpool group people from Manchester, Bolton and Blackpool took over on some of the nights. Another example is the current set of demos taking place at Dover docks - organised by the SEARC.

The aims of the coalition are as follows: To enable better communication between local groups by establishing a nationwide coalition divided into regional networks (the North West network has been running for over 18 months, others are still being organised). The groups in each network will meet regularly, perhaps bi-monthly, to plan future events that the network might like to organise together rather than one local group being left to organise on their own. An example of this in the North West is the Waterloo Cup and Grand National demos which are organised by the network and not by a local group. Tactics can also be discussed. The meetings are also a good forum for local groups to ask for help for any of their events.

There will be a national meeting twice a year. The next meeting is on Sunday, 18th April, and is to be held at Blackcurrant House, Northampton - for more information or a map, contact the address below. At the first meeting, two particularly good suggestions were made:

The first was to hold national local group days of action, where all local groups hold an action against a certain animal abuser on the same day. The first day of action was held on Saturday, 27th February, against cancer research groups who test on animals. The second is to be on July 10th against General Motors.

The second idea was to produce leaflets in bulk, with a space on the back for each group to add their own details. The leaflets will be in colour, and because we will be buying in bulk we can get a low price, so local groups can purchase coloured leaflets at affordable prices. The first leaflet will be on vivisection.

I must finish this article with an answer to a criticism which has surfaced and which I feel is not justified. That is that ARC is going to be just another national group. ARC is not a group as such. It is being used only as a co-ordinating name, not for a body. The only reason ARC needs a name is so I can use it to send out newsletters and organise national ARC meetings, not so ARC can tell the local groups what they can and can't do. Each network has complete autonomy on how they run their network, without any interference from me or anyone else.

I, and others who attended the first national ARC meeting, feel the only way forward for the animal rights movement is through the local groups and not through most of the national groups. We must first of all put our act together and hopefully ARC will enable us to do this.

"Libearty"

by Vivien Clifford

During last November I organised a sponsored aerobics, called "Bearobics", to raise money for the World Society for the Protection of Animals' (WSPA) "Libearty" Campaign. I managed to raise £1500 towards the building of the first Bear Sanctuary in Greece, created to place "dancing" bears that the WSPA planned to rescue. The cruel practice of making bears dance is illegal in Greece and Turkey, but the authorities had no place to put confiscated bears and they could not be returned to the wild.

Recently, people all over Britain saw harrowing scenes on television of a dawn raid rescue by the WSPA of the first of the dancing bears in Greece. Tragically, Dmitri, the bear featured on their posters, was found to be in such a painful and pitiful state, the WSPA vet had no choice but to humanely destroy him.

He was found to have had ten holes drilled through his nose, which, together with his jaw, was a mass of scar tissue where the chains, inserted to control him, had been yanked out. He was blind, chained up in squalor and fed bits of dry bread or dustbin scraps. Rarely has such cruelty to animals been witnessed, especially as he had been ill-treated for the twenty-eight years of his life. To think, we have been fighting for animal rights for years, BUT WE DID NOT KNOW ABOUT THE TERRIBLE CRUELTY OF THE DANCING BEARS. As it takes place on the continent (as well as in India and Russia), why didn't any of us know about these poor bears?

If anyone wants to organise a sponsored event, or to donate to the WSPA, please contact: WSPA, "Libearty", 2 Langley Lane, London SW8 1TJ. Tel. 071 793 0540. They need lots of money to build sanctuaries in Turkey and India in order to release the bears from their misery.

John Lewis Replies

This letter is from the Chief Information Officer of the John Lewis Partnership and is in response to a campaign called for in Arkangel 8 against the sale of snakeskin products.

Dear ...

Thank you for your letter to the Chairman concerning the sale of products made with snakeskin.

We now no longer feel able to rely on the assurances that have been given to us in the past that snakes were killed painlessly. For that reason, we have recently decided to discontinue the purchase of snakeskin products until, and unless, we are absolutely confident that a humane killing method is available. At present, it seems unlikely that such a method can be found.

We do have some residual stocks of snakeskin products, which means that it may be some months before a few of the slower-selling items disappear from our department stores.

Yours sincerely

Mark Effendowicz

A Rethink?

by "Badger"

Is it time to rethink our methods, as our present ones do not seem to be accomplishing all we would wish for? What are we wishing for?

This is a large part of the problem as I see it. The AR movement is so divided in its aims that it cannot ever hope to achieve an end to animal suffering as it is only chipping away at little stones in a big quarry. We must hurt the animal abuse industry instead of making them laugh - which is all they do when they see the latest "cruelty free" campaign being launched by a celebrity wearing a t-shirt. Wow, they must be really shitting themselves! What are we going to do, talk them into submission?

Why do people think it is cruel to wear fur or hunt a fox or torture an animal in a laboratory and yet they don't think it's cruel to kill it and eat it. Probably they do think it is cruel but they enjoy their immoral lifestyle and will do almost anything to protect it.

I don't think we can change these people's attitudes, certainly not for a couple of thousand years or so, (and I think some in the AR movement would be prepared to wait), so what are we to do about it?

When abusers' property is damaged costs go up which are eventually passed on to the Big Mac-eating consumer. If the level of damage is high or if people are scared to don their slaughterhouse aprons then meat will once again become a product for the rich which will further widen the gap between rich and poor which could be turned to our advantage if only we try.

How much effort is ploughed into hunt sabbing? Although it is a worthy activity in itself, it doesn't accomplish a lot. It all too often seems to be a swipe at the rich instead of being about protecting the poor fox. Wouldn't it be better to channel this energy into bringing down the farmers and the burger store owners of this world who are filling the minds of young children with total bullshit and filling their stomachs with total BULL!

It is all a question of priorities. We must put things into perspective and realise that the deaths of tens of millions of farm animals must rank higher in importance than the disgusting pastimes of huntsmen and women. I suppose this might offend some sabs who do marvellous work saving various wild animals, but the problem of farming (factory or otherwise) is so huge that it needs an awful lot of attention if we are to have any hope of bringing an end to this mass slaughter.

One other consideration is that of public support. A large majority of public opinion is in favour of the abolition of "bloodsports", so shouldn't we unite and fight something which the public don't give a toss about?

Eating animal produce is so ingrained into people's lifestyle that I don't think we can ever realistically hope to end this barbaric practice by gentle persuasion, we must look at other ways of accomplishing our aims because while we natter on, the animals are suffering more and more and we are all the hope they've got.

Junk Food Junkies

by Steve Tasane

We'd murder for a burger, we're dying for a fry,
If we were any wiser we might make a better buy,
But we're the Junk Food Junkies, we're the Fast Food Freaks,
We guzzle Coca Cola 'cos our karma's up the creek.
We bought the bigger breakfast, we loved the larger lunch,
Now dinner's more enormous than our mandibles can munch.
We wolfed it down this morning, we're pigging out at noon,
Tonight we'll scoff like human beings - tomorrow we will swoon.
It's a dietary depression, we're nutritionally insane,
The stuff inside the sausages emulsifies the brain,
'Cos when the Junk Food Junkies need a fast food fix,
All the gunge-toting gangsters deal a greasy bag of tricks.
But take away the additives, subtract some of the fat,
Suck out all the colouring - now be the judge of that!
It isn't so delicious, it is rubbery and rough,
Flesh of slaughtered animal is stomach churning stuff.
It's bred to be anaemic so the meat's the proper shade,
With injected antioxidants the flesh'll be first grade.
The sulphites keep it sumptuous, E-numbers keep it neat,
We all enjoy the benzoates, the sucrose keeps us sweet.
'Cos we're the Junk Food Junkies in a fast food jail,
Stuck behind the burger bars, we're pallid and we're pale.
The saccharin's malignant, the protein count is low,
But pushers of preservatives say it'll help us grow;
And burger propaganda says: we all need meat to live,
While healthy vegans everywhere ask: are you positive?
Meat is murder, we all say, the burger bar's a tomb,
And factory farming torture camps are harvesters of doom.
But if we dare to criticise they drag us through the courts,
And bleed us dry - like animals - without a second thought,
Then chop down trees for leaflets, claiming how they really care -
Don't moan about the ozone hole, we'll fill it with hot air.
'Cos we're the Junk Food Junkies, we're the Fast Food Freaks,
Carnivores with knives and forks, we're feeble and we're weak.
Their crap's not just convenient, their table-talk's a lie,
'Cos we've murdered for that burger, now we're dying for that fry...

Vegan Society Video

by Richard Farhall

The Vegan Society has started work on a vegan promotional video. It is anticipated that it will have a running time of 20 minutes and will highlight the benefits of a vegan diet for the environment, 'Third World', human health and animal welfare - with particular emphasis on the dairy industry. It is intended that it will have international appeal.

The Society is fortunate to have been offered discounted technical facilities and professional services and so estimates that a good quality video can be made for as little as £5,000. However, this is £5,000 the Society cannot afford and consequently the Vegan Video Fund has been established. The names of those contributing to the Fund are published in the Society's magazine - The Vegan. Contributions (cheques/POs payable to 'The Vegan Society') should be sent to:

The Fight Goes On

by Vivien Clifford

According to a recent, rather unsympathetic, article in Time Out magazine, fur is making a comeback. Apparently, fashion students are using it in their designs, Harrods are selling real fur (in fur trims, I understand) and with the extinction of the anti-fur organisation, Lynx, the furriers are gaining confidence.

At a recent picketing of fur shops in the West End, it was noticed that fur is creeping back in trims around the neck, ankles and wrists - a cunning way to encourage people once again to accept the wearing of fur.

It is probably common knowledge in our movement that Lynx recently lost a libel case against them after they entered a fur farm and reported the barbaric conditions they found to the Ministry of Agriculture and in their own magazine. As a result of losing the case, they were forced into liquidation. One wonders why their multi-millionaire patrons did not rescue them, but perhaps Lynx is to be resurrected with their help? We can only wait and see.

Lynx have done a great job in alerting the public to the appalling cruelty to animals used for their fur. However, we campaigners did much before the existence of Lynx to fight the fur trade - and we will again. So if the furriers believe that with the demise of Lynx all opposition to their wretched trade will cease, they are very much mistaken. We will show that in this particular war against cruel animal exploitation, which we have been so close to winning, we are still here and are determined not to be defeated.

It is true that from January 1st, 1995, the use of the leghold trap will be prohibited in the EC, as will the importation of fur from certain wild species from countries not using "humane" traps, or still using the leghold trap. But what is a "humane" trap, and why are not all species of animals included? Fox and mink are not mentioned at all, so fur farming will continue unabated.

There is an interesting quote at the end of the Time Out article in that Lynx had a surprising supporter - the Fur Education Council - a spokesman of which recently said, "I hope Lynx does continue to exist... it's a case of the better the devil one knows... that other fur groups have their eyes on the anti-fur mantle."

Well, I am not a group but an individual, and I have decided to organise a national march and rally against the fur trade. This will at least keep the kettle on the boil until Lynx returns, if they do, in one form or another.

AN ANIMAL HELPLINE

by Sue Smith

Do you have any dependant creature companions?
Have you ever considered what would happen to them if you went out for a few hours and due to an accident, heart attack, mugging or wrongful arrest did not return and worse still was not able to contact anyone to attend to their needs? These things don't just happen to other people. If it happened to you, how long would it be before anyone called at your home and discovered their plight? Would your cherished little friends suffer and eventually die, bewildered by the lack of care which you have always provided?

If the answer to any of these questions is "Yes", and you would be willing to safeguard their future for the cost of a few pence and a few minutes of your time, please write to me enclosing an A4 size self-addressed envelope and £1 in postage stamps to cover photocopying and postage. I will then send you a care pack which will enable you and 6 other people in your area to set up a group which will ensure your creature's safety and may even save your life if you live alone. It involves a telephone tree system which has been devised in such a way as to provide an infallible lifeline for you and your loved ones who can't help themselves.

There is no annual fee, no cost of membership, only the initial £1 which will enable you to set up your group for life. Also you could include in your group senior citizens who would love to give a home to a rescued creature but who feel it would be unfair to subject them to the risk of neglect should they have a fall or sudden illness and not be able to summon help. Belonging to a care group would remove this risk and could well provide many homeless creatures with a home and lonely people with the companionship of an animal of their own to love. It would be very difficult to envisage a system which has more potential to prevent suffering for such a small investment of time, cost and effort. If your creature companions are at risk from any of the scenarios mentioned above you owe it to them to at least look into this opportunity to protect them and to find out how easy it is to prevent them from becoming innocent victims of unforeseen circumstances.

Ten Years On (and Winning!)

by Chris Tucker

It was in the autumn of 1982 that I contacted the Hunt Saboteurs Association and joined the West London Sab Group.

I went on my first hunt sab wearing a leather jacket and took pork sandwiches. The other sabs 'gently' explained their views. The following week I went sabbing again. My leather jacket and pork sandwiches remained at home, both to be soon given up permanently.

That was the beginning of it all, and the thing I dreaded most over these last ten years was being sent to prison. I always seemed to avoid it - until now...

In December 1992, I was convicted and sentenced to 15 months imprisonment for throwing a 'smoke bomb' into a McDonalds restaurant. Actually, the device thrown (despite what the press and the judge said) was not a smoke bomb but a small smoke cone. I have heard recently that McDonalds will now sell vegetarian burgers. I hope the campaign against them will continue until that is all they sell. We must never forget the millions of gentle animals they still murder every year.

Prison has not been anywhere near as bad as I expected it to be, which is largely due to the letters of support I have received. Being here has also given me time to look back and reflect upon the last ten years.

As well as the depressing times, I have had more than my fair share of laughs and amazing experiences.

I have also known some of the most genuine and dedicated people I think I am ever likely to come across. I think above all, however, I will always remember the animals I have had the good fortune to meet, and whose lives have been saved.

I can see now how far we have advanced. The West London Sab Group in the early 80's often had only 10 people coming out to sab. Now, 30+ is not uncommon.

Butchers' shops and meat vehicles are attacked with almost continuous regularity. The fur trade was virtually wiped out during the 80's, thousands of animals were, and are still being, saved from torture and death each year. The list of successes is endless - let us see that continue. The fur trade must not be allowed to make a comeback. Fish sabbing is at last taking off, and circuses are on the way out. Betting shops, which gamble on the lives of innocent animals (after their racing days are over most horses and greyhounds are killed) are now being regularly hit - as are race courses.

During 1983, there was a wave of ALF attacks in Hounslow. I was arrested and threatened by a butcher with having my "head kicked in" if the attacks against his shop continued. The attacks did continue - his shop did not.

This is now happening all over the country, and abroad - and it is increasing...

Ironically, I was about to 'retire' from the animal rights movement. Because of my imprisonment, and all the support I have had, I realise that to retire would not only be giving in to the state, but more importantly, it would be betraying the animals who depend upon us for their freedom. I will continue to fight for the animals all my life. We are winning, the last ten years prove that. I look forward to reflecting back on the next ten years with the knowledge that we will be nearer our goal of animal liberation.

Make My Day

Make My Day is a new self-defence training network for hunt saboteurs and other animal rights activists. For too long, hunt heavies, circus thugs and other animal-abusing morons have been violently attacking animal rights campaigners and sometimes causing serious injuries. Make My Day has been set up, with the support of Arkangel, in an attempt to put a stop to all this.

We know that there are already a fair number of people in the AR movement who have acquired self-defence skills through training in the martial arts, etc. We also know that there are many people in the movement who would like to learn to defend themselves properly. The idea behind Make My Day is to put the two together by encouraging AR people who are already trained in self-defence to train hunt sab and AR groups in their local areas.

Therefore we would like you to write to us (enclosing your address and phone number) if;

1. You, or someone you know, has self-defence skills and would be willing to train others in the movement.
2. You, or your group, would like to be trained in self-defence.

The setting-up of the Make My Day network is going to cost a considerable amount of money - so donations will be gratefully received - especially from non-active AR sympathizers. Your contribution will help those who put themselves at risk to defend themselves - and the animals. Cheques and PO's should be made payable to Make My Day.

THE ARKANGEL INTERVIEW with "Friends of the Animals"

Since Friends of the Animals was set up just three years ago, they have homed over 800 rescued dogs, and financed neutering and spaying for about 12,000 animals. In the following interview with Arkangel, two of their organisers explained how the charity was set up and how it has been able to obtain some excellent results.

Arkangel: What actually gave you the idea of starting FOTA in the first place?

FOTA: We did animal rescue work with other groups for many years and were never completely happy, thinking that a lot of effort went into arguing at committee meetings and not enough into the actual animal rescue work. We were also unhappy that many groups we had been with had a lot of money in the bank and were never willing to spend it, so we decided to set up an organisation that would do exactly the opposite.

Arkangel: And what ideas did you start with?

FOTA: It was going to be basically rescuing stray animals and finding homes for them. Also spaying and neutering. In fact we think that spaying and neutering is probably the most important aspect of everything. We help all animals although we specialise in dogs. That is because there are very few dog rescue groups. We also spay cats on quite a large scale and will help any other animal too, for example, we provide all the food for two hedgehog rescue centres and we bought equipment for two badger groups and built a stable for ex-pit ponies and donkeys.

Arkangel: What were the first things you did when you started out?

FOTA: Six of us who had similar ideas all got together. We bought some collecting tins and fluorescent over-jackets with the name of the group on them. We found that such over-jackets are really essential for fundraising. They cost about a fiver each and really stand out so that people are able to decide in advance if they want to make a donation. We felt it was very important to get the basic equipment to raise the funds that would be necessary to keep going.

Arkangel: You work by having a system of foster homes.

FOTA: Yes we do, we have always got between 30 and 40 foster homes. These are people who look after the animals in their own homes. It does not cost them anything. We provide all the food and pay for any veterinary bills, plus any other genuine expenses.

Arkangel: And how did you get that network of foster homes together?

FOTA: We never actually advertise for foster homes. Often people come up to us in the street while we're collecting, and after talking to them they say they would like to help in some way. A good many foster homes have come through this process, also as Friends of the Animals has become more and more well known in the area, we get contacted on other occasions by people offering to foster animals. We do, of course, check out all foster homes to make sure they will be suitable. Generally, we know the people involved anyway, or they are recommended by somebody who is trustworthy.

Arkangel: So, if a local animal protection group was thinking of setting up something like FOTA, how would you advise them to go about getting foster homes?

FOTA: Apart from the personal contact method, the group could get local newspapers to do articles on them. It is often possible to find a sympathetic journalist.

Arkangel: Can you say a bit more about the vetting system you use?

FOTA: If we are homing a dog, either permanently, or just fostering, we try very hard to match the right dog to the right home. It has to be placed in a home adequate to its needs. We produce vetting notes, and new vetters go out with an established vetter the first time. The decision on whether a home is acceptable lies with the vetter who has actually been into the home and interviewed the people. If someone has an animal from us, it is on a fortnight's trial basis. If the dog, or they, are not happy - in that order - the dog will then come back to us. On the other hand, if they are happy, they sign an adoption form and hopefully make a donation. We do not actually sell animals, which we believe is quite an important point. It is fine to ask people for a donation, or that they reimburse us for inoculations and neutering or spaying, but we would never get into the syndrome of selling dogs.

Arkangel: And do many of the vetters come from people who approach you on the streets?

FOTA: Yes, we get lots of help from people through that process. We have people from many different walks of life who are willing to help us in many different ways. For example, we have a deputy headteacher and even a magistrate. As well as the vetters, there are people who do street collections, and others who act as drivers when animals need to be delivered or collected. We get a huge amount of work done completely free, for example, we knew of a sanctuary that had no electricity in three kennel blocks, so we got an electrician from our mailing list to do all the heavy-duty electrical work there. He spent three days putting on the electricity without making any charge for it. We also have carpenters who do work for us free, as well as several other tradespeople, companies and firms.

Arkangel: How do you actually go around getting the support of firms and companies?

FOTA: Often it is from people getting our newsletter and passing it on. We try to work the newsletter in a positive way so that people will want to help us. A couple of times, we have actually approached local companies who have sent us stuff to use as raffle prizes, etc., and earlier on in our existence, we did a big mail shot to about 500 companies out of the Thompson Directory, with just a letter and a newspaper article which had been written about the group. That did bring in some response, but most of the donations from companies have come from people we have met in the street who have had a position in a particular company. One thing is certain, there is no point in approaching the big companies, such as ICI, Lloyds Bank, etc. They tend to only give to big charitable organisations. It is companies in the local community who are much more likely to help. One company local to us has a charity committee and we receive regular donations of £100 because someone on their committee obviously knows us, but we don't know who that person is.

Arkangel: Tell us something about your newsletter.

FOTA: We have 4,000 copies of the newsletter printed each time. These go to the 1,200 people on our mailing list, and the surplus newsletters are handed out to people in the street who show an interest. We just could not afford to hand them out willy-nilly. The newsletter comes out every quarter and there are occasions when we do an interim newsheet. The newsletters are worth their weight in gold because they really do get people's interest. With the newsletter we try to keep people updated as to how many neuters and spays we have done and how many animals we have rehomed. Then there are the heart-breaking stories which are always totally accurate. We also let people know how they can help us in various ways.

Arkangel: You said you provide all of the dog food for the foster homes. Surely that gets very expensive?

FOTA: No, it does not cost us anything at all, because we collections of dog and cat food in supermarkets. Quite a few large local supermarkets are involved in this - especially Safeway. We have a supporter who is an art teacher and she does beautiful cartoon-type posters for putting up in the supermarkets requesting items of food, along the lines of, "Would people please donate one of the 750 items of pet food which we use each week?" Then there is our name and address on the bottom of each poster and our registered charity number which we think is very important. The posters are two feet by three feet, and they are mounted on board which we get free from a woodyard and they are placed at the entrance of the supermarket so customers see them on their way in. We provide bins for people to put the petfood donations in. Initially we approached the supermarkets in order to get the scheme running. A good technique of getting it started is to chat to the supermarket manager and point out how it will benefit sales because, of course, it means that the supermarket will sell a lot of extra petfood. We also have several petshops that take part in this scheme. It is important to replace the posters from time to time, so that they don't become tatty, as that is bad for the supermarket's image, and they may stop the scheme. As well as that we have five people who collect the food from the supermarkets so that it is taken away regularly and does not spill out of the bins.

Arkangel: What about dogs that are difficult to home?

FOTA: We find that very few people want large, male dogs, but we believe that there is always a home there, it is just a question of finding it. A dog can spend anywhere between two days and four months in one of our foster homes before we find a permanent home.

Arkangel: How does your neutering and spaying scheme work?

FOTA: Approximately 80% of our work goes through one vet, although together we use about eight different vets. Our vets bills to date have topped £67,000 in less than three years. If a group decides to set up a society similar to ours we would say that it is a priority for them to approach all of the local vets and ask for the best price for a large number of neuters, spays, and inoculations. From the vets we use, we get a fixed price regardless of the size of the animal - which is a benefit, because it can be difficult to define what is small, medium or large.

Arkangel: And how soon do you get an animal neutered or spayed?

FOTA: As soon as possible after it is rescued - provided it is fit, and it is old enough. If it has to be left until later we sometimes help with the cost, depending on the financial circumstances of the people who then have the animal, and if somebody has not actually got the money to pay for things like that, we encourage them to come out collecting with us to raise the money. The slogan of the charity is, "Working with people to help animals," which we believe is very important. We never allow ourselves to be taken for a ride. Just because you are a charity, that does not mean that you do everybody's work for them. So a lot of people who have animals from us actually end up helping us in various ways.

Arkangel: So what is your relationship with other animal welfare groups; for example, the RSPCA? Do you have any dealings with these groups?

FOTA: Not the RSPCA, no. They have got literally millions of pounds of surplus money which is not being spent and we feel it should be spent on spaying and neutering instead of the mass destruction of animals which goes on at the moment. We do support the PDASA though and will work with any group which is fair and helps people and animals.

Arkangel: What about contacts with the local authority?

FOTA: We have had a council official here and got a verbal agreement from him to have a subsidised spaying scheme whereby the council, the owner, and we would pay a third of the cost each for spaying an animal. We actually approached the local authority about this ourselves, and we wonder why the RSPCA don't do something similar all over the country.

Arkangel: Tell us about some of the other things you do.

FOTA: So far, we have engraved well over 4,000 identity discs for animals. We supply these free and they have the animal's name and owner's telephone number on one side and the address on the reverse. It costs us 55p including postage but we believe it is worth it in terms of the suffering it can prevent by cutting down on the number of lost animals. We also give lots of talks in schools to children of all ages, and at the end of the talk we always offer to do free disks for the children's animals. These talks are on the theme of: Why it is important to be kind to animals. We are usually approached by the schools after they have got hold of a copy of our newsletter.

Arkangel: How many helpers do you have altogether?

FOTA: We have got approximately 1,200 people on the mailing list. It is a free membership but an active one. In other words, if a person does not do anything at all to help during the year, they are deleted from the membership list. In our opinion, that is far better than having someone pay a fiver or a tenner a year and then doing nothing. There are lots of things that people can do for us - foster an animal, vet a home, drive, collect, do a raffle, knit blankets, sponsor someone in a fundraising event, etc.

Arkangel: To what extent do you deal with cats?

FOTA: We don't actually rehome cats. If we did that we would be spreading ourselves too thinly. But we support several cat rescue groups, both morally and financially. When a group takes cats from us, we will finance it totally. We don't dump on other groups.

Arkangel: Can you explain how you get street collections organised?

FOTA: With street collections, you have to apply to the local authority for the particular area. It is important to write to the correct person in the correct department. Some will ask you what the money goes towards, and they want a copy of the accounts. Things usually go more smoothly if you are collecting in your local area. Refusal of a permit is only allowed on certain grounds and has to be put in writing. If you are refused, you can appeal. Most councils also require you to send in a return, indicating how much you have collected in each tin. We do recommend that every group should try to get a good accountant. The accountant has to sign the returns prior to sending to the local authority. Most accountants will charge a lot of money for this, but it is usually possible to find one who is sympathetic and will do it free of charge. When collecting on private property, such as shopping centres, supermarkets, etc. you do not need a council permit. All you need is a letter from the owner or manager giving their permission.

Arkangel: What about other methods of raising money?

FOTA: We do everything, including raffles. If the value of the tickets issued is less than £10,000 you only have to register with the local authority, which will cost you £25 a year. If it is more than £10,000 you have to register with the gaming board, which will cost you £420. So we always stick below £10,000. We also have many fundraising activities planned for 1993 including a boat-trip and a competition where people have to guess the name of a doll and the birthday of a teddy. Several schools do fundraising for us such as making and selling cakes. Schools have also done a trampoline bounce, sponsored silence, and a non-uniform day. We had a very successful dog show which was certainly not based on pedigree. A building society put on a very professional "Trivial Pursuit" evening for us which raised £275 for veterinary treatment.

Arkangel: Is your work based mainly in the local area?

FOTA: Yes, most of the work is in the West Midlands but we will help wherever necessary. For instance, we have got veterinary treatment going on in Barnsley, and in Rotherham. School children in Rotherham recently knitted a huge pile of 60 blankets for our animals after reading one of our newsletters.

Arkangel: How long have you been a registered charity, and why did you decide to become one?

FOTA: We applied to become a registered charity immediately we began, and we achieved registered charity status just six months and three days later. There are a lot of misconceptions about becoming a registered charity. It is not true that you have to have been going for several years. It is not true that you have to have accounts. It is also not true that you have to pay money to become registered. All you need is a constitution which clearly sets out your objectives. If any group is thinking of setting up a similar organisation to ourselves, we will happily send them a copy of our constitution. In fact, if any interested group wants any more information or help from us, they should get in touch and we will be very pleased to do what we can.

If any local animal protection group is interested in doing similar rescue work and would like more advice or information, Friends of the Animals can be contacted at:

CAMPAIGNERS UPDATE

McLibel Support Campaign

In order to defend free speech and the right to criticise multinationals, two supporters of London Greenpeace are taking on the McDonalds Corporation in the High Court this summer. London Greenpeace has for eight years been a catalyst for a world-wide campaign to expose McDonalds' exploitation of workers, damage to the environment, abuse of animals, peddling of unhealthy food and use of sophisticated, child-orientated advertising techniques. The campaign includes widespread protests annually on 16th October (UN 'World Food Day') - Anti-McDonalds Day. Following a barrage of libel writs issued over the last five years by the fast food giant against a wide range of critics (including in September 1990 the two unemployed defendants), Helen Steel and Dave Morris have resolved to challenge complex, expensive and oppressive libel laws, stacked in favour of the rich and powerful.

In December 1992, they launched a case in the European Court of Human Rights against the British Government for refusing them legal aid to defend libel proceedings and are presently preparing for a protracted and highly public High Court trial this summer. The McLibel Support Campaign has been set up to publicise the truth about the case, to raise the large amount of funds urgently needed, to help with international research and to step up protests against McDonalds. The case has serious implications for all campaigners as it is clear that the extension of the use of libel laws as a form of censorship must be resisted in the courts, in print and on the streets.

Storyland 2 - Computer Game Review?

Storyland 2 is an educational computer game for young children which runs on the Amiga (1.3 only).

The aim is to save Storyland from a wicked witch who has covered the place in graffiti, taken the colours out of the animals, and broken up childrens' heros into jigsaw pieces. My children aged 6 and 8 - and their friends - loved it.

SAVES ANIMALS LIVES

"ALF Saves Animals Lives" stickers are only 50p for 100. Available from the Campaign Against Leather & Fur (CALF)
BM 8889,
London WC1N 3XX.

The program was written by an animal rights campaigner, and begins with this message: "STORYLAND2 is Public Domain and may be distributed freely. It was written on behalf of laboratory animals who need your help. Any donations we receive for this game will be sent to; The National Anti-Vivisection Society, 261 Goldhawk Road, London, W12 9PE. Any donations towards our local animal rights group may be sent to: David Alexander, Epping Forest Animal Welfare, PO Box 30, Loughton, Essex IG10 3BR. Cheques should be made payable to; Epping Forest Animal Welfare. Correspondence concerning Storyland2 may be sent to the same address. Further information about animal rights may also be asked for at this address."

During the game, the child is asked if he or she cares about animals (they won't get far if they say "No"!) and at the end of the adventure information is displayed about how they can get involved in helping animals.

Although the game is free, I reckon it's easily worth a fiver. So if you want a copy, write to David, or Arkangel, and enclose a disk and an SAE at the very least - but as I said, it's a great game and is worth a lot more!

THE ROAD TO VICTORY

Brightness, a white Beluga whale which became a television celebrity last year after escaping from Soviet military service in the Black Sea, has disappeared again. The Arctic whale called Aydin first escaped in 1991 and was recaptured last April and returned to a Dolphinarium in the Black Sea village of Lapsi. After his second escape he was seen in the Dnieper delta (Daily Telegraph, Jan 5th 1993).

Officials at Sheffield public health labs have written to the Veterinary Record to say that their research shows that recent outbreaks of human illness due to the Verotoxigenic E. coli o.157 bacterium may be related to meat and raw milk (Agscene, Winter 1992).

The U.S. National Cancer Institute is funding a study to see how it is that soya beans appear to protect humans from cancers of the breast, colon & liver. The anti-oxidant isoflavones in the beans are thought to be responsible; looks like another plus for soya milk, tofu etc. (Agscene Winter 1992).

Professor Nick Day of the European Prospective Investigation into cancer reckons "vegetarians suffer 40% fewer cancers than the average population" (Agscene, Winter 1992).

TERMINANGEL TOO

ARKANGEL NO. 10 £1.80

JUDGMENT DAY

Arkangel

We are very pleased to say that the last issue of Arkangel was amongst the most popular ever and we hope this one will be just as well received. In order to provide widespread coverage of what is happening in the animal rights movement however, we do need to receive that information in the first place, so if you are involved in a local animal rights group or other animal protection society please do keep us informed of your group's activities on a regular basis.

In the last issue we mentioned the various Arkangel projects that have been set up and we would now like to report on the progress that has been made with these.

Arkangel Information.

A database is now well on the way to being set up to provide local animal rights groups with as much info as possible about animal abuse and animal abusers in their own areas. Already we have a great deal of information on file about the vivisection industry, fur trade, meat industry, factory farming, bloodsports, etc., and we have arranged with the Animal Rights Coalition that, starting in the autumn, this will be mailed out on a regular basis with their newsletter to as many local animal rights groups as possible.

Arkangel International

Work has begun in helping to set up networks of local A/R groups in other countries. Countries covered so far include Holland, Belgium, Spain, Denmark, Japan, Italy, Malta, India, Uruguay, Israel and Greece. Sometimes this work just involves finding people abroad who are interested in setting up a local A/R group network there and giving them ideas and encouragement. At other times more is needed, such as the supply of literature and funds to get the network off the ground.

A recent example of this concerns Greece. An Arkangel representative, who was on one of the Greek islands helping to protect sea turtles, made contact with several Greek A/R campaigners interested in really getting things moving over there. This came as a very pleasant surprise, as we have frequently been told it would be virtually impossible to find Greek people willing to campaign against the widespread animal abuse in their own country. Hunting of wildlife is endemic in Greece and the fur trade is still very big. There is a huge stray cat and dog problem and the danger of factory farming 'food' animals springing up unless there is opposition. On the other hand, animal rights campaigners have tried to sabotage hunting (resulting in some of them being shot and injured by hunters) and there is considerable opposition to vivisection. The Green/vegetarian movement is still very small but growing. So despite the unhappy situation of animals in Greece there is hope of a strong A/R movement being created there. We have already supplied literature to Green A/R campaigners but they also need considerable financial support to really build a movement over there. Any donations to help them, or towards our efforts in other countries, should be sent to Arkangel International, BCM 9240, London WC1N 3XX. (Cheques/PO's should be made payable to 'Arkangel International')

Arkangel Fundraising.

Several people have come forward offering to fundraise for Arkangel in their local areas. We still need more fundraisers however in order to raise enough to be able to produce the magazine and run the various projects properly - so do write to us if you can do some fundraising.

A little more about Arkangel!

"Arkangel - a nasty little magazine which is basically the ALF Supporters Group Journal under a new and clever disguise..." (Mark Gold, Director of Animal Aid writing in Outrage, September 1990)

Obviously there have been, and there probably still are,

for Animal Liberation

certain misconceptions about Arkangel! From the above you will know that Arkangel is not just a magazine - neither is it an organisation in the normal sense - perhaps it would best be described as an Idea? Anyway, here's a few facts and you can decide for yourself...

Arkangel is NOT associated with or funded by any other A/R organisation. We publish letters and articles from anyone who has something of interest to say to the A/R movement whether they be A/R prisoners, the ALF Press Officer, The Vegan Society, or anyone else (so get writing Mark!). We try to operate a no-censorship policy, but sometimes we have to reject articles which could get us done for incitement or libel. Arkangel has no cash sitting unused in banks - donations and sales of one issue of the magazine fund the next. It certainly has no paid workers! We don't accept paid advertising, but we'll gladly promote anything which furthers the cause of animal rights. We don't say who we are - none of us are in it for personal glory - we're in it for the animals, and after all, no-one really needs to know.

Lots of negatives there, so now some positives... The Arkangel Idea was set out in Issue One back in 1989; a positive approach - no photographs of suffering animals or accounts of the evils done to them - there are plenty of other excellent publications which provide information about the horrors of animal abuse. We attempt to report on what is actually being done to combat that abuse and on the successes that are being achieved. We hope that the pictures we use in some way celebrate the variety and beauty of animal life.

Secondly, Arkangel provides an open forum for debate. We find it incredible that so many other A/R magazines don't even have a letters page. Why should our ideas and views be any more valid or important than yours? The strategies for achieving animal liberation must be debated and promoted - that's why the Comment section of the magazine is so important. It's where you have a chance to influence our movement.

Thirdly, Arkangel is about unity. Rational debate is healthy, but all too often our movement seems to be tearing itself apart. While we may approve or disapprove of the tactics others use, our common objective remains unaltered - to bring about an end to the abuse of animals wherever it exists. We will never condemn or vilify those who genuinely share our aim.

And finally, as we said at the outset, Arkangel is not just a magazine...

Arkangel has a number of videos available for hire. The hire charge is £10 per tape which includes a £5 returnable deposit.

Their Future in Your Hands; a film about the treatment of animals. This is an excellent film produced by Animal Aid and is suitable to be shown in schools. 13 minutes.

Fur-The Bloody Choice. Produced by Respect For Animals. 10 minutes.

Fur Factories. Produced by Lynx. 16 minutes.

Bloody Ivory. Produced by Elefriends. 90 minutes.

Angling-The Neglected Bloodsport. Produced by the Campaign for the Abolition of Angling.

The World Campaign for Bears. Produced by the World Society for the Protection of Animals; Liberty Campaign. 5 minutes.

DBAE Conference on Vivisection. Produced by the Doctors in Britain Against Animal Experiments.

Animal Liberation - The Movie & Animal Liberation - The Sequel. Both films contain footage of animal liberation raids and economic sabotage. Not to be missed.

As we only have one copy of each video mentioned, you may prefer to order these films direct from the organisations listed. If you decide to hire one or more titles we would appreciate it if you could return them as soon as possible.

Local Group Reports

ANIMAL AMNESTY CAMPAIGN CENTRE & SHOP

62 Thornton Street, Newcastle NE1 4AW
091 232 5950

A successful postcard campaign was launched to ban Robert Bros circus from performing in Stockton, Cleveland. This culminated in a total ban on the circus being allowed to set up here. 51 out of 54 councillors voted in favour of banning the circus. The group are extending their campaign to get circuses banned in the Gateshead and Tynemouth areas.

ANIMAL RIGHTS CUMBRIA PO BOX 47, Workington CA14 1SF

Each day, shows of Robert Bros circus were picketed in Workington. They received good local media attention, also with encouraging feedback from the council leader who stated that, should concerns about the circus be proved, the situation would be reviewed next year.

ANIMAL RIGHTS CAMBRIDGE 74, Sturton Street, Cambridge CB1 2QA 0223 311828

Participated in the rally/march against Laundry Farm. Brighton was well attended too when the Annual Conference on Laboratory Technicians took place. Amongst the audience were vivisectioners and animal technicians! Demos have also been held outside circuses.

A 48 hour sponsored fast was organised with all proceeds being sent to the Dover Docks Live Exports Campaign. Held live exports protest on August 7th to persuade travellers to boycott Stena Sealink Ferries which ship live animals to Europe every day. On 30th August, the group held a Teddy Bears' picnic in support of 'Liberty'.

ANIMAL LIBERATION (HASTINGS) PO Box 71, Hastings, E.Sussex Sharon 719668 - Kevin 436579

An informative group bulletin is produced and donations are most welcome. Media matters are liaised through their own Press Officer. Demos taken part in include a torchlight vigil at Dover Docks and at McDonalds in Hastings. Regular stalls are set up in the town centre.

ANIMAL RESCUE PO Box 223, Liverpool L69 7LF

An informative newsletter has been produced called 'Animals Campaigner' at the very fair price of 25p. A national campaign has been launched by Animal Rescue against intensive factory farming of lambs. This included a petition. In February, a public meeting was held which included free literature and stalls selling cruelty-free merchandise.

BARNSELY ANIMAL RIGHTS GROUP (No address supplied)

Permission for the group has been given by the council to hold street collections and information stalls in the Barnsley shopping precinct.

BELFAST ANIMAL RIGHTS c/o BELFAST YOUTH & COMMUNITY, PO Box 148, Belfast BT1 2LZ 0232 244640

Groups in Belfast have united to form an alliance. A hunt sab group operates from the same address but remains a separate group in itself. Write or phone if you would like to get involved!

BROMLEY ANIMAL DEFENCE GROUP 16, Parkside Ave, Bickley, Kent BR1 2EJ 081 464 6035

A march and rally was organised outside the Wellcome Research labs in Kent. Guest speakers were invited and vegan food was available. About 200 people marched through the centre of Bromley to protest at the cruel experiments being carried out at the Wellcome lab.

CAT CONCERN (AND OTHER ANIMALS) PO Box 234, Hounslow, TW3 2QG

A recently formed active rescue and rehoming group. 12 cat foster homes are available, plus foster homes for dogs, rabbits, etc. Ferrals are trapped for neutering and spaying, kittens are always found homes for. Fundraising takes place every week, mainly through car boot sales. Funds are always needed and donations are welcome. Display boards will be advertised in local supermarkets - extensive advertising is about to take place.

COVENTRY ANIMAL ALLIANCE
PO Box 241, Bishop Street, Coventry CV1 1AA

Stalls are set up 2-3 times a week. A Campaign against Warwick and Coventry Universities is to be launched because of their part in vivisection. Local Boots have been picketed and a major campaign against an animal abusing pet shop is underway.

DEVON VEGANS
c/o The Old Forge, Throwleigh, Devon EX20 2HS

Literature on the wool and leather trade has been produced. Volunteers are needed to help set up an informal network to promote the issues of cruel wool production.

EAST BERKSHIRE ANIMAL AID
PO Box 1507, Maidenhead, SL6 3YQ

Small but active - they have been given good local media coverage. They secured a circus ban in the Windsor, Maidenhead and Reading areas. A fancy-dress pub crawl was among one of their fundraising activities. More recently the group has taken on the rehoming of stray and unwanted pets.

GOSPORT AND FAREHAM ANIMAL RIGHTS
26 Brune Lane, Rowner, Gosport,
Hants PO13 9RA
Gosport 588516

G&FAR have been actively involving themselves in demos outside the Wickham Research Laboratories and have received good media and radio response. Protests outside the Garetmar Kennels (a puppy supermarket), in Misingford, near Wickham are held regularly. Webb and Webb, a local chicken slaughter-house had a demo held outside its premises.

GRIMSBY HUNT SABOTEURS
c/o Box 132, Grimsby DN32 4AY

Volunteers are needed to run the local group - this will help to raise much needed funds to keep the sabs out in the field. Write to the PO Box for details.

HULL ANIMAL RIGHTS GROUP
PO Box 43, Hull HU1 1AA

Fauna, a 40 page A/R magazine, is produced quarterly. HARG also produce/print their own leaflets. Regular meetings and stalls are held. Rooftop protests have taken place at the local Boots. Public meetings have been well attended where A/R videos are shown.

HOUNSLOW ANIMAL DEFENCE (HAD)
PO Box 234, Hounslow, Middlesex TW3 2QG

Regular stalls and committee meetings are held every month, planning agendas for that month. They are currently collecting used stamps to help rescued horses and donkeys. Fundraising includes car boot sales and collections. Monthly informal meetings take place in pubs to keep people involved in the fight against animal abuse.

H.A.R.C.

PO Box 66, Broxbourne, Herts EN10 6LU
0426 911785

The group has been launched to campaign against hunting. The National Anti-Hunt Petition, the biggest ever animal welfare petition has been circulated nationally. Any monies raised will go directly towards funding hunt sabotage and undercover investigations. The campaign will culminate in a massive march/rally in London in 1994.

HIGHWORTH ANIMAL CONCERN

18, Cricklade Road, Highworth, Swindon SN6 7BL

A small group which raises funds for local and national animal charities. Two annual fairs are held during the summer and at Christmas to promote A/R issues.

HUNTINGDON ANIMAL CONCERN

92, Thrapston Rd, Brampton, Huntingdon, Cambridge PE18 8TD

Very much the focal point against Huntingdon Research Laboratories. Marches and demos against the centre have taken place.

HERNE BAY & WHITSTABLE ANIMAL RIGHTS GROUP

67, Poplar Drive, Greenhill, Herne Bay, Kent
0227 364262

In recent weeks, members of this group have demonstrated outside a visiting circus; protested against the Queen's and Prince Phillip's support and involvement in blood sports during their visit to Thanet; joined in the SEARC demos in Dover; and held regular leafletting and fundraising events. New members are most welcome.

LINCOLNSHIRE ANIMAL RIGHTS PO Box 132, Grimsby, DN34 4AY

An excellent bulletin called 'Torch' is produced covering all topics on animal rights. Efforts are being made to encourage the setting up of new local groups across the region. A much needed local badger protection network is being formed and the group has produced their own leaflets.

LINCOLNSHIRE A/R CAMPAIGN

The Rosary, Burgh-on-Bain, Lincoln LN3 6JY

Pickets have taken place against Grimsby Boots and the local McDonalds. A campaign against circuses being allowed to perform in the Cleethorpes area is underway.

LONDON BOOTS ACTION GROUP (LBAG)

c/o Alara, 58, Seven Sisters Rd, London N7 6AA

Newsletters are produced with up-to-date information on Boots' activities. Monthly meetings take place in Endsleigh Street, Euston. Camden Boots is picketed every Sunday. Stickers and posters and other merchandise is available. The Boots AGM and Boots Aerobathon which raised money for animal tested research was picketed against. A National Day of Action against Boots took place in the summer and was spearheaded by LBAG.

LONDON VEGANS

7, Deansbrook Rd, Edgware, Middlesex HA8 9BE

Every quarter, an informative and useful newsletter is circulated with lists of A/R events taking place up and down the country. The group run catering/information/social stands within the London area. Meetings are held on the last Wednesday of every month at the Millman Street Community Rooms, Millman Street, WC1.

LONDON ANTI-FUR CAMPAIGN

c/o L.A.R. PO Box 216, E7 9RB

Regular pickets are held against the remaining fur shops in London's West End. Groups and individuals are most welcome to attend. If anyone is interested, please write to the above address.

LEICESTER ANIMAL CONCERN

c/o 70 High Street, Leicester LE1 5YP
0533 412 346

On June 12th, LAC organised a march and rally against the opening of a new poison-testing research centre in Leicester. The group will continue their campaign to alert the public of just what goes on inside this building.

MANCHESTER ANIMAL PROTECTION GROUP (MAPG)

PO Box 155, Manchester M60 1FT

A fur shop which had the audacity to open locally was shut down after just three weeks after the group held demonstrations outside. Pickets took place against local circuses and an anti-meat demo was organised which attracted a good turnout. A van has been purchased recently thanks to a very successful street collection.

MID-SUSSEX ANIMAL REFORM GROUP (MSARG)

37, North Court, Hassocks, West Sussex BN6 8JS

On Saturday, 23rd October MSARG and Brighton Animal Rights Campaign (BARC) will be holding a national march and rally in Brighton against Shamrock Farm (GB). Speakers so far include Robin Webb and Terry Hill. For further details, phone David Hammond (0273 846941). Assemble at Preston Park at 12 noon. March starts at 2pm. MSARG & BARC are collecting for an Anti-Shamrock fund and donations should be sent to Box 307, Ship Street, Brighton, East Sussex.

MIDLANDS ANIMAL RIGHTS COALITION (MARC)

c/o Dudley Animal Concern, PO Box 43, Dudley DY3 3DG

MARC now produce their own newsletter every quarter. Various guest speakers have attended their meetings - including a speaker from the Campaign for the Abolition of Angling and Niel Hansen, organiser of the National Anti-Hunt Petition. MARC is also embarking on a new national anti-circus campaign. Demos have taken place outside the local McDonalds, Boots and when the circus came to town! A number of public meetings took place over a span of three months.

OXFORD ANIMAL RIGHTS

Box M, 111 Magdalen Rd, Oxford OX4 1RQ

The group have started doing stalls in neighbouring towns where there are no local groups. The ultimate aim is to get groups going in these areas and to build the Animal Rights Coalition. They are particularly interested in hearing from people in the Aylesbury, Newbury, Banbury, Swindon and High Wycombe areas. The group campaigns against Boots by picketing and rooftop demos, and they attended the Boots AGM in London. There is also an ongoing campaign against the University which has involved mass leafleting campaigns, demos at the homes of vivisectionists, and disruption of lectures and seminars. A number of investigations are being planned regarding local abusers, eg. factory farms, with the intention of building up information on individual farms and to produce local leaflets targeting those farms. The group have also participated in a number of angling sabs and hope to get these going on a regular basis.

NORTHAMPTON ANIMAL CONCERN

Since making a big anti-Boots banner the group has been doing rooftop demos all around the Midlands with the support of the local groups in the towns visited. The Midlands Boots Action Group hopes to do a different store each Saturday. Hunt sabbing with the Thames Valley sabs will continue, but next season more attention will be paid to Cambridge FH since the death of Tom Worby, where Northampton sabs were present. N.A.C. have attended many national demos and hosted the Animal Rights Coalition meetings twice due to their central position (geographically). New campaigns at the moment include stopping a local council destroying a pigeon population, and protesting at all levels about the planning application to build a 1.6 million battery chicken farm in the county. The group is covering a broad spectrum and encourages co-operation amongst different groups and towns. As a group they also attend self-defence classes and hope to spread this further afield in the future.

PAUL CIANI ANIMAL TRUST

*78 Charles Street, Newark, Notts NG24 1RL
0636 640 702*

This is a newly formed group and its aim is to open an animal sanctuary which will care for all types of animals and look after them for the rest of their natural lives. Donations are needed in order to set the sanctuary up and to purchase land.

PORTSMOUTH AREA VEGANS

*174 Middle Park Way, Leigh Park, Havant, Hants PO9 4DE
0705 454610*

A quarterly newsletter is produced called 'Paving the Way'. Local fairs, fetes and meetings are attended - the sole aim being to promote the issues of veganism.

PORTSMOUTH ANIMAL RIGHTS GROUP

The group have recently held demos at Portsmouth Ferry Port against the transport of live animals. An anti-Boots day has also been arranged.

STEVENAGE ANIMAL RIGHTS

Box 6, Lyon House, St. George's Way, Stevenage, Herts SG1 1XY

S.A.R. produce a very informative newsletter. They have their own logo on T-shirts and badges which are available through the newsletter. A sponsored cycle ride was organised along with regular demos held outside the Glaxo lab. Guest speakers included Robin Webb (ALF Press Officer) and Terry Hill, who infiltrated Shamrock Farm, when the group organised the national demo held at Glaxo earlier this year.

SOUTH LONDON ANIMAL AID

PO Box 594, London SW9 8QG

The Institute of Psychiatry in Camberwell is at the forefront of the groups' campaigns. Primates are systematically subjected to horrifying experiments at the lab. A public meeting will take place on the 18th October at the Crawford Tennents Association Hall, Denmark Road, London SE5. Doors open at 7.00 pm for a 7.30 pm start. Please attend! S.L.A.A. also have a very busy diary of events and amongst other things run the Green Marmoset Catering Company which provides the best veggieburgers in town! An anti-fur sub-group also operates within S.L.A.A. with regular stalls being held to highlight the fur industry.

SURREY ANIMAL RIGHTS

PO Box 787, South Croydon CR2 6TG

Principally involved in organising demos within the Surrey area. Stalls and leafletting sessions take place regularly and they are currently in the process of compiling their own newsletter and leaflets.

STUDENTS FOR ANIMAL RIGHTS

PO Box 217, Guildford, Surrey

Students attending the University of Surrey are battling with the University authorities to halt the use of animals in research on the premises. The group has been forced to form a group outside of the Student Union for fear of disciplinary action being taken against them. Financial help is needed urgently for their campaign.

TOTNES ANIMAL RIGHTS

PO Box 76, Torquay, Devon

T.A.R. is combined with a hunt sab group. Campaigns include driving the Dart Vale Fox Hunt Meet from its grounds. The group is implementing ways of abolishing hunting from all council owned land. Any council that does not have a policy against hunting will be approached to try to make them rethink their attitude.

WALSALL ANIMAL RIGHTS

(Affiliated to MARC)

c/o Dudley Animal Concern,
PO Box 43, Dudley DY3 3DG

Successful demos have been held outside local McDonalds and Boots. Every circus which dared perform within the Midlands area had a demo held against it. A local Tesco supermarket received attention when a demo outside highlighted their part in selling Faroese fish - this event received excellent TV coverage.

WITNEY ANIMAL RIGHTS

PO Box 32, Chipping Norton, Oxon OX7 6JE

Hospitals using animals in the Oxford area are subject to debates and protests. Oxfordshire Health Authority seem deaf when confronted on this issue. A local Bed & Breakfast - Hill Grove Farm owned by a 'Farmer Brown' is still subject to protest visits. Alongside the peace and tranquillity of his countryside retreat, Farmer Brown breeds (in battery like sheds) and sells cats for vivisection. He boasts he can supply up to 1,000 at a time. The demos will continue.

Please let us know what your group has been doing, and, equally importantly, what it is planning to do. Send your reports and details of forthcoming activities/demos or whatever to Arkangel Magazine, BCM 9240, London WC1N 3XX. If you have a logo - send us a copy too - it helps brighten up the Local Groups section!

Back Issues of Arkangel Magazine

Issues 2, 3, 4, 5, 7 & 8 are still available free of charge - BUT please send 50p in stamps per copy to cover the cost of postage!

Sanctuaries

Norfolk Wildlife Sanctuaries
The Greenhouse, 48 Bethel Street, Norwich, Norfolk NR2 1NR

Norfolk Wildlife Sanctuaries are currently raising funds to purchase unwanted land in the county which will be developed as havens for local wildlife and subject to minimal management. The areas of land will be open to the public for walks and picnics, while hunting, shooting and fishing will be banned. All donations go DIRECTLY to land purchase.

Hopefield Animal Sanctuary
Sawyers Hall Farm, Sawyers Hall Lane, Brentwood, Essex CM15 9BY
Tel: 0277 201110 Office: 081 590 6273

The sanctuary provides homes for a wide variety and number of animals. They will be holding an Open Day on Sunday September 26th and a leisurely countryside walk on Sunday October 10th. There is a large quantity of free horse manure available from the sanctuary, but please bring your own bags! The workers would also be most grateful for any DIY help at the sanctuary. If you can help please contact the sanctuary on the above 'phone number. The sanctuary has recently been given the use of a shop by the local council and would welcome bric-a-brac, books, records, furniture and good-as-new clothing to sell. Finally, the sanctuary is setting up a 200 Club which will hold prize draws of £20 for a monthly stake of £1 + 50p p&p. Applications should be sent to:

Miss A Kelsey, Hopefield 200 Club, 188 Wellesly Road, Ilford, IG1 4LL

Redwings Horse Sanctuary
Hill Top Farm, Hall Lane, Frettenham Norwich NR12 7LT
Tel: 0603 737432

Founded in 1984, the sanctuary exists to rescue horses, ponies and donkeys from neglect and slaughter and provide them with a caring home for the rest of their days. There are now over 1000 animals in their care and consequently they require regular funding from supporters. If you can, please adopt a pony or donkey, make a donation, sell grand draw tickets or purchase their merchandise. The sanctuary is open every Sunday and Bank Holiday Monday from 2pm to 5pm from Easter to mid-December.

The Donkey Sanctuary
Sidmouth, Devon EX10 0NU
Tel: 0395 578222 or 516391

The sanctuary continues its sterling work in providing homes for neglected and abused donkeys. The organisation runs a team of welfare officers in the United Kingdom and Ireland who welcome any calls about a donkey in distress. The officers can be contacted through the sanctuary 'phone numbers. All information received will be treated in the strictest confidence. The sanctuary spends most of the money donated on caring for over 5,600 donkeys, including funding a full-time hospital and nine farms which cover over 1,400 acres. The sanctuary is open to the public and sells a wide selection of merchandise.

Remus Memorial Horse Sanctuary
c/o Liz Clifford, 165 Squirrels Heath Road, Harold Wood, Essex RM3 0NS

Remus memorial Horse sanctuary is currently in a cash crisis. The recession has meant a reduction in donations to all charities and an increase in calls from people who can no longer afford to keep animals at home. The sanctuary also hoped to purchase a field for their own use but the area where the sanctuary is sited has now become building land and the cost of land has risen significantly. The staff have set up a land fund to purchase around 30 acres as a permanent site for the sanctuary. Please try to make a donation to ensure a secure future for the animals.

Horse and Pony Rescue Association
441, Rednal Road, Kings Norton,
Birmingham B38 8HB

The association operates a sanctuary at Alvechurch, mostly for horses rescued from the meat trade. The founder is Derek Carroll who is a convicted former ALF activist.

The Brooke Hospital for Animals
Broadmead House, 21 Panton Street,
London SW1Y 4DR
Tel: 071 930 0210

The hospital provides free medical care for thousands of suffering animals in the Middle East and saves many more from years of crippling work. Any donation, however small, will be gratefully received.

Freshfields Animal Rescue Centre
East Lodge Farm, East Lane, Ince Blundell,
Liverpool L29 3EA
Tel: 051 931 1604

Freshfields has been similarly hit by the recession over the last year. The sanctuary had its ambulance stolen in September 1992 and it was not recovered. The shelter costs £1,500 a week to run and the staff would welcome any help in fundraising. They would also be extremely grateful for any 'pet supplies', greens for herbivores, tools, overalls, roofing felt, bread for fowl and any saleable goods for their charity shops. They would also be most grateful for offers to home rescued animals but run a strict vetting service, so don't be offended if the staff ask numerous questions before considering rehoming an animal with you.

Guy Troughton (from "Urban Foxes" by Stephen Harris)

Sussex Horse Rescue Trust
Heron Farm, Horsebridge Common, Ashurst,
Steyning, Sussex BN4 3AL
Tel: Steyning 812427

The trust is the only registered equine sanctuary in Sussex and have a policy of never selling the animals in their care. Over the last year the number of horses at the sanctuary has increased and two abandoned horses have been bought from irresponsible owners. The staff would be grateful for a donation of any saleable items for fundraising stalls.

A shopping guide for those wishing to buy goods which are free of animal ingredients and involve no animal testing.

National Groups

ANIMAL AID & ADVICE

081 889 9714

The main objectives are to encourage responsible pet 'ownership', ensuring that pets are not just bought as throwaway presents and to pass on the message that neutering and spaying is essential to prevent unwanted litters. AAA also rehomes abandoned/unwanted pets and also runs a fostering service.

ANIMAL LIBERATION FRONT (SUPPORTERS GROUP)

BCM 1160, LONDON WC1N 3XX

Subscription to their quarterly newsletter is £24 per year. It provides information about current arrests and imprisonment of alleged animal rights activists. The SG raises funds - chiefly to help pay fines and help towards the travelling expenses of visiting relatives. Funds also go towards paying for books, cruelty-free toiletries, etc. A range of merchandise is available with a discount to any SG member.

ANIMAL LIBERATION FRONT (PRESS OFFICE)

BM 4400, LONDON WC1N 3XX

The Press Office plays a valuable role in the Animal Rights Movement. It remains paramount as a means of providing TV, radio and newspaper coverage on why ALF actions take place, and always pushes forward the horrors and extent of animal abuse to the misinformed public. Speakers are available for meetings, rallies, forums, etc. - this provides an excellent base to dispel the lies and distortions that have shrouded ALF actions. Merchandise is available. Donations are needed as a matter of priority to cover the costs of running this much needed service.

ANIMAL RIGHTS COALITION (ARC)

061 953 4039

ARC encourages the coming-together of all groups. It holds conferences where groups can get together and share news and views. It encourages people to support their local animal rights groups. A newsletter is provided including an animal rights list of events up and down the country. On November 6th, a day of action will be held against the leather and fur trade. Leaflets are available from ARC.

ANIMAL LIBERATION INVESTIGATION UNIT (ALIU)

PO Box 38, Manchester M60 1FT

061 953 4039

Animal abuse establishments such as slaughterhouses and vivisection labs are inspected (legally). Video footage is taken and documents borrowed and photocopied to build up ALIU's information files. (The borrowing of files etc. is legal - as long as they are returned.) For recent inspections refer to the article elsewhere in Arkangel. The ALIU group in the South East now has its own address - SE ALIU, PO Box 71, Hastings, East Sussex.

ACTION AGAINST PUPPY FARMING

PO Box 2, Llandysul, Dyfed, SA44 4EB

Dyfed, in Wales is infamous for its puppy farming. The animals are bred purely for profit and appalling suffering is involved. When their breeding days are over, they are battered to death or drowned. AAPF spreads the message of never buying puppies from a pet shop. Donations are always needed.

ADVOCATES FOR ANIMALS

10, Queensferry Street, Edinburgh EH2 4PG

Campaigns against all forms of animal abuse. They acted as the focal point that drew attention to animals being used at Glasgow University where animals sustained the most appalling head injuries. They continue to campaign to put animal welfare into the forefront of politics, and they finance and take part in special investigations.

ANIMAL RESEARCH KILLS (ARK)

PO Box 82, Kingswood, Bristol BS15 1YF

ARK exists to promote the works of Hans Ruesch, author of 'Slaughter of the Innocent' and 'The Naked Empress', two invaluable books exposing the fraudulence of vivisection.

ACTION TO ABOLISH THE GRAND NATIONAL

PO Box 3152, London E12 5JW

AAGN was formed to let the public know how cruel horse racing is and continues to fight against this cruel 'sport'. Merchandise is available.

ANIMAL BIRTH CONTROL / ANIMAL ACTION

2, Festings Buildings, Highland Rd, Southsea,
Hants PO4 9BZ : 0705 736691

ABC helps with the spaying and neutering of animals, helping elderly people with the costs of keeping their companions and undertaking secret investigations into where and who are abusing animals. Due to an upsurge in cruelty, ABC now works with Animal Action which rescues and rehomes unwanted/abandoned animals.

This is an international marine animal rescue, protection and welfare organisation. Its aims are to help marine animals from threats of over-fishing, pollution, etc. They use the media to increase awareness of marine animals in danger and they also initiate investigations. Membership is £15.00 per year, with subsidies for families, OAP's, etc.

BRITISH UNION FOR THE ABOLITION OF VIVISECTION (BUAV)

16a Crane Grove, London N7 8LB
071 700 4888

Their campaign 'Paradise Lost' is proving to be very successful with many airlines abandoning their transport of primates for experimentation.

BEAUTY WITHOUT CRUELTY

57 King Henry's Walk, London N1 4NH

BWC has recently filmed evidence that Namibia is still clubbing seals to death, although the Government said that clubbing had ceased. It confronts animal testing companies with their criteria on animal testing to see if their products are 100% non-animal tested (as 60% of the ingredients that make up a product are usually tested). A bulletin is produced.

BRITISH HEDGEHOG PRESERVATION SOCIETY

*Knowbury House, Knowbury, Ludlow,
Shropshire SY8 3LQ*

Aims to encourage an awareness of how many hedgehogs are killed by careless fast drivers; that hedgehogs are burnt to death when nesting in unlit bonfires, etc. The society is involved with the rehabilitation of injured and orphaned hedgehogs, returning them to the wild when good and ready. A free leaflet on hedgehog care is available from the above address - please send an SAE.

CETACEA DEFENCE

PO Box 11, SEDO Office, Manchester M18 8GU

Principally involved in protecting the world's whales and dolphins. When the International Whaling Commission gathered earlier this year, CD held demos at the Norwegian Embassy in London. CD are currently appealing for anyone visiting the Greek Islands to contact them. People are needed to act as 'on the spot' investigators as it is known that Greek fishermen are shooting dolphins - as much evidence as possible is needed against them.

CARE FOR THE WILD

*1 Ashfolds, Horsham Rd, Ruspur,
West Sussex RH12 4QX*

A sanctuary in Britain is fully functional thanks to generous donations. Llamas which were abandoned in Antigua are still being cared for, with food and medical supplies being shipped over. Hippos in Zimbabwe suffering from the effects of drought, then heavy rainfalls, are being monitored. Care for the Wild helped with the Shetland disaster, helping with the rescuing of oil-coated animals. It encourages people to foster animals around the world. For more details, contact the above address.

CAMPAIGN FOR THE ABOLITION OF ANGLING

PO Box 130, Sevenoaks, Kent TN14 5NR

CAA pushes forward the message that just because fish don't scream, it doesn't mean they don't feel pain. They encourage people to take part in fish sabs of local angling matches, organise protests outside tackle shops, etc. They organise a national anti-angling week urging local groups to take part in demos, etc.

CAMPAIGN TO END FRAUDULENT MEDICAL RESEARCH (CEFMR)

PO Box 302, London N8 9HD

CEFMR highlights the fact that so many drugs passed as 'safe' which have been tested on animals, have in fact the opposite effect on human beings. They back this up with excellent examples in their leaflet. A book entitled 'Vivisection or Science?' is available, please contact the above address.

CRUELTY-FREE COMPANIONS

c/o Tony Martin, 26, Hermitage Ave, Borrowash, Derby DE72 3JL

Would like to link people from all over the country who believe in a cruelty free lifestyle. For more details please contact the above address.

CO-ORDINATING ANIMAL WELFARE

PO Box 589, Bristol BS99 1RW

CAW has turned its attention to the fate of horses used for racing. A leaflet is available detailing what action should be taken by anyone concerned.

CAMPAIGN AGAINST LEATHER & FUR (CALF)

BM 8889, London WC1N 3XX

Many people who do not realise that the wool, leather, fur, and silk-making industries are cruel, profit-motivated businesses will be enlightened when they read the informative leaflets which are available. 10 different stickers are also available at 50p per 100. Donations are very welcome!

CAMPAIGN TO END BLINDING EXPERIMENTS AT OXFORD UNIVERSITY

Box M, 111 Magdalen Rd, Oxford OX4 1RQ

Colin Blakemore, a professor at Oxford University, has surgically blinded cats, hamsters and monkeys by stitching up their eyes since the 1960's. An excellent leaflet is available which details Blakemore's work.

DARTMOOR BADGERS PROTECTION LEAGUE

6 Elm Grove, Teignmouth, Devon

In the West Country, the badger population has declined dramatically. The group would like people to write to their MP's to ensure they sign Early Day Motion number 380 in favour of badger protection.

DOCTORS IN BRITAIN AGAINST ANIMAL EXPERIMENTS (DBAE)

104b Weston Park, London N8 9PP

Founded in March 1990, professionals such as doctors, pharmacists and scientists got together and decided to voice their opinions and oppose animal experiments on scientific and medical grounds. Their aims are to have a total, immediate abolition of all animal experiments. For more information please contact the above address.

DISABLED AGAINST ANIMAL RESEARCH AND EXPLOITATION (DAARE)

PO Box 8, Daventry, N'Hants NN11 4RQ

DAARE exists as a national organisation of people who are disabled or have a chronic disease. They believe animal experiments should be abolished since animals react differently to drugs compared to human beings, and through animal tested research, dangerous drugs have been available. DAARE supports research such as human cell, tissue and organ cultures, computer simulations and clinical studies. People who are not disabled are also welcome to join.

DR HADWEN TRUST FOR HUMANE RESEARCH

*6c Brand St, Hitchin, Herts SG5 1HX
0462 436 819*

ENDANGERED DOGS ASSOCIATION

*PO Box 1544, London W7 2ZB
081 843 9751 (Helpline)*

This group was formed by people concerned when the Dangerous Dogs Act came into force. They help people who need advice or are facing prosecution under the Act. Their aims are to secure humane amendments to the Act instead of the needless destruction of 'offending' dogs.

ENVIRONMENTAL INVESTIGATION AGENCY (EIA)

2, Pear Tree Court, London EC1R 0DS

EIA works as an undercover/investigation agency. They held a sponsored walk this year to raise money for dolphins and whales. They are opposed to the wild-caught bird trade and are still researching undercover operations against the ivory trade. Donations are needed to ensure that their excellent undercover investigations continue.

EUROPEAN NETWORK FOR DOLPHINS (END)

PO Box 11, SEDO, Manchester M18 8GU

END concentrates on the issues which surround dolphins in captivity, and works with several other organisations to form a unified network. They oppose the dolphinarium industry in Europe and work towards the demise in Europe of dolphin shows. For more information on activities please contact the above address.

FOX PROJECT

PO Box 56, Tonbridge, Kent TN9 1XY

They fight the myth that the fox is a destructive animal. Fox Project use a non-toxic, harmless deterrent when they are called to remove foxes, and continue the fight to stop local authorities aimlessly killing them. They also rescue abandoned/orphaned cubs and will return them to the wild when they are fit and ready. A speaker is available for talks, and there is a whole range of merchandise.

FRIENDS OF ANIMALS UNDER ABUSE (FAUNA)

*PO Box 156, Cardiff CF5 5YD
0222 569914*

FAUNA promotes the message that animals should not be bought from pet shops/markets, but should be obtained from animal shelters and sanctuaries. They strongly advise that animals should be spayed/neutered.

GREEN ANARCHIST MAGAZINE

Box M, 111 Magdalen Rd, Oxford OX4 1RQ

Covers a wide range of issues including Animal Liberation and ALF action reports.

GREEK ANIMAL WELFARE FUND

*1-2 Castle Lane, London SW1E 6DM
071 828 9736*

GAWF concentrates on the huge population of abandoned/unwanted and stray animals. A new shelter has been built which also acts as a rescue centre to accommodate dogs, cats, horses and donkeys. They have helped with the Greek Dancing Bears rescue and help feral cats by neutering and vaccination. They have also helped many an unwanted donkey which has been abandoned by a brutal farmer, tied to a tree and left to die of starvation.

HUNT SABOTEURS ASSOCIATION (HSA)

*PO Box 1, Carlton, Nottingham NG4 2JY
0602 590357*

Contact the HSA for information and advice on how to form a fully operational hunt-sab group. The HSA provides speakers for talks and gives legal advice. Merchandise is available.

INTERNATIONAL FUND FOR ANIMAL WELFARE (IFAW)

Section 43, Crowborough, East Sussex TN6 2QH

IFAW launched a successful national media campaign against China's bear farming. Bears are kept in cages no bigger than their own bodies and are painfully tapped for their bile because the Chinese believe bile can cure ailments. Also, the bears' paws are amputated while they are held captive, to make expensive soups for tourists and bear paw wine. Please contact them if you would like a petition or further information.

INTERNATIONAL ANIMAL RESCUE

Ash Mill, South Moulton, Devon EX36 4QW

They have rescued donkeys and ponies from the meat industry, also pigs, goats and deer. They highlight the forgotten fact that many British birds are slaughtered in Malta when they migrate. Barns have been converted to house animals. Funds are always needed.

I.O.W. ANIMAL PRESERVATION AND ACTION GROUP

Little Spinney, Solent Rd, Cranmore, I.O.W. PO41 0XY
'Preserve', an informative bulletin, is produced which deals with all animal abuse related issues, and includes a letters page and poetry corner.

JEWISH VEGETARIAN SOCIETY

855 Finchley Rd, London NW11 8LX

Educates the Jewish population and community about the benefits of living with a vegetarian diet. They produce an informative magazine. The Young Jewish Vegetarian Society can also be contacted at the above address.

NATIONAL ANTI-VIVISECTION SOCIETY (NAVS)

(Also youth group Animal Defenders)

Ravenside, 261 Goldhawk Rd, London W12 9PE

Unfortunately, the AD shop in Birmingham closed due to the recession, but NAVS continues to carry on its campaigns in exposing animal abuse in vivisection laboratories nationwide. Their World Day march was a success in April with over 20,000 people in attendance. They have a bus which tours the country highlighting animal abuse and acting as an educational stand.

NATIONAL PETWATCH

PO Box 16, Brighouse, West Yorkshire HD6 1DS

Many people take it for granted that their pets will never be stolen. The sad truth is that often they are, and that they could end up being used in experimentation, the fur trade or dog fighting. National Petwatch urges people not to leave dogs at risk - never leave them unattended.

NATIONAL NEUTERING AND SPAYING SCHEME

PO Box 170, Northampton NN2 8AB

The NNSS rehome, neuter and spay cats and dogs. They educate people about the plight of unwanted animals and why neutering and spaying is paramount in order to stop animals having unwanted litters. Leaflets are available.

PLAN 2000 (DR. VERNON'S)

Lynmouth, DEVON EX35 6EE

Plan 2000 aims to see all animal experiments banned by the end of the century. The European Medical Journal is available through the same address. It covers the facts about why animal-tested medical research is a nonsense.

PEOPLE AGAINST CHIMPANZEE EXPERIMENTS (PACE)

59a Tisbury Rd, Hove, East Sussex BN3 3BL

PACE is dedicated to saving chimps from research laboratories. These animals are grossly abused because of their supposed similarity to humans beings. PACE keeps track with what is happening internationally and supports conservation work.

PUPPYWATCH

PO Box 23, Neath, West Glamorgan SA11 1QP

Puppywatch objects to the sale of puppies and other animals through dealers, agents and third parties such as pet shops and other retail outlets. Puppywatch, founded in 1989, monitors and exposes puppy farms and dog breeders. They aim to educate the public about the pitfalls of buying puppies from unsuitable sources.

PET STEALING ALERT

PO Box 94, Cheltenham, Glos.

Cats and dogs are going missing nationwide. Plausible and believable promises are made through adverts that animals will be found good homes, however the reality is that many will face a cruel destination. Please contact the above address if you are suspicious of an advert or if an animal has disappeared in unusual circumstances.

QUEST CANCER TEST

*Woodbury, Hadlow Rd, Roydon, Harlow,
Essex CM19 5HF : 027979 2233*

This is the only cancer charity that concentrates all its resources to develop routine tests so that the first signs of cancer can be detected - without the use of animals. Donations are needed for this important work.

RESPECT FOR ANIMALS

PO Box 500, Nottingham NG1 3AS

RESPECT was set up when LYNX went bankrupt. They will continue the fight against the fur trade. Leaflets are available.

STUDENT CAMPAIGN FOR ANIMAL RIGHTS

*PO Box 155, Manchester M60 1FT
061 953 4039*

The group is concerned with every aspect of abuse and exploitation of animals. SCAR encourages local action and is attempting to force the debate in our educational establishments.

SOCIETY FOR THE PROTECTION OF ANIMALS ABROAD (SPANA)

15 Buckingham Gate, London SW1E 6LB

SPANA highlights the abuse of animals in third world countries, where, in particular, the donkey is abused in extremely hot climates by having to carry heavy loads and being given little or no rest or water during its working day. SPANA also concentrates on the welfare of cattle, cats and other animals abroad.

SEA SHEPHERD

PO Box 5, Ashford, Middlesex TW15 2PY

An invaluable organisation which campaigns against the abuse of marine life. They recently sunk a whaling ship. The group is involved in a wide range of campaigns including saving dolphins from tuna nets and filming the evidence, ramming a Japanese trawler and disabling its fishing gear, and saving seals. Donations are greatly appreciated!

SOCIETY FOR NEUTERING ISLINGTON'S PUSSIES (SNIP)

125 Bouverie Rd, London N16 0AA

GREENACRES ANIMAL RESCUE

PO Box 650, Caernarfon, Gwynedd LL55 2DZ

076 686 392

The group has set up an appeal in response to the lack of facilities for ill-treated animals in North Wales. The object of the appeal is to raise sufficient funds to establish and maintain an Animal Rescue Centre to serve Gwynedd, Clwyd and Anglesey. Once established, the centre will give priority to strays, ill-treated animals and those whose owners have died. No healthy animal will be destroyed, and each animal shall be given any veterinary treatment it needs for the rest of its life or until a suitable adoptive home is found.

URGENT APPEAL!

We know that the pages of this magazine are filled with appeals for funds for groups, sanctuaries and campaigns, but we do ask you to consider making a donation (however small) to Pigeon Recovery. The two people who run it work tirelessly to collect injured pigeons from all around the London area, and they have just been told that their car will not get through the M.O.T. (the last thing they needed). If anyone out there has a car they don't want..... contact PIGEON RECOVERY (081 644 7349) See ad at end of local group section.

The Abruzzo region has approved a law to make the shooting of previously captured pigeons illegal, in advance of a national law which will abolish such pigeon shoots throughout the whole of Italy in 1994.

Following protests by the LAV (Anti-Vivisection League) and members of the Italian senate, 30 piglets have been saved from experiments at a hospital in Turin and a rabbit from dissection at an agrarian institute in Rome.

In the first case of its kind in Europe, six vivisectioners at the Institute of Physiology in Palermo have been fined by a magistrate for ill-treatment of animals.

A fur farm at Bolsena where foxes were kept in appalling conditions has closed down because of 'administrative irregularities' following an occupation there by A/R campaigners.

Alpitour, the largest tour operator in Italy has agreed to no longer promote bullfighting and its latest brochure contains an article by the LAV asking tourists not to attend the bullfight. (Impronte, Feb 1993)

A former privilege of hunters, to have their dogs and birds travel free of charge on Italian public transport has been withdrawn.

Following a campaign by animal protectionists, a number of brown bears are to be transferred from a zoo in Trento to a wildlife park at Spormaggiore where they will join other bears living in natural conditions.

About 50 local and regional authorities have banned the use of animals in the circus and other public spectacles.

In 1992, the manufacture of furs in Italy fell by 3.6% and in December 1992 the sale of furs was down 30%. (Impronte, April 1993)

SPAIN

Economic difficulties have caused the Barcelona bullring to reduce the number of bullfights held there and it is now putting on music concerts instead.

According to an opinion poll taken by a TV company, 60% of Catalonians are opposed to the wearing of fur.

The bullring at Alicante suffered disastrous economic losses in 1992 meaning that the number of bullfights there this year has been reduced and the bullring may even have to close if those in charge of it cannot pay the rent to the local authority. (Circular Antitaurina, Feb 1993)

According to a September 1992 Gallup poll, 68% of Spaniards are not the least bit interested in bullfighting, a 16% increase from a similar poll carried out in 1987, and 87.4% expressed opposition to cruel fiestas. (ADDA Defends the Animals, Spring 1993)

Only two bullrings in Spain (in Madrid and Seville) are actually making a profit. (Boletin Antitaurino, Spring 1993)

T.V. programmes featuring bullfighting are amongst the least popular with Spanish viewers and the number of such programmes has been reduced this year.

In the past two years the annual turnover of the Spanish fur trade has gone down by £250 million. (Liberacion Animal, March 1993)

The yearly 'tradition' of beating and stoning a donkey to death in the village of Villannueva has come to an end following a campaign by animal protectionists from several European countries. (Animaux Magazine, April 1993)

SWITZERLAND

At least one third of the members of the Swiss parliament are in favour of the total abolition of vivisection. (Liberacion Animal, March 1993)

USA

Following a storm of protest from environmental and A/R groups, the state government of Alaska has dropped a plan to shoot at least 300 wolves as a way of increasing caribou and moose herds to create a tourist spectacular.

The Interior Department's Fish and Wildlife Service has agreed that it will, by September 1996, list some 400 species of animals and plants as endangered and will speed up final consideration of a future 900 species. The decision follows a lawsuit by animal protection and wildlife campaigners. (Animals Agenda, Jan/Feb 1993)

Burger King officials have estimated that 90% of its spicy beanburger customers were non-vegetarian and shortly after it was introduced, the beanburger was outselling the company's other burgers. (Vegetarian Voice, Feb 1993)

In February, General Motors issued a sworn statement saying it had stopped using animals in trauma tests more than a year ago and had no plans to resume such testing. (Detroit News 19.2.93)

California has brought in a law to regulate the importation and confinement of wild animals, which includes an amendment stating that the results of animal experiments are not admissible in product liability actions involving motor vehicles, so that car companies cannot rely on animal tests to argue that their cars are safe.

Voters have overwhelmingly backed a proposal to eliminate the hunting of black bears in Colorado during the Spring and to prohibit the use of bait and hounds for bear-hunting in the state.

In Connecticut a new law has established a programme for low cost spay/neutering of cats and dogs adopted from animal shelters. (Humane News, March/April 1993)

President Clinton's science advisor, John Gibbons, is a firm believer in animal rights, refuses to eat veal and believes some researchers have needlessly abused lab animals. (Washington Post, 9.3.1993)

A plan for 40 soldiers to kill, cook and eat 5 rabbits and 12 chickens as part of a survival skills training exercise was called off following protests by People for the Ethical

Treatment of Animals. (Salt Lake Tribune, 19.3.1993)

Many US stores have closed their fur boutiques and fur shops in the USA and are continuing to go bankrupt in considerable numbers.

Chanel has signed a statement guaranteeing a permanent commitment to a non-animal testing policy and the company's senior vice-president of research & development has stated that Chanel is "dedicated to a complete ban on all animal testing". (PETA News, Spring 1993)

Nearly 1000 events in all 50 states and several Canadian provinces marked the 9th annual observance of the pro-vegetarian Great American Meatout. From humble beginnings in 1985, Meatout has grown into the nation's largest and most colourful grass-roots public interest campaign. (Farm Animal Reform Movement Report, Spring 1993)

Jindo Furs, which opened 40 shops in the US 2 years ago, has now had to close them all. (Animaux Magazine, April 1993)

On February 25th, a judge of the Federal District Court declared that the Government's rules on the treatment of laboratory dogs and primates were too lenient and the standards of care for these animals must be improved. (The AV Magazine, May 1993)

Tens of thousands of rabbits will be saved from extreme pain each year because the U.S. Department of Transportation (D.O.T.) has now said that animals are not necessary to test corrosives and will use a non-animal chemical process instead. This marks the first time any US government agency has formally approved an alternative to animal testing and follows the delivery of petitions to the D.O.T. by animal protection campaigners.

A campaign by PETA has persuaded officials in Huntsville, Alabama to cancel plans to kill up to 8 million birds that roost there at night. PETA also succeeded in getting a proposed pigeon-poisoning in Lexington, Kentucky cancelled and the voices of A/R activists and threats of legal action caused officials in Kearney, Nebraska to ban crow-shooting inside the city limits. (PETA News, Summer 1993)

Animal Rights Mobilisation in Denver, Colorado have persuaded proposed aquatic park 'Ocean Journey' not to have dolphins. (The AV Magazine, July 1993)

The US Government has moved towards a ban on Norwegian imports because of Norway's defiance of non-whaling rules. (Teletext, 7.8.93).

Animal Liberation - The Sequel

by Anon.

Hello all.

I have decided to put pen to paper to tell you about "ALF - THE SEQUEL TO THE MOVIE". Admittedly the quality is poor, only limited funds and resources were available. The sequel was constructed to show people that things are still happening in the 90's and the majority of the footage has never been shown before. So before you criticise, watch and listen. Most of the animals you see were saved from death row - a reason to rejoice - not to slag off! Positive criticism is no problem, we all learn from our mistakes - well some of us do! So sit in silence and watch the film.

Any money made is going straight into direct action (that doesn't necessarily mean illegal actions). You're paying for what you see, so don't moan and ask for your money back. Some of us will never criticise people who are getting off their backsides to fight for animal liberation. Whatever you do, all is so important. Thanks to the people who said, "Yes, shame about the quality, but the footage, etc. was brilliant." The original movie was perfect. The sequel was not a follow-up to it. We're not in the game of professional movie-making. We're just people who have tried to do something positive and to let the scum know we are a force to be reckoned with. We have now been offered an editing suite to remake and hopefully add to the sequel. I'm sure that once it's done there will always be those who will still complain. Anyway, let's get our act together and make movies - a sequel to the sequel perhaps - and keep the animal abusers on the run.

By the time you read this, you will be probably be aware that ASDA (Associated Diaries) has closed its meat products group with the loss of 1,300 jobs. The reason given for the closure was said to be "lack of demand for meat products." The news was widely reported on BBC Radio and television today (23.4.1993).

It has also been reported on the BBC that there have been 26 cases of Cryptosporidiosis infection in children visiting farms (to see lambs) with their school in Newbury.

Cam and used well tried and tested methods to scare the fish away from the anglers hooks. Using a punt and diving gear, the activists spoiled a day's fishing for Cambridge anglers. One group of anglers were persuaded to stop their silly, cruel sport in Manchester when activists gathering for the Manchester anti meat rally discovered anglers nearby. Another day's sabotage took place in the West Midlands, with the anglers showing their frustration at the lack of fish victims by punching a sab in the face.

Fortunately the bizarre comment was treated with the contempt it deserved and the Ytene saw more sabotage than ever this year. On 24th July 1993, for example, over 100 Sabs from many regions brought the hunt to a halt. For over four hours the hounds were unable to hunt mink due to the confusion sown by sabs who kept up a noisy barrage of horn and voice calls and waded in waist high water dissuading the hounds from the river bank homes of the mink. Several dig outs were prevented by sabs sitting on the holes dug by the sadistic supporters and they responded by causing several scuffles with sabs out of view of the police. The sabs followed a policy of "giving as good as they got" and took control of the river bank. The hunt eventually admitted defeat and boxed up the hounds, telling the police that they were packing up for the day. However, wary sabs saw them attempt to make a break for it from the kennels after police had left, only to find their lane blocked by several sab vehicles. The poor old hunters finally admitted defeat. Similar sabotage took place throughout their hunting season and sabs can feel justified in congratulating themselves in saving the lives of many mink and bringing about a significant reduction in the environmental damage caused by these unspeakable hooligans of the riverside.

SABBING ANGLING - NO LONGER THE NEGLECTED BLOODSPORT

Saboteurs have stepped up their sabotage of angling this year. A number of angling competitions throughout the country received the attentions of saboteurs and all appeared to have successfully frustrated the bloodsports enthusiasts. On 7th March 1993 Wraysbury reservoir near Staines held an angling competition in aid of the Imperial Cancer Research Foundation. The competition also attracted seven sabs from the London area who spent a most successful day scaring the fish away from the anglers and causing two of them to pack up and leave. Police attending the sab said that the event was on private land and were unable to stop the sabs. During the day none of the anglers appeared to catch anything more than a slight cold.

On the first official day of angling, 16.6.93, activists protested on the River

AND FINALLY - A LEGAL WARNING

With the rise in violence at hunts this season the government seems likely to legislate to enable police to stop confrontation. However, somewhat predictably, ministers are not considering a new vote on banning hunting with hounds (which, incidentally, is likely to be carried by parliament and which will end the violent confrontations, the cruelty and brutality in one fell swoop) but are considering new laws to stop saboteurs getting close to the hunt. Rumours of the Government's approach to the problem abound and at present there is no clear evidence that any one course of action is proposed. Nevertheless, informed sources comment that Lord Ferrers, Home Office Minister, has been 'got at' by the BFSS and is considering inserting a clause in the revised law of trespass relating to travellers and raves to include hunt saboteurs. If the hunt supporters and shooters have their way, it will be an offence not to obey a police instruction to leave private land where people have entered it as trespassers. Leaving aside the obvious difficulty in administering such a law, it is important that people who oppose hunting write to their MP to ensure that such an unwarranted attack on non-violent protestors is defeated and the blame for the increase in violence on hunts is put at the door of the perpetrators - the hunters themselves.

News from the ALF Press Office

by Robin Webb

One of the early issues of Arkangel - number 4 to be exact - included an article written by me on the morality of so-called 'violence' in the animal liberation movement. It credited me as an RSPCA council member and former Assistant Director of Animal Aid and included a critique on the use of arson. A few people have since asked me how I can reconcile the opinion offered at that time with my role as ALF Press Officer. Well, the article was written on morality from a theoretical viewpoint but the practical application of arson was, to use a phrase from that article, 'a separate argument for another time'. Perhaps that time is now.

The Band of Mercy (ALF's predecessor) was formed in August 1972 and originally concentrated on hunts. Its concerns expanded during 1973 with arson attacks on pharmaceutical companies and, later, seal-culling boats. Since then it has been used consistently as a tactic with no human being harmed during the 20 years or so of such activities. It cannot be repeated too often that the ALF has always adhered to a policy of taking every precaution not to endanger life. However, it is not a perfect world. Even this page you are reading, recycled though it may be, would originally have cost lives to produce... the occupants of the tree, small though they may have been, enjoyed life which was important to them. Regretfully, one cannot remain in the real world to fight battles without there being casualties. So long as causing harm was not only unintentional but also minimised so far as possible then surely one can ask no more. None of us are innocent enough to criticise, but it is strange that those who raise the loudest cries of horror against such tactics are often those who don't fully subscribe to the maxim 'if it ain't vegan it ain't cruelty-free'. Which takes us on to the latest issue of 'The Campaigner' from the NAVS.

The report on World Day includes criticism of alleged behaviour by the ALF. As the ALF itself wasn't officially represented I presume they mean the SG or Press Office. The truth about speakers last year, and this, is simple. About two months before World Day 1992 I approached Jan Creamer on behalf of Keith Mann who would have liked a message read out from the animal rights prisoners. Jan explained that it was not possible as speakers and timing had already been arranged. On the day there were vociferous calls from sections of the demonstrators for an ALF speaker. These calls were spontaneous and nothing to do with either the SG or Press Office, a fact that Jan Creamer accepted at the time. For 1993, neither the SG nor the Press Office bothered to ask about having a speaker and, to the best of our knowledge, there were no calls for one. People were quite happy to visit our stands at the 'alternative fair'. We would have liked to publicise ourselves at the NAVS exhibition but stalls for us were not available. So we participated in an event which augmented World Day. Because of the location of ARC's 'alternative fair' people could visit both that and the NAVS exhibition. What's wrong with that?

Meanwhile, the work of the Animal Liberation Front itself - the activists - has continued. Up and down the country, on a nightly basis, the ALF has continued to help the animal abusers by freely redecorating their shops, improving the security of their premises by supergluing the locks, and advancing staff welfare by installing new air conditioning systems which, unfortunately, sometimes causes slight (and often not-so-slight) damage to their windows. Still, I guess that nothing's perfect and it does indicate that the ALF is taking on board the argument from many national societies that we should all be prepared to hold a dialogue and work with the abusers!! Perhaps we could all, in various ways, offer them even more help?

Larger actions haven't been neglected either. For example, on 4th May a group of activists spent several hours during the night rescuing 80 rabbits near Lymm in Cheshire. The raid included crossing a small river and making numerous trips across the fields. Among those rescued were breeding does with their young. All are now in good permanent homes. Hyline has been raided several times over a number of years and the activists say that the actions will continue until the place - which supplies both the fur trade and vivisection - has closed down. Also in May, an economic sabotage action was carried out at pheasant breeding premises near Whitchurch in Shropshire. The anonymous caller claimed that seven rearing sheds had been destroyed by incendiary devices but they must have been too modest as the final tally of sheds destroyed or damaged came to no less than nineteen. This action was one that indicated the conspiracy that exists to deny the true scale of ALF activities. An inspector in the Shropshire police asked me 'not to tell the news media as it encourages people to go out and break windows and things like that'. Of course, to use a phrase I seem to have heard elsewhere, I was 'only doing my job' when I told the press about it.

While that was going on in the UK, over in Germany three shooting towers were destroyed on three consecutive nights. These are pretty solidly built structures of concrete and metal which blood junkies use to shoot from at anything and everything. All three were dismantled and came crashing to the ground.

Things have been 'hotting up' recently with an increase in animal rights/liberation of all types, both legal and otherwise. July saw a huge broiler shed destroyed near West Hadham in Northamptonshire. Although claimed through the Press Office as an ALF action the reports were somewhat confusing. The newspaper said it was a battery unit despite being told carefully and clearly that it wasn't, while the farmer seemed to claim it wasn't even used for animals or birds. Never mind all that... it was a broiler shed, it was a hell-hole and it was taken out by the ALF. August saw quite a remarkable beginning with a Halal slaughterhouse at Tyldesley near Manchester closing after a three-year campaign by local residents and animal rights groups. The final straw came when their offices were completely wrecked and valuable files taken. Mahmood Meats of Parr Bridge Farm: 0 - Animal Liberation Front: 1. A few days later 83 hens from a battery unit at Molash in Kent decided to go to new homes and the following morning two young pigs from the pig research centre at Wye College (linked to London University and holding a Home Office licence) near Ashford, also in Kent, likewise moved house. The activists say they will be back. The farmer at Coppin's Farm near Molash says he'll be waiting with a shotgun. No good, that's been tried before without success. As for Wye College, they'll probably just spend more money on useless 'security measures'. That was followed by the rescue of ten beagles, eight adults and two nine-month-old youngsters, from the Cheshire Beagles hunt. Original reports said that only six had been taken, the next that they wouldn't survive outside the pack, then one was found 'wandering near the busy A49', the Cheshire Beagles/BFSS offered £5,000 reward for information and then came news that all ten had been killed by their rescuers!! The truth? Ten were rescued and the activists made sure all of them were safe in their new homes before confirming it to the Press Office.

Thanks for a fair deal a couple of times goes to the Chester Chronicle newspaper for trying to be objective and unbiased and also to BBC Radio GMR for the rare opportunity of a live interview on their morning news. That's about the only way to point out facts such as the only person ever convicted of an 'animal rights car bomb' was the blood junkie Alan Newberry-Street who placed it under his own Land Rover in an attempt to discredit the movement.

Further down, in Lincolnshire, six dogs were rescued from a farm and, as usual, taken to good homes after veterinary treatment. All six were emaciated and this was the seventh time dogs had been 'rehomed' from this farm. The activists concerned say that they will continue to target this place until the farmer stops keeping dogs. Watch this space...

So, up and down the country the ALF is still there, still busy and still effective. Don't forget, the Animal Liberation Front is not an organisation, not an elite band of compassionate commandoes, not some group you have to get references to join. The ALF is people who care enough about animals to take a few risks, people who are tired of talking while the animals die, people who do all kinds of things for animals from letter-writing to kennel-cleaning but need to do some more. In short, people like YOU!

The Vegetarian Esperanto Group (V.E.C.)

The group was set up to bring together British animal/human rights activists and environmentalists in order to help activists in other countries where consideration of these issues is rare. We use Esperanto because it is easy to learn, so we can all fairly quickly learn to communicate effectively in a totally neutral language and, of course, because it is the only real ethical option for a truly international group.

WHAT WE DO: We are planning one-day, weekend and one-week meetings and camps in Britain and Europe for people to learn Esperanto, exchange ideas, and develop materials for our fellow-thinkers in other countries.

HOW MUCH DOES IT COST TO JOIN?: £5.00 for 3 years - which gives you full voting rights at meetings, two English-language newsletters each year, and an optional Free Correspondence Course in Esperanto -- or -- £5.00 for one year, or £15.00 for three years gives you the above plus a quarterly 24-page magazine all in Esperanto, but you will soon be able to read most of it, if you do the correspondence course!

Payments may be made by cheques to VEGO, or send first or second class stamps.

HELPERS NEEDED

...for the Arkangel information project. We especially need voluntary helpers who

- a) have some scientific knowledge and are willing to spend time in their local university library, or
- b) have access to facilities whereby they can trace names and/or addresses of animal abusers.

We also need people who are willing to spend time doing research in their local library or in the British Library if they live in London.

Anyone willing to help, please write (including your telephone number) to;

A SMALL SELECTION FROM THE PAST FEW MONTHS!

Police condemn animal rights' city shop stunt

ANIMAL rights activists have been criticised by an Oxford police inspector for causing a chemical alert and wasting emergency services' time.

The police and fire brigade were called to Boots in Oxford's High Street on Sunday lunchtime after a call to a local radio station, allegedly from the Animal Liberation Front, which said a highly corrosive substance had been sprayed on the windows.

Acting Inspector Geoff Woolloff, of St Aldate's police station, said: "Although some people may sympathise with the causes of the Animal Liberation Front and such-like organisations, we cannot condone irresponsible acts of criminal damage, especially those that put the safety of pedestrians and tourists at risk, which cause damage and which waste the time and resources of the emergency services.

"This, in turn, directly affects the quality of service we can provide to the general public we provide though on this occasion it proved to be harmless.

"These attacks often involve the use of harmful chemicals and we must take all precautions to ensure public safety."

He added: "Enquiries are continuing to trace the offenders."

OXFORD JOURNAL — APRIL

Animal Lib in attacks on shops

THE Animal Liberation Front (ALF) has claimed responsibility for a series of attacks on shops in the Arun, Worthing and Adur areas.

ALF press officer Robin Webb said ALF activists had anonymously admitted firing marbles at shop windows using a high velocity catapult, probably from a moving vehicle, in the early hours of Tuesday morning. He added that butchers were targeted in an ongoing campaign against the meat industry and bookmakers were hit for their association with sports such as the steeplechase.

Mr Webb claimed that other shops were targeted due to alleged links with testing on animals. He said he did not encourage activities such as the catapult attacks, but did report what happened and the reasons why.

Mr Webb said the activists struck at shops including the following: Butchers in Sompting, Lancing, Durrington and Rustington; Boots chemist shops in Shoreham, Lancing and Rustington; Ladbroke's branches in Shoreham, Lancing and Littlehampton; Imperial Cancer Research Fund shops in Shoreham and Rustington.

Animal activists target 23 shops

■ 'Hooligans' are condemned for causing damage.

Animal rights activists were today condemned as "mindless hooligans" after a wave of vandal attacks on Portsmouth area shops.

The Animal Liberation Front admitted responsibility for attacks on 23 windows at butchers, betting shops, McDonald's stores, and gun and fishing shops in south-east Hampshire and West Sussex.

Spokesman Robin Webb said "local activists" struck early yesterday, and probably fired ball bearings from a high-powered catapult.

The total damage was estimated at £5,000.

He said it was a protest against blood sports, the meat trade, and racing industry.

"All these people have to do is try to pursue another form of business which does not involve animal suffering," Mr Webb said.

Det Chief Insp Nick Imber, of Hampshire police, said the British people would not be threatened or intimidated by the actions of "mindless hooligans."

Activists target butcher's shop

A BUTCHER'S shop in Leamington has been daubed with anti-meat slogans.

Police say the paint attack on the windows and walls of Alf Jones' shop in Clemens Street on Tuesday was the work of animal rights activists.

Insp Simon Pool said: "Butchers are often targeted by the Animal Liberation Front and from the slogans that were painted it would be fair to say it could be its work or that of a group connected with it." He added there was no reason to believe it was the start of a campaign by activists. Staff at Alf Jones refused to comment.

Animal Liberation fanatics target butcher

YOU WON'T SHUT ME DOWN

By STEPHEN FOSTER

ANIMAL Liberation fanatics fired a bullet through the window of a Rawtenstall butcher's shop in the early hours of Tuesday.

The attackers also targeted his van.

They poured a corrosive substance over the body work, painted the initials ALF (Animal Liberation Front) with an aerosol can, slashed the van's tyres and put super glue into the locks.

Weapon

Mr Colin Leach (55) runs the Burnley Road shop with his wife Carman. They live over the premises.

Mr Leach believes the weapon used to damage the shop window was more powerful than an air rifle because there were fragments of glass 20ft into the premises.

The damage was discovered at 6.40am. Later that morning, Mr Leach received an anonymous phone call.

Disgusted butcher Colin Leach inspects the damage to his van caused by animal rights activists. (K8641)

"He just said I hope you are happy now, laughed and put the phone down," said Mr Leach, who thought the caller had a Liverpool accent.

The attack has left him defiant and confused as to the motive. "They are not going to close me down, they are not going to achieve anything by this."

He said he had no idea why his business was targeted, but he knew of several butcher's shops in the Greater Manchester area which had been attacked.

Acid used in attack

Animal liberation campaigners used highly dangerous acid to daub hate messages on more than 40 shop windows in Chester.

Messages like "scum", "killers" and "ALF" were smeared on the windows of Boots, three butchers shops and fishmongers, police said.

Highly dangerous hydrofluoric acid, an etching substance, was used in the attacks in Chester town centre and on the city's outskirts at Hoole.

A police spokesman said the attacks could have been extremely dangerous to members of the public and particularly children.

Circus poster sparks attacks

ATTACKS on Hurst and Hassocks businesses by animal liberationists have been likened to terrorism.

A butcher has suffered £10,000 of damage through smashed windows in two years, and last Friday an estate agent displaying a circus poster found a hole shot through his glass door.

Both men are convinced the people who carried out the attacks are those who delivered warning notices to shops and businesses in the area demanding the removal of the circus posters.

Police are unsure whether the missiles are fired at the windows from guns or catapults.

Victim of the latest incident is estate agent Gary Marples from High Street, Hurstpierpoint.

In his window last Thursday night was a poster advertising the John Lawson circus which took place on the nearby South Avenue Rec this week.

Animal rights group run amok

ANIMAL Rights campaigners went on a wrecking spree in Camden Town on Tuesday night.

The Animal Liberation Front (ALF) sprayed slogans on and superglued the locks of two butchers, the Royal Veterinary College and the Camden Road branch of William Hill bookies.

But the defiant business people of Camden had scrubbed off the graffiti, fixed the locks and opened for business first thing on Wednesday morning.

CAMDEN AND ST. PANCRAS CHRONICLE - MAY

Animal Lib activists claim bird farm arson

By Jon Simcock and Joe Baldwin

Radical animal rights activists today claimed responsibility for a £10,000 fire at a Shropshire pheasant farm.

The Animal Liberation Front said it planted incendiary devices which triggered seven separate blazes at the farm at Sandford, near Whitchurch.

Police and fire experts were today sifting through debris from last night's blazes as a massive arson investigation was launched.

A senior fire officer said he could not confirm ALF claims the blazes had been started by a series of petrol bombs.

But Assistant Divisional Officer Michael Williams said valves on gas canisters at the site had been turned on to accelerate the flames.

Nineteen pheasant sheds were destroyed in the fire, and up to 20 canisters of liquid petroleum gas exploded.

"It was obvious it was arson but we are still carrying out tests to discover how the fires were actually started."

ALF spokesman Robin Webb said a "semi-autonomous" cell of the group had launched the attack with incendiary devices.

He said the company was rearing birds to be shot for fun and was therefore a legitimate target for a "major attack".

Devices

The safety of the fire crew and local residents would have been taken into consideration when the devices — believed to be petrol bombs — were planted, he claimed.

The site is run by Cheshire Game Supplies, which breeds up to 90,000 birds at the centre.

Mrs Gill Grocott, of the company, said her husband Pete discovered the fires as he checked the pens shortly before midnight.

Campaigners 'free' rabbits from farm

THE Animal Liberation Front yesterday claimed it released rabbits from a Cheshire farm.

A spokesman expressed concern about the purpose and manner of keeping rabbits in captivity.

Last night Edwin Sutton, a director of Hylyne Rabbits, at Lymm, near Warrington, refused to comment on the raid, initially denying it had taken place.

But a police spokesman confirmed that Mr Sutton had reported the theft of rabbits from his farm.

He added: "We were told that there was no evidence of ALF involvement, no signs or letters left."

Yesterday ALF Press officer Robin Webb said 80

rabbits had been liberated on Wednesday night.

"The rabbits, probably New Zealand Whites, some breeding stock and some does with their young, have been taken to new homes where they will be cared for properly," he said.

"We are committed to ending abuse of animals, either by rescuing animals, causing economic sabotage or damaging equipment and property until the businesses shut down. However, we are opposed to endangering life."

The farm has held open days in the past to allow the public to see for themselves the conditions in which the rabbits are kept.

Animal rights sabotage vow

THE Animal Liberation Front has an active cell in Dorset — and the group has pledged to continue its campaign of sabotage in the county.

Recent incidents have included attacks on Roger Daltrey's fish farm at Iwerne Minster, a slaughterhouse at Stourton Caundle and Sturminster Newton cattle market.

Its latest attack occurred last weekend when two butchers' shops in Dorchester had their windows smashed.

The word "murderers" was scrawled on the front of one of shops, Dewhursts in South Street.

At the time the police said they did not believe the attacks to be the work of animal activists, but the ALF have now claimed responsibility.

National Press Officer Robin Webb said: "There is definitely a cell at work in Dorset. And as long as animal abuse continues, I am confident this group will continue to attack butchers, slaughterhouses and laboratories in line with our national campaign."

WEYMOUTH ECHO - MAY

Mr Webb said the organisation had no central command structure, with individual groups picking their own targets and planning their own campaigns.

He said: "This enables us to protect the anonymity of our activists."

Eighteen months ago Mr Webb was at the centre of a national controversy when he announced his membership of the group while still a member of the RSPCA's National Committee. Soon after he was expelled from the RSPCA.

The police have refused to comment on Mr Webb's statement.

Animal protest row

POLICE slammed animal rights protesters who caused a major chemical alert when they attacked Boots The Chemist shop in Commarker Street, Oxford.

A man claiming to be from the Animal Liberation Front phoned Radio Oxford and warned that dangerous chemicals had been poured on the shop front.

Police confirmed that the substance was corrosive. A spokesman added: "This put people's safety at risk, and caused an extra strain on the emergency services."

OXFORD COURIER - APRIL

£5,000 cost of vandal attack

AN attack by animal rights activists on Saltdean Lido has caused £5,000 worth of damage.

But businessman Kevin Sadler, who recently took over the loss-making pool from Brighton Council, is vowing to be back in business by the weekend.

Animal Liberation Front activists poured a gallon of creosote into the swimming pool on Monday night.

They were protesting at Brighton Council's decision to allow vivisectionists to hold a conference at the Brighton Centre.

But, instead of striking at Brighton Council property, they sabotaged the business of Mr Sadler.

The attack will leave the pool shut until Sunday, while it is drained and refilled.

Mr Sadler said: "We're determined it will cause as little disruption as possible."

Activists hit at food shop

By JANE ELLIOTT

ANIMAL rights activists claimed they smashed a window at a Carlisle fast-food shop.

The Animal Liberation Front says it broke a window at McDonald's store in Scotch Street as part of its campaign against the multi-national chain.

The front is protesting at what it claims are large number of animals killed and the processing methods used.

CUMBRIA EVENING NEWS AND STAR - JULY

A spokesman said: "Sometimes you have to go outside the law, as they did with the emancipation of women and the abolition of slavery."

A McDonald's spokesman confirmed that a large window at the restaurant had been smashed and that the costs were extensive.

He was unaware that the front had claimed to have caused the damage.

Bird shooting hides attack

THE Animal Liberation Front has claimed responsibility for destroying 72 shooting butts on Mossscar Moors, Derbyshire. The butts are camouflaged places where people can shoot birds from.

Animal Liberation Front spokesman Robin Weir said: "It was done to cause maximum disruption before the start of the pheasant shooting season on August 12."

SHEFFIELD STAR - JULY

Attacks 'point to local activists'

A cell of extreme animal rights activists could be at large in north Shropshire, it has been claimed. The area has been the target of a number of sophisticated attacks by the Animal Liberation Front, a leading field sports lobby says.

The radical group — whose members correspond via drop boxes — this week claimed responsibility for a high-publicity raid on hunt kennels near Whitchurch.

Intruders grabbed six beagles after cutting phone wires and ripping down iron bars at the isolated Cheshire Beagles base in Cholmondeley.

Incendiaries

Just two months ago the same group admitted planting incendiary bombs at a pheasant farm in Sandford, between Whitchurch and Market Drayton. The attack caused £10,000 damage.

And in Chester, ALF slogans were daubed on the windows of chemists and butchers in a night of vandalism.

Now a spokesman for the British Field Sports Society says the proximity and knowledge needed for the attacks means culprits could be local.

SHROPSHIRE STAR - AUGUST

Animal libbers glue shop locks

Animal-rights terrorists have begun a campaign of disruptive vandalism against a selection of shops in Merton.

In a series of commando-like raids last week, members of the Animal Liberation Front put glue in the locks of shops in Wimbledon, Raynes Park and Morden.

Stores struck by the activists include Boots The Chemist, fast food outlet McDonalds and book-makers William Hill. Two butchers in Morden and a fishing tackle shop in Wimbledon were also hit.

In an anonymous letter to The Guardian, a member of the Animal Liberation Front claimed that the shops glued were involved in the exploitation of animals.

"Anyone involved in the abuse of animals is a target — Boots The Chemist and McDonalds will be receiving particular attention," the letter said.

"We also advise shop owners not to display posters advertising circuses planning to come to town, as action will be taken against any shops displaying these posters."

The letter then stated that individuals involved in cruelty to animals were also targets.

A spokesman from Wimbledon police station said animal rights campaigners were suspected of the crimes when they were reported, but this line of enquiry was confirmed only when he read the ALF's letter to the press.

"They aren't doing it for kicks, they are doing it for political motives," he said.

WIMBLEDON GUARDIAN - JULY

Hen raid farmer's threat to activists

A FARMER has warned Animal Liberation Front raiders: "If you come back I shall be here with a loaded shotgun."

But ALF activists say they will return, despite the warning from James Stanford, 80, who is furious after a Saturday night incident at his Coppins Farm in Molash, near Ashford.

The ALF took 83 chickens worth £250 from the chicken house at the 300-acre farm.

A spokesman said the raid followed information that the chickens were kept in appalling conditions.

Mr Stanford, who has farmed at Molash since 1938, said: "I don't know what they are talking about.

by DOUGLAS WYTHER

"The chickens are kept in regulation size cages and they are well cared for. We only keep five in a cage instead of the six we could accommodate according to regulations."

Mr Stanford runs the farm with his wife and two sons.

He said the ALF left the chicken house door open as they went, which meant chickens escaped and were found later, killed by a fox.

The trauma of the raid has upset the remaining 400 chickens, who have been put off laying.

Robin Webb, ALF spokesman, said: "The chickens we took are now all with good homes. We are concerned about the situation at Coppins Farm."

"Regulations in general relating to battery hens are inadequate. Coppins Farm is just one farm that is likely to get another visit."

The ALF also hit Wye College at the weekend and removed two piglets.

The spokesman said: "The college has pigs in various conditions but often not good. We shall be visiting again."

The college is investigating the incident.

Burger bar is attacked

AN ANIMAL rights group has claimed responsibility for smearing rubbish on a window of the new drive-in McDonald's in Northolt just days before its opening.

The Animal Liberation Front also struck at a Cancer Research charity shop, a pet shop and a butchers last week.

A McDonald's spokeswoman said the company was not aware of any attack on the new restaurant which only opened on Monday.

But police confirmed attacks had taken place on targets mentioned on an anonymous letter sent to the Gazette this week.

The Cancer Research shop in Ruislip Road, Greenford, had windows smashed and locks glued shut.

Greenford Pets, in Greenford Broadway, had its locks filled with glue and neighbouring Kirby and Son butchers had its windows smashed.

The West London branch of the group also made an unconfirmed claim, in a separate letter, to have taken "direct action" against the drug firm Glaxo by daubing paint on the side of a truck while a driver slept.

ALF spokesman Robin Webb said McDonald's killed "countless thousands" of animals every year. He said Glaxo was a legitimate target "because of their involvement in animal testing".

GREENFORD AND NORTHOLT GAZETTE - JULY

Vandals attack butchers

Vandals painted graffiti across the front of a Nuneaton butcher's during the early hours of Friday morning.

The words "meat is murder", along with offensive language and the initials A L F, were sprayed on the shutters of F J Betteridge butcher's shop in Edward Street.

On the same night similar words were daubed across the front of McDonalds restaurant in Queens Road.

Inspector Derek Smith, of Nuneaton police, said: "We are in the process of investigating the incidents and are treating them both as criminal damage."

NUNEATON (HA HA) AND BEDWORTH WEEKLY TRIBUNE - JUNE

Animal activists may be at work around Drayton

A cell of extreme animal rights activists could be at large in north Shropshire, it is feared.

The area has been the target of a number of sophisticated strike attacks by the Animal Liberation Front, claims a leading blood sports lobby.

The radical group - whose members correspond via drop boxes - last week claimed responsibility for a high-publicity raid on hunt kennels near Whitchurch.

Intruders grabbed six beagle hounds after cutting phone wires and ripping down iron bars at the isolated base of the Cheshire Beagles in Cholmondeley.

Just two months ago the same group admitted planting incendiary bombs at a pheasant farm at Sandford, between Whitchurch and Market Drayton. The attack caused £10,000 damage.

And in Chester ALF slogans were daubed on the windows of chemists and butchers in a night of vandalism.

MARKET DRAYTON ADVERTISER - AUGUST

Now a spokesman for the British Blood Sports Society says the proximity and knowledge needed for the attacks means culprits could be local.

"It would be right to assume they must be quite local. They knew where the hounds were, they knew where to park and which roads to use."

"They are very, very sophisticated. To get to the stage of cutting telephone wire means they are professional people out to do mischief," he said.

The spokesman warned the ALF would stop at nothing to get its rights message across.

The result meant law-abiding huntsmen and other sports people were taking more and more security measures.

"They tend to be prime targets because that is a very media grabbing thing to do."

"If they are that extreme does it mean a little old lady who enjoys the company of a budgie will also be under threat from bombs?" he added.

ARKANGEL COMMENT

This is the part of the magazine where you can say what you want. We try to print everything we can - providing it is to do with Animal Liberation, and is not intended to further some other aim - political or otherwise. Articles are reproduced in full - and do not necessarily represent the views of the editors.

Prison Reflections

by Chris Tucker

I would like to start by saying that for me, the fear of prison was much worse than the experience itself. Prison is seen as a punishment for our supposed crimes. However, the word punishment has all kinds of negative implications attached to it, especially designed to instill the 'fear' which for so long I had hanging over me.

In fact, is it not about time we regarded prison not so much as a punishment but as a sacrifice and turned a possibly negative ordeal into one which benefits us? Not just benefits us as individuals, but the movement as a whole. The conditions in the three prisons that I served my sentence in were better than I expected. The vegan food was extremely good, and the attitudes of other inmates and some officers was in general quite supportive. I received hundreds of letters during my imprisonment, some from children as young as twelve years of age, asking for my advice. I tried as much as I could under the circumstances to encourage those who wrote to remain strong and to continue the struggle.

In fact, imprisoning animal rights activists seems to make many of us more determined, not less so, even if the judge gives out ridiculously long sentences. The judge in my case gave me 15 months for allegedly throwing a smoke bomb into a McDonalds restaurant, even though the 'bomb' I was said to have thrown vanished at my trial. Apparently, the prosecution informed the judge that someone had stolen the evidence from the court the previous night, along with some cannabis due to be exhibited in another case!

Before sentencing, the judge said that I had a right to my beliefs but the public had a right to freedom of choice. It all sounds very nice and fair - surely, isn't that what we are fighting for, freedom? The judge however raised an important point. So many times certain national organisations (who admittedly do some good) say that once we've made the public aware of animal cruelty, they have a right to choose. Would the animals being murdered in slaughterhouses agree that they are dying fairly because of the public right to choice? The public have never had a right to choose whether to eat, wear, hunt or experiment on animals, it is not their life that has been taken and to say that they have a right to choice is a lie.

Lies! That is something the press seems very fond of, either lies or hushing up the truth. The highlight of my imprisonment was the news of the Grand National being disqualified, partly due to the antics of animal rights protestors, despite the press largely not reporting this fact. However, my jubilation was sadly short lived and was brought crashing down in a matter of hours with the death of yet another hunt sab. The shock was increased even more by the lies and vile squalid rubbish (putting it politely) that I read in certain newspapers concerning the hunt saboteurs.

How many more deaths do we need? The "Make My Day" piece in Arkangel 9 was well overdue, as not only is self defence acceptable, it is often morally wrong in my opinion not to defend ourselves. Naturally, however, at this moment in time feelings are running extremely high. I hope we as a movement never fall into the animal abusers' way of violence and hatred. Non-violence should also be seen as a strength, not a weakness. Morals apart, violence can never work, it breeds years of hatred and resentment not only in those that use it but in its victims as well. I would like to state however that although violence is an attitude as well as an action, I do not see how you can be violent towards property, if the attitude is one of love and concern for non-humans.

On a more cheerful note, a letter from a young American activist asked if animal liberation could ever be a reality. I wrote back and told him that for thousands of animals now been saved in this country and abroad, animal liberation has already happened and was a reality for them now! Yet why are most activists young? After the age of 30, it seems we have an invisible retiring age. Precisely because of the nature of our struggle, and on our side at least (so far) without violence or killing, anyone at almost any age can get involved. Remember, whether you are 16 or 60 (or older) YOU can support the ALF. The animals need you, (here I am encouraging people to join the ALF Supporters' Group and not, of course, to get involved in illegal actions!)

I would like to end by saying thank you to all those friends and supporters who sent me cards and letters of encouragement. They meant a lot to me and helped to break my feelings of isolation. When I went through an extremely depressed period, the letters showed that there were people who cared. If you end up making the sacrifice of prison, you will not be forgotten.

Footnote:

I have been asked to describe an event that occurred in my last months of imprisonment. At Highpoint Prison there was an ornamental pond with several large goldfish and hundreds of small ones in it. This pond was vandalised by inmates and the fish had to be removed and placed in a large tank where they were fed and generally looked after reasonably well. However, some inmates started to remove the young fish and place them in pickle jars in their cells. The jars were often kept in direct sunlight. Loud music caused violent vibrations in the water in the jars, and as well as the boredom the fish suffered, many were also not fed properly. Obviously, it was extremely cruel keeping goldfish in these conditions, like a prison within a prison. I was warned to keep my mouth shut and mind my own business and serve my time inside and wait until I got out before I complained. However, it is our business what happens to our non-human brothers and sisters. So I informed the prison officers that I wanted all the fish removed from the inmates' cells and placed back into the large tank, otherwise I would write to the RSPCA, animal rights groups and even the ALF (I did originally ask to have all the fish re-homed with animal rights people but this request was turned down).

Surprisingly, the prison officers did remove all of the fish from the inmates' cells and put them back into the large tank. Obviously I was not too popular among certain inmates and was labelled a 'grass' and was eventually attacked. I was placed in the segregation unit for my own protection, and eventually moved to a completely separate part of Highpoint Prison. Most of the other inmates, prison officers and even some animal rights friends said I should have kept quiet, and respected other inmates' freedom of choice, etc. Well, when animal rights prisoners are locked up they will never stop fighting for animal liberation. They can lock up our bodies but not our beliefs. To keep quiet would have been to betray the animals. They need men and women of courage to fight for them, not cowards and traitors.

All Publicity is Good Publicity?

by Martin Masterman-Lister

I would like to know if anyone, having read about an ALF action/scare, has ever said, "Since that raid I've changed my views on vivisection/meat. I'm now pro-vivisection and pro-meat and animal cruelty".

A few years ago after an ALF food scare, people that I worked with came to me to ask me my views on the scare. Although many people registered their disapproval of the action, not one said they would go out and buy more of the product as a direct result of the ALF action. On the contrary, some said they would boycott the product as they hadn't previously realised that the product was related to animal suffering.

So, the event had registered in their minds, perhaps in their sub-conscience, to lie there for years, but it was in their memory. I can understand animal rights supporters complaining that some activities are, as they see it, detrimental to the animal rights cause as a whole, but I regard these actions as a worthwhile exercise that gains publicity, if nothing else. So, please don't criticise actions before you have looked into the whole picture, including the subconscious thoughts of the public.

I wonder if any of your readers can think up any appropriate names to call McDonalds. As well as the standard McMurderers and McDeath, how about McMortury or McMegadeath (death of a million, quite appropriate). As for Burger King, well Murder King is too easy; mind you, remember what happened to some of the French kings? Now that would be very appropriate! Anyone out there with any other or better suggestions?

Report - The Brighton Vivisectors' Conference

This report is based on an account provided by "Black & White and Green"

The Federation of European Laboratory Animal Science Associations (FELASA) stirred up a whirlwind of emotions when they held their fifth symposium in Brighton in June.

The Animal Liberation Front (ALF) began a public awareness campaign to highlight the event by fly-posting several hundred posters around the town. Slogans included: "Lock Up Your Animals", "Watch Out, Vivisectors About!", and "Who's Making a Bloody Profit? Wash Your Hands and Bloody Stop It!" The council were given a seven day warning to cancel the event or suffer the inevitable consequences.

In a leaked letter to Brighton Council, dated December 1990, FELASA claimed that their concern was, "Welfare, and proper and humane use of laboratory animals." They were, "Established to improve an existing situation... making (their) contribution to laboratory animal welfare on an international scale... Papers will be presented... which will consider alternatives to animal-based research."

It would seem that Brighton Council was misled. FELASA lecture topics included: "Infectious Diseases of Laboratory Species; Animals as Models of Human Diseases; Genetically Defined Models; Logistics of Maintaining Rats on a NASA Space Shuttle; and Behaviour Studies and Husbandry."

Councillors were misled. The Council's Tourism and Resort Services Department officer, Mr W Burnett, claimed in a letter to a councillor that Dr Jennings of the RSPCA's Laboratory Animals Department was "planning to join FELASA", and had, "expressed the hope that Brighton (would be) able to host the 1993 conference." It must have been rather embarrassing for the council when Dr Jennings' denial forced them to make a public apology!

The conference was to go ahead regardless, so the ALF embarked on a campaign to spray slogans and red bloody hands on council property. Preston Park Manor, bridges over the main approach to Brighton, the Town Hall, shops and rubbish bins were all targeted.

FELASA issued a press release: "Doctors, vets, and medical researchers are united in the belief that animal research is vital to medical progress... 95% of doctors hold this view." Doctors in Britain Against Animal Experiments (DBAE) countered with a rather more truthful statement: "Animal models differ from their human counterparts. Conclusions drawn from animal research, when applied to human disease, are likely to delay progress, mislead, and do harm to the patient."

Claims and counter claims flew back and forth. Mark Gold's contribution pretty well summed up the situation; "If it (the conference) is concerned with anybody's welfare, it is the welfare of those who carry out animal research, in ensuring that they can persuade the public that their work can continue."

On Friday, 4th June there was a bomb scare at the Theatre Royal. Police patrols were stepped up around the city centre. The Corn Exchange, provisional centre for the vivisectors' dinner-dance, was cordoned off as a no-traffic zone.

On Monday, 7th June the ALF claimed responsibility for pouring creosote into a council-owned swimming pool, the cleaning of which proved very expensive. This incident gained considerable television coverage.

On Tuesday, 8th June the conference began. Over 100 delegates had withdrawn and gone home. A delegate complained that, "...we can't have a healthy dialogue with these people... they don't seem interested." ALF Press Officer Robin Webb offered them a public debate. They weren't interested!

On Wednesday, 9th June two protestors appeared in court on public order charges. Security was tight with twenty riot wagons stationed outside the police and law courts. Several fountains suddenly began to run red or start foaming, and the bowling green was creosoted. There were three more public order arrests. The Mayor, Deputy Mayor, and Councillors suddenly remembered that they had made previous arrangements and would not, after all, be able to attend the civic reception they had originally promised the vivisectors!

On Thursday, 10th June the dinner-dance was re-scheduled for the Brighton Centre for security reasons. Three rows of steel barricades were erected, police were drafted in from neighbouring counties, there were police motor-cyclists and more than twenty riot wagons. An "Eye-in-the-Sky" helicopter hovered above. Roads were sealed off. Police on the ground numbered several hundred. There were no more than fifty-five demonstrators that evening!

Afterwards of course, the usual people made the expected noises. Brighton MP Sir Derek Spencer called the demonstrators, "A collection of criminals who went up and down the country causing damage." He continued, "I think the cost of policing the conference was money well spent. We can't give in to people like that..." But perhaps when Sir Derek considers the matter a little more carefully he will realise that the enormous cost in terms of policing, security, cleaning up and disruption will be born by the people who vote him, and his councillor friends, into office - and the last thing they wanted in their town was a vivisectors conference!

The Vivisection Debate

David Lane's article "Who Cares if Vivisection Works?" in Arkangel 9 provoked a considerable response. We reproduce here three replies which seem to adequately cover the points raised. Apologies if your contribution isn't included. We sent David copies of all your letters and invited him to respond - which he did. His is the fourth article below.

Vivisection #1

by Chris Pedler (of ARK - Animal Research Kills)

As founder of the above named organization which campaigns against vivisection primarily on scientific grounds, I am writing in reply to the two articles, 'Who Cares if Vivisection Works?' and 'Just Say "I Don't Know?"' in Arkangel 9.

I would be the first to demand the total abolition of vivisection on moral grounds, even if it were possible for vivisectionists to prove vivisection as being of any value, and clearly to any sane individual the practice has no place in any society calling itself civilized.

However, for many the situation is not so clear-cut. From the early days of vivisection, when over 110 years ago the first laws purporting to 'control' animal experimentation were introduced, the moral and ethical arguments against vivisection have not only failed miserably to stop it, but have allowed it to expand from a few hundred animals per year in those early days, to over five million. The reason for this sad state of affairs is the almost exclusive use of moral arguments against vivisection.

Of course the anti-vivisection movement is composed largely of people whose main concern is for the suffering animals, but the unfortunate fact of life is that whilst people think that vaccines are beneficial, orthodox cancer treatments cure people, animal organs can be transplanted into humans, and so on, and that all medical advances past, present and future are a result of animal research, vivisection will never, repeat never, be abolished.

Therefore, it is not simply a case of "You choose your way and I choose mine," as many in the movement say, but that there is simply no choice in the matter. The pro-vivisection community presents the issue as a human health issue to the public by saying that animal research is essential for people's health. Therefore it is a human health issue, and has to be tackled as such, whether David Lane or anyone else likes it or not.

In short, the question posed - Who Cares if Vivisection Works? - when put to the vast majority, if not entirety, of parents with sick or crippled children will be a sharp reply of, "We do, * off!"

The 'Just Say, "I Don't Know?"' article goes on to suggest that there is a detrimental split in the anti-vivisection movement. If this means that there is a growing number of anti-vivisectionists who are awakening to the reality of the situation whereby the moral and ethical arguments not only do nothing to stop vivisection, but in fact allow it to expand - then I for one hope that Noel is correct.

He then says of Peter Singer that by revealing in an interview he knows nothing of whether animal testing is the only method of testing or not, he is merely admitting that 'the scientific area of the anti-vivisection argument is not his strong point'. Of course it should be the duty of Singer - who likes to be presented as a great champion of the animals - to know at least the basic arguments against vivisection.

The result of Singer's reluctance to reveal vivisection's invalidity as a method of research only reinforces the notion in the eyes of his readers that vivisection is useful. And human nature being what it is, the majority of those readers will be of the opinion that if those 'tests' are useful, then they must continue. However, whether his comments come as a result of ignorance or something else is of little consequence - the result is just the same.

Of course the case against Singer runs much deeper than is revealed in this article. For instance, not revealed is the fact that Singer and Tom Regan included in the latest edition of their book, "Animal Rights and Human Obligations" a full chapter in favour of vivisection by notorious monkey-head transplant Dr Robert White! Does Noel suggest that abolitionists work with people like Singer - who repeatedly gives credence to vivisection? No wonder vivisection has never been abolished.

Sadly this talk of "all work together" and "no infighting" is more damaging to the movement than many imagine. The bottom line is that it allows the not-so-sincere type of 'anti-vivisectionist' (of which there are unfortunately a great many), to lead the trusting masses anywhere they choose - which a close historical survey shows is just about anywhere but in the direction of abolition.

Vivisection #2

by William Samuel Purves

David Lane, in his article, "Who Cares if Vivisection Works?" in your issue No. 9, seems to miss the point of the medical arguments against vivisection, which are that it is a false methodology, a fraud. Doctors in Britain Against Animal Experiments (DBAE), which fights vivisection solely on medical grounds does so, not because moral arguments are of secondary importance, but because the multi-national drug companies in pursuit of profits, pseudo-scientists intent on protecting lucrative careers, and university vice-chancellors seeking grants, have proved impervious to any appeal for abolition on grounds of mere morality or humanity.

Hans Ruesch and DBAE would endorse every word of what David Lane says about the moral iniquity of vivisection, but the general public care little or nothing about the suffering of animals, particularly if they believe that such suffering might benefit themselves, and the drug companies and the media see to it that they do so believe.

I am in total agreement with what Alistair Mullan says in his article, "Forget Unity" in the same issue of your magazine. We do not want unity on the basis of a further 100 years of status quo.

Vivisection #3

by Alan Hood

I would like to reply to David Lane's article, "Who Cares if Vivisection Works?" (Arkangel 9, Spring '93). For years, people have been protesting against all experimental research which uses animals, and got nowhere. The placards "Rats Have Rights" and "Stop the Cruelty" have been waved about at demonstrations throughout the world. The vivisectors, the drug pushers and the media have always had a standard reply - "If we don't test on this mouse, your baby is doomed to die from (here the vivisector inserts the name of the disease which he/she is making money from). It is a known fact that a vivisector will always hide behind a baby. This statement from the vivisectors convinces the public that animal liberationists do not give two hoots about people. Then, when thousands of people suffer horrific side-effects from the latest "wonder drug" to come out of the vivisection laboratories the stock reply is, "We were only trying to save all of the lovely little babies. Anyway it's not really our fault. The drug worked on the mice. How were we to know that humans would react differently?" This is exactly the point. Humans are different to animals.

Vivisection is quite simply medical fraud. Due to the physical and biochemical differences between different species of animals, the reaction of one animal to a drug cannot possibly indicate how another species would react, yet the "scientists" still try to predict the human reaction from medical research. The simulated, artificial diseases given to laboratory animals are not the same as the human diseases. In fact the animals often only have the symptoms, not the disease. Animal experiments can be used to "prove" almost anything. For any drug there is usually a species of animal which gives satisfactory results. When the rats in Boots' laboratories had problems absorbing Pirenzepine, did the researchers make any changes to the drug? No, instead they found another strain of rats which gave results suggesting that it was safe, making a mockery of the whole idea of "safety testing". The real experimentation starts when the drug is passed safe for rats, mice, cats, dogs, rabbits, monkeys, etc. and is released onto the market, supposedly fit for humans. It is only after a person has taken the drug that the real effect on humans can be seen. After that, it is too late. Opren, an anti-arthritis drug was given to thousands of people before it had to be withdrawn. It killed 70 people in Britain alone, and another 3,500 suffered serious side effects.

There are many other such cases, too numerous to list, yet still the so-called scientists routinely torture thousands of animals every day. The reason? Profit. This is even more evil when one considers that "alternative" non-animal tests already exist. Unfortunately many people are too naive to realise this. They read the vivisectors' glossy brochures, their press releases and their advertisements and they believe every word. They believe that the sole reason that the vivisectors mutilate, cripple and dismember animals is to save lives. They forget that vivisection is a profit-motivated industry. So the public, with good intentions, pumps vast amounts of money into medical research charities, which then goes straight into the pockets of the "scientists". The public must be educated so that they can see through the lies and fraud of animal testing. The moral argument speaks for itself. Unfortunately many people seem, perhaps due to the process of evolution, to have lost their consciences, and will only do something if it benefits themselves. The grey area of morals and ethics, although a vital part of the argument is not enough. The anti-vivisection argument must become an argument based on science if we are to convince the powers-that-be to ban vivisection. This goal is achievable if we can show enough people that Animal Research Kills Humans.

Vivisection #4

by David Lane

In my article "Who Cares if Vivisection Works?" I clearly made the point that I want to see an immediate end to all vivisection. The suffering of countless millions of animals is my primary concern and so in reaching that position I consider the question of whether experiments on animals can or cannot benefit humans to be irrelevant - so far as the animals are concerned. I will however readily admit that the obvious harm done to a smaller (but very significant) number of humans is another reason why vivisection must be abolished. I also made the point that the tactic of using people's self-interest to frighten them away from their support of vivisection is perfectly legitimate and liable to be more effective than using the moral argument in most cases.

But I didn't really explain why I decided to write the article in the first place. I'll try harder this time!

My reason for being involved in the animal rights movement is the same as yours. I see animals tormented, hunted, kept in cages and concrete stalls, experimented upon, forced to perform stupid tricks, taken from their mothers at birth, and valued only for their utility to humans. I want it to stop. Animals are abused in many ways, many different things have to be done to stop that abuse, but there is only one struggle - and almost everyone in the movement knows it. I don't know personally of anyone who fights on a single issue; the vegan hunt sab pickets the circus, waves a banner at the anti-vivisection march, collects signatures for the anti-battery farm petition, and possibly even writes to Arkangel. An exaggeration? Well perhaps slightly, but you get the idea! Of course some people concentrate more on one aspect of animal abuse than other - it's just as well they do - would there be campaigns for the abolition of angling, or against leather and fur otherwise?

Ever since I first became involved in the A/R movement I have been distressed by the endless back-biting, condemnation, and accusations of treachery and infiltration that sometimes appear to be tearing the movement apart. The first local animal rights meeting that

I attended disintegrated over the question of whether cow's milk should be available for teas at the next jumble sale, and shortly after, a certain (long-departed) LACS guest speaker confined his speech to an attack on the ALF at the group's Christmas dinner. And things haven't improved much since then; who remembers when Arkangel was banned from the Living Without Cruelty Exhibition?

We manage to put up with a lot of this kind of nonsense though - we probably get used to it. Recently however, I've read some things which have caused me more serious alarm and which prompted me to question the "scientific anti-vivisectionist" position in my original article (can I use "SAV" for short?).

I have in front of me newsletters of two of the leading "SAV" organisations, CIVIS and SUPRESS, and they make worrying reading - and not because of harrowing accounts of vivisection - they have virtually nothing to say about animals. The sixteen pages of CIVIS Report No. 14 are devoted almost entirely to attacks on people and organisations. Let's take a random dip inside...

Did you know that Peter Singer's mother is a medical doctor and "brain-washed" him from infancy? Or that he has been engaged in a twenty-year plot to promote vivisection? Richard Ryder is a former vivisector, and Dr

Vernon Coleman apparently used to push "pills and dangerous therapies" before committing the unforgivable crime of advising Sun readers to join the BUAV! And what about Reverend Andrew Linzey who once wanted to fight vivisection with prayers? The Langleys - Doctors Gill and Christopher - were both trained vivisectionists, and Christopher was actually a member of the British Medical Council! (My God! I hope they never find out that I dissected a fish in the third year... I can see the headline now, "David Lane - Vivisectionist").

But these attacks pale into insignificance when you discover that no less than ten pages are devoted to the "sellout" of Jean Pink, founder of Animal Aid. This ten-page editorial by Hans Ruesch also includes scathing attacks on NAVS and BUAV personnel, past and present. (Still, it is "Hans Ruesch's CIVIS" after all, so I suppose he is entitled to a lengthy editorial.)

So what's behind all the muck-raking and vitriol? Well, it's no secret; Hans Ruesch tells us, "CIVIS discovered long ago: that the precise assignment of those who sit at the summit of the big AV societies is to keep vivisection going, by suppressing all information about its banefulness and all the works that reveal it, like 'Slaughter of the Innocent'..." Is this paranoia, or what? If Jan Creamer's an infiltrator then so am I, and I'm not!

Now I'll turn to the SUPPRESS newsletter. The Spring 1991 issue was passed to me in response to my article so although it is dated I feel a response is justified. This newsletter actually comprises of just one article entitled, "Animal Rights: The Suicide of a Movement". In contrast to the CIVIS literature, here the reader is presented with an argument. No names, no digging up of murky pasts, but again there is the claim that the big AV organisations are deliberately trying to perpetuate vivisection. This article attempts to prove that "99.9%" of the whole animal rights movement is (perhaps unwittingly) propping up vivisection - in fact, the very existence of an animal rights movement is supposedly exactly what the vivisectionists want! Here are some extracts...

"Animal rights people do not pose a threat to the foundation of vivisection, and thus, they represent the kind of token opposition the biomedical empire can very comfortably live with."

Then the notion of animal rights is ridiculed, "...it is absolutely hopeless to try to invest animals with 'rights'..."

After all, where do the rights of animals stop?" Everything must be in terms of the rights of humans... "...issues involving animals are all human rights issues." So it follows that, "The abolition of vivisection must be demanded as protection against disease, death and financial ruin, because human beings have the right not to be murdered and/or robbed."

And why shouldn't animals be used for food? This is what we're told; "The abolition of using animals for food, again, must be demanded on the right of human beings to be protected against disease, death and financial ruin." (Let's see if I've got this right - we're supposed to persuade someone not to eat fish, not because it's bad for the fish, but because it'll give the person a tummy-ache or an overdraft.)

For some reason the writer even attempts to inflate the scale of vivisection by claiming that "factory-farming and vivisection ... consume 99.99% of all animals" between them. (Somewhat doubtful if you think about it, but we know what he means!) Since about 200 times more animals are "consumed" by the food industry than the vivisection industry, a more detailed breakdown looks something like this: Food - 99.49% of animals used; Vivisection - 0.5% of animals used. Amazing what you can do with statistics isn't it?

So how do we abolish hunting, zoos, fur coats or circuses? We're told, "The abolition... must be fought on the well-known fact that violence begets violence." And of course these activities cause, "untenable psychological torture to... human beings" who have to witness the atrocities, and "...human beings have the right to be protected against (such) torture." Just a minute! Animals ought not to be abused because some humans don't want them to be abused? Follow that line and we'll soon be discussing ethics, perhaps even Animal Rights!

The article finishes by claiming that most "animal rights", "animal protection" and "anti-vivisection" organisations have been infiltrated to an "incredible degree", although by whom is not stated, but once more the aim of the infiltration is apparently to ensure that vivisection continues unhindered.

So the SUPPRESS article can be summarised as follows: The primary concern is human health and human wealth. Animal rights diverts our attention from the biggest threat to humans, namely vivisection, but if you're concerned about animals being used for food, sport, or entertainment don't worry - these things are all bad for you too - so they'll have to stop as well!

In the past, I've often been accused of "missing the point" about vivisection, the point being that vivisection is a medical/scientific/establishment fraud. "Of course we care about animals, but it's the fraud that matters," they say. I could reply that of course I care about the fraud, but it's the animals that matter. The fraud is perpetrated against you and me. The agony is suffered by the animals. And I do know about the fraud. In 1977, my son nearly died minutes after birth. His oesophagus (food pipe) hadn't developed properly and he was choking to death as saliva began to fill his lungs. His mother had been prescribed progesterone to prevent miscarriage. No-one told us that the American Food and Drugs Administration (FDA) had deemed progesterones ineffective for that purpose three years earlier. No-one mentioned either that two years earlier the FDA warned that, "...pregestational hormones should not be used in early pregnancy for any purpose. Such use of these sex hormones may seriously damage the foetus..." Congenital abnormalities, including oesophageal defects, had already occurred in Britain, but no-one bothered to tell us that either. Sixteen years later my son is fit and well, and I have nothing but contempt for an industry which pushes poisons for profit to an unsuspecting public.

I want to end with a few points that have occurred to me, and if any "SAV's" intend to write in response to this article, perhaps they could help me by addressing them?

I've been told many times that, "Animal experiments have never worked, and never will work." That kind of statement is fine if you believe that vivisection is solely concerned with the testing of drugs - but it isn't! Weapons research using live animals is vivisection. Animals are shot, blown up, poisoned, burned, irradiated and gassed in the pursuit of "better" weapons. Are you telling me that if a pig is shot with a new design of bullet it will tell nothing of what it would do to a human? And when General Motors used pigs in "crash tests", were they stopped by claims of "scientific unreliability" or moral outrage? And when the USA and USSR spent billions of dollars and roubles launching dogs and monkeys into space was it done for the perverted pleasure of the scientists or to find out whether humans could survive in an unknown environment? I deplore all these activities - but if vivisection is the "use of live animals for scientific research" then these are examples of vivisection. Someone will probably argue that none of these examples predict exactly what would happen to a human, but that is not the point. If a new bullet explodes every time inside the pig instead of passing straight through then it'll probably do something similar to a human. If one shape of steering wheel causes pigs more severe internal injuries than another then it is likely to be more dangerous for humans too. If cosmic rays passing through the space capsule don't harm the monkeys or dogs, they probably won't affect humans either. These are not certainties, but you try telling the perpetrators that they have learned absolutely nothing... Perhaps the key point here is that these kinds of vivisection are unlikely to invoke the public's self-interest - the "SAV's" sole means of getting them abolished.

The second point is prompted by the CIVIS literature. I want to know why is it impossible to believe that someone who once experimented on animals or who practised conventional medicine is able to "see the error of their ways" and become opposed to vivisection? Are you also suspicious of vegans who once ate meat? And mightn't an ex-Master of Foxhounds prove invaluable to an anti-bloodsports organisation, or is it a case of once a hunter always a hunter?

My final point concerns the "SAV's" paranoid pre-occupation with infiltrators and conspiracies. Not only is the entire animal rights movement apparently misguided, it is being deliberately sabotaged by an evil bunch of ex-vivisectioners who are probably in the pay of the medical establishment. So here's a thought for you. If I were the "Animal Abuse Establishment" this is what I'd do to destroy the opposition: I'd set up an organisation and ensure that its philosophy was human-centred and unsympathetic to the plight of animals. It would have to have a narrow focus such as vivisection to enable it to attack the aims and tactics of the remainder of the movement. It would need a charismatic leader to attract "followers" who follow not question. And finally it would attempt to discredit anyone who appears to be in a position to influence the movement. Tongue-in-cheek? Mischievous? Of course! I don't subscribe to conspiracy theories...

I said at the outset that I am opposed to vivisection in all its forms, and I have nothing but respect and admiration for anyone who fights for its abolition. Providing, that is, that they do nothing to damage the common cause - the end of animal abuse in all its forms. I've appealed for unity before. I do so again.

Violence Not the Way

by the "Band of Mercy"

The issue of violence and the endangerment of human 'physical wellbeing' has recently returned to the debating tables of the animal liberation movement. This has come about because of the revival of the Animal Rights Militia (ARM). The Spring 1993 issue of the Animal Liberation Front Supporters Group newsletter informs us of two recent ARM actions. Firstly, the now infamous Christmas contamination action taken against Boots' stores in the South of England; and secondly the planting of an 'intricate explosive device' within Birmingham University in late February.

The reaction of the movement so far, in general, has been one of open condemnation. Especially as the ARM's policy seems to have changed since its rebirth and they now, besides targeting individual animal abusers, are also targeting those who support animal abusers financially. One would assume that the logic behind such a policy change is that the animal abuse supporters are guilty of animal cruelty by association - in the same way a person who buys and wears a fur coat is guilty of association with those who killed the animals in the first place, and a person who shops in Boots is guilty of association with those who vivisect for Boots. In both cases the associate is providing the financial means for the continuation of animal cruelty. The justification behind the use of ARM type tactics is that in the short term the endangerment of physical wellbeing obtains results.

In 1986, in Australia, the 'Brisbane ARM' managed to have millions of pounds worth of meat destroyed after they claimed a major contamination action against the meat industry. The contaminant in this action was claimed to be rat poison. But as the Brisbane action showed (as other similar actions have shown) there was a public outcry with condemnation coming from all quarters. Yet despite this condemnation, these actions, that risk harm to human well-being, continue. In America, in November 1988, Fran Trutt was arrested for carrying a remote control for detonating some explosives, and two weapons were later found in Fran's New York apartment. She was sentenced for attempted murder. Many people, following Fran's sentence, thought that would be the end to the issue of violence. Yet it wasn't.

In 1990, in England, two car bombs exploded under the vehicles of the vivisectors Margaret Baskerville and Patrick Headley. Neither of these vivisectors were hurt, but in the Patrick Headley incident, a young child was injured by flying shrapnel. Again these actions received widespread condemnation from both outside and within the movement. The hostile feelings towards 'animal rights campaigners' at the time was so great that a number of local people felt they could no longer remain calling themselves 'animal rights' groups and changed their names to either animal concern, welfare or protection. Following the explosions anyone who admitted to believing in 'animal rights' was suddenly labelled a militant terrorist who went around trying to 'blow up babies' - an image that still hasn't truly left the animal liberation movement.

Now, with activists who advocate violence, no one can question their dedication to desiring the end to animal abuse. It is clear that anyone who is prepared to face so much condemnation must be totally committed to the animal liberation cause. However, we MUST question, in the long term, will violence achieve its wielder's intended aims? Certainly the short term result is that of some spectacular economic sabotage. The image of a burnt out car on the front of all the newspapers is most certainly a hard hitting picture. But what of the long term effects? To understand this we must examine the specific effects that certain actions will bring. To do this, we shall examine the consequences of three possible scenarios. These scenarios are;

- 1) The assassination of a vivisector.
- 2) The poisoning of goods derived from animal abuse.
- 3) The armed hijacking of a lorry.

The first scenario, of an assassination of a vivisector, seems to be a popular concept with those who support violence. Indeed upon the announcement that it wouldn't be until 1988 that a European ban of cosmetic animal testing would take place (and even that, thanks to Britain's Baroness Denton, may now not happen) it was suggested that the current 'non-violent' tactics for achieving animal liberation are too slow and that it was time for 'dead vivisector number one'. But say a vivisector was shot, what would the results be? In the short term, following the assassination of a vivisector, a climate of fear would arise within the vivisectors' quarters. There would also be a wholehearted condemnation of the actions and some centralist groups would claim 'the anti-vivisection movement has been set back fifty years'. This would of course not be true and would be highly self defeating, yet it always happens. But what of the long term effects? Well, one could theorise that overall the movement would receive a bad name (again) and we would be able to recruit fewer members. Also, one would imagine, the climate of fear within the vivisectors' quarters would soon turn into that of a siege mentality and make them even more resolved to torture and murder innocent animals (which of course would be nothing new). But the main long-term effect, as we have already stated, would be a reduction in the gaining of new recruits (plus the fact that activists, when caught, would face longer prison sentences which might even be used by the state as show trials).

The second scenario we shall discuss is that of the 'de facto' poisoning of goods. The contamination of goods, whose subsequent use could harm the physical well-being of the purchaser, would also receive widespread condemnation. We could expect the usual hysterical reaction from the centralist groups who would claim, with some unfounded quote, that the movement has been set back a number of years. But despite that, the short term effect would be the destruction of thousands, maybe even millions, of pounds worth of goods. However, the long term effects could be even more harmful than the assassination of a vivisector. With any poisoning campaign the organisers run three risks (besides the obvious one of being caught that is). The first risk is that the claim won't be taken seriously and the selling of contaminated goods takes place. The second risk is that some of the contaminated goods may be missed and they are subsequently sold. The third risk is that the police may deliberately under-react (as they have done with the I.R.A. bomb threats before now) claiming that any warning was not concise and deliberately misleading. Thus the authorities may well allow an incident to occur to discredit the animal liberation movement and justify an overkill clampdown. LET US MAKE NO MISTAKE IN THIS POINT, if any member of the public is genuinely harmed by a contamination action the police would use it as a perfect opportunity to perform an overkill. Every known animal liberation campaigner, hunt sab, prisoner supporter or whoever, would be rounded up for a show trial. Regardless of these peoples' innocence, they will be issued with long prison sentences. In the aftermath of such an action, and egged on by the state-run media, the public would be so hostile towards 'animal rights' that convictions would be guaranteed. Thus fewer campaigners would be 'out on the street' and new recruits would be hard to find, and an overall smaller movement would emerge.

The third and final scenario that this paper shall be looking at is that of the possible results of performing an armed hijack. We can take it as read that there would be widespread condemnation of the action, but besides that, the short-term effects would be of the companies having their insurance policies go up and they would be forced into employing extra security guards to ensure the safe passage of their vehicles. Thus an armed hijack would appear to be a good form of economic sabotage (drivers may also cease to work for an animal abuse company, fearing for their physical well-being). But in a prolonged campaign of this sort, the authorities would very quickly set up the use of decoy lorries containing armed marksmen/women. Already we have seen a situation where one member of the Wickham Four, at the time of their arrest, had a rifle placed to their head. And very recently when an alleged A.L.F. activist was arrested in Northern Ireland, the arrest was performed by eight armed R.U.C. officers. So it is not inconceivable that such strong-arm tactics will be used again and surely they must.

But back to the scenario. Once the decoy lorry had been intercepted by the hijackers, the authorities would have no hesitation in shooting the activists DEAD! The S.A.S. has already shot a number of suspected I.R.A. members dead, in similar decoy manoeuvres, so we could expect the same thing to happen to animal liberation activists. If animal liberation activists were shot, there might be a public outcry with some opposition M.P.'s calling for a public enquiry into the shooting (as has happened whenever the S.A.S. have shot members of the I.R.A.) but the overall result is the same; dedicated activists would be dead.

So, this discussion paper has shown, the use of violence can, we feel, only lead to a recruitment problem; a smaller animal liberation movement; longer prison sentences; a Government clampdown on the animal liberation movement and even the possibility of dead activists.

Is that really going to help the animals?

No Compromise

by Rabbix

Let me start off by saying that I am an abolitionist. Speciesism and the destruction of our planet are wrong. Like many others, I want to see Speciesism abolished. Yet there is an alarming trend within the movement, at the moment, that shies away from such feelings. In the last issue of the S.A.R.P. newsletter its editors announced it had failed. Failed because rather than making people angry about animal abuse and wanting to FIGHT for REAL change, all they had managed to really do was to sell a load of T-shirts. People in the movement today seem to be wanting compromise rather than real change. Take the General Motors/Vauxhall campaign. Was this a success or failure? Most people would say it was a success. I SAY IT WAS A FAILURE. Look at the facts. At the end of 1992 EVERYONE was taking part in the anti-G.M. campaign. Local groups, national groups, A.L.F. cells, P.E.T.A. in America, European groups such as our friends in the Sweden Djurens Befrielse Front. Absolutely EVERYONE. The movement took on a major car company and change, started to occur. The barbaric 'crash tests' involving animals were stopped. "Excellent. Great result!" I hear you cry. But what about the toxicity testing? Has that also stopped? Oh no, that goes on. "Well it's the law," the car company cries. "Don't worry about that. We have a good compromise!" the national groups shout. Good? Good for who? Good for the budgets of the national groups? Yes! But is it good for the animals still being poisoned in the 'toxicity tests'? NO! Do we really want to be part of a 'movement' that puts money before lives? The fact was, we had them on the run. But rather than 'going in for the kill' and forcing them to press for a change in the law (and if there had been a change in the law ALL the car companies would have followed suit for fear they would be the next to be targeted) we let them off with a "compromise". WE LET THE ANIMALS DOWN: WE SOLD OUT. ANIMALS STILL SUFFER AND DIE AT THE HANDS OF GENERAL MOTORS AND IT IS OUR FAULT. But at least some people are happy FOOLING THEMSELVES that it was a victory.

Recently in The Vegan (Summer 1993) Doctor Robert

Garner states that the "fundamentalist view is misguided" and will not work. He states we cannot say it's an "all or nothing" situation and change comes gradually. This is true. It is better for a goldfish to be kept in a large tank than in a pickle jar (some animal rights prisoners will know what I'm referring to there - Chris, what you did was the right thing and I salute you for it). Okay, ideally we would want the fish to be returned to the sea/river. But if that option is not available it is better to have the fish moved to a large tank, rather than leave them in a pickle jar. But we must not lose sight of our real aim, ANIMAL LIBERATION. Yes, okay, get to the half-way stage AND THEN press for the full way. But we must ALWAYS press for the FULL change. What we must not do is be 'bought off' by compromises. We must ALWAYS aim for the abolitionist stance, for if we don't then what? Compromises on the compromises? IF WE REALLY WANT ANIMAL LIBERATION WE HAVE TO KNOW OUR AIMS. WE MUST FIGHT FOR THOSE AIMS. AND WE MUST STICK TO THOSE AIMS.

"No more compromises. No more lies. Every six seconds, an animal dies!"

"If YOU don't act, then YOU condone...If YOU don't fight, then YOU don't win".

Stop the Nightmare Journeys to Europe

by Lillian Buckner

This trade in misery and suffering has continued unabated for 25 years due mainly to public apathy. It was halted for a brief period in 1973-75, then the M.O.A. gave assurances that with the resumption of the trade in 1975 conditions would be improved. The situation hasn't changed. The RSPCA has a damning dossier on the shipment of animals across Europe. In all these years the situation has never improved but has worsened markedly.

A recent newspaper article suggested that new rules were planned to end the cruel treatment of animals being shipped to the continent and that maximum times would be set for feeding, watering and rest, the number of animals which can be carried, and the types of vehicles and standards of vehicles. Apparently there are going to be different time limits for different species; that is, pigs will get less time before feeding and watering intervals, lactating cows will get 12 to 15 hours, but sheep will be forced to travel for 24 hours before feeding and watering after which they will continue their journey. If and when these so-called improvements come into force they will be of no benefit to the millions of animals concerned. It's a con, it's a cop-out. Rules and regulations to control suffering are totally unacceptable as they are nothing more than excuses for perpetuating this trade. Rules and regulations will never eliminate the fear, terror, stress and brutality. What rule will stop the appalling suffering of animals incarcerated in these hell-wagons in searing temperatures? The sickening journey from Perth to Spain remains the same. The animals are not in a position to appreciate such niceties as 'design of vehicle' and 'non-slippery floor'. We must ensure they are free from fear, pain and terror.

This trade is one of callous indifference and brutality. Terrified, exhausted, hungry, thirsty and injured animals are kicked and beaten, pulled and thrown from high ramps. They are poked with sharp instruments, electrically goaded or dragged by their tails along the floor. Battering, bruising and brutality are all part and parcel of this revolting trade. If and when these new regulations come into being, thousands of calves will still be shipped from such places as Gloucester and Sturminster Newton to be incarcerated in the cruel veal crates of Holland or Belgium. Many of these tiny creatures are imprisoned at only 7 days old, then at 6 months they can barely stagger to their deaths.

A video taken undercover earlier this year at Sturminster and other markets showed the appalling treatment meted out to calves before they start their harrowing journey to the continent, not to mention the treatment of the other animals at markets. Many thousands of animals are brutally slaughtered in front of one another. They are suspended by one leg while the slaughtermen callously slit their throats. Many animals struggle in vain for two minutes afterwards, often helplessly trying to raise their heads. The British raise them, the British transport them and ship them to the continent and all this is sanctioned by the British Government. As long as the British people sit by and do nothing it will continue. We in the animal rights movement are the voices of these animals and we must make ourselves heard. We must continue to inform the public of the atrocities committed so casually, through leaflets and videos that are available. But most importantly we hope every group throughout the country will start their own campaigns against those involved in this filthy trade. It is evident that unless more pressure is brought to bear we will not see an end to the trade in this century or the next.

N.O.W. will be co-ordinating a nationwide campaign against the hauliers of live exports. We are looking for a sustained campaign of peaceful pickets throughout the country. We hope that animal rights groups everywhere will support this campaign. I believe the poet Benjamin Zephaniah's message of support to N.O.W. at the National March and Rally in London in May sums up the whole issue of the trade in live exports, "What kind of people can hear the animals crying and say they feel no pain? What kind of people can witness thousands of animals dead on arrival and claim the transportation of these animals is humane? What we are fighting for is not just the rights of animals, we are fighting to save the world from a 'Human Beings Rule OK' society, a new world order where nothing matters unless you make a profit. The issue of the transportation of animals is as important and as relevant as the transportation of those who were called slaves. That is why I support N.O.W. and its struggle to ban live exports and this is why I appeal to all of you here today to keep up the fight and to use all reasonable means to achieve our goal. If this does not work we will use any means necessary."

Tony Benn MP, speaking on TV recently on another issue said, "History is made by ourselves, not by the great and good." We must fight against injustice to those unable to defend themselves. We must ensure this trade belongs to the history books.

Boycott Boycotts?

by Stephen Dobson.

It seems to me that almost every month I see a leaflet demanding that this company or that company must be boycotted. It is not only the animal rights movement which seems to be obsessed with boycotts at the moment. Environmental and other world-changing groups have also, in my opinion, poured far too many resources into campaigns centred around boycotting.

A major criticism of the principle of boycotting must be - how far should it be taken? When I first became aware of the extent of animal exploitation by some companies, there seemed to be a perfectly simple solution - do not buy products produced by those companies until they change their policy on animal rights. Easy? It seemed so until I began to find out that many of these companies were so big that they owned many other smaller companies, as well as many brand names. I now found myself in the position of having to not only boycott the original company, but also its brand names, subsidiary companies, and indeed their brand names. (Nestle has over fifty different brand names, not including L'oreal and their products which it also owns.) This would still have been relatively easy had it been only one company which exploited animals. However, all of the major multinational companies are guilty of animal abuse, as are many of the other reasonably sized companies.

I think that my biggest problem in trying to separate the good companies from the bad ones was that I was looking at the whole issue from the narrow perspective of the animal rights movement. Surely when deciding whether a company is ethical or not it is necessary to consider the damage that company is doing as a whole - how it treats the environment, its workers in terms of decent pay and working conditions, does it exploit animals, does it support human rights violations, does it support the arms trade, etc.? It became more and more obvious that the world's problems were not simply the result of individual companies with bad investments and unethical policies, but the whole money system based on capitalist notions.

The same principle which legitimises vivisection and the meat trade encourages company bosses to exploit workers through low wages and dangerous working conditions, and that principle is profit before and above anything else. Capitalism needs this principle to survive and surely this is why those in society with little power, be they human or animal, get such a bad deal.

It is this holistic notion which makes boycotts a totally useless weapon in the struggle for change.

This idea takes me back to my original point - that is, how far should boycotting be taken? Why should we bother to boycott one arm of capitalism in the form of say, Unilever, when we buy our baked beans from Sainsbury, which is simply another arm. Are we then to buy from neither Sainsbury or Unilever, nor from any shop mentioned in the many ethical consumer guides? This would be difficult as all products within the money system are tarred with the same brush, that is, they help to ultimately maintain the capitalist system - the system which encourages profit above anything else, and therefore the abuse of human and animal rights. This is as true if you spend your money at the local health food shop or at Asda. It might make you feel better not shopping at Asda but does it change anything? A good... (unfortunately, the last line of the first page of Stephen's photocopied text wasn't reproduced - so you'll have to guess this bit!) ...are directed straight back into campaigning work on a wide variety of issues. This is of course great. However, to make the burgers cheap enough to sell, the burger mix has to be bought from a company big enough to sell cheap mix. This company is by no means sound, so to follow the logic of boycotts, the co-op I work for should be boycotted. Presumably the only reason why it is escaping a boycott is because there are bigger targets at present. Does this logic make sense? Can the whole system ever be boycotted even if millions more people want to?

Another major fault with boycotting is that, not only doesn't it do any good, it actually does harm in that it reinforces the capitalist system. It does this by transferring the profit margins from one product to another. It allows companies to create the illusion of compassion without making any real changes. Any choice within the present system is a win for capitalism. There are many examples of this: The first boycott campaign I became aware of was organised by the Anti-Apartheid movement against Barclays Bank. As the story goes, Barclays eventually decided to disinvest in South Africa. It is unclear whether this as a result of the boycott campaign or not but, all in all, it turned out to be a very shallow victory. It soon became clear that Barclays had stopped short of complete disinvestment in South Africa, and also, whilst the campaign had been running, the biggest winners were the other three big banks who picked up Barclays dissatisfied customers - and quietly got on with their own amoral investments.

Ironically, at that time I tried to do the ethical thing and put my money into a building society. I later found out that, of course, the building society was owned by Barclays Bank. The whole campaign against Barclays focused on the single issue of apartheid. It did not address any of the other ethical problems linked with Barclays and, of course, when the boycott was called off, Barclays was seen to have been cleansed and it was once again acceptable to bank with them.

Another good example was the campaign launched by an environmental group entitled, "Don't buy your fish from a butcher". This called for a boycott of certain brands of tuna fish because the tuna were being caught in massive drift nets which also trap and kill, amongst other things, dolphins. The single issue here was cruelty to dolphins. Not once did anyone mention the plight of the tuna fish. The clear implication was that it is acceptable to kill tuna fish, but not dolphins.

Who cares about Tuna?

A final example is the recent campaign against General Motors concerning the use of live animals in crash tests. General Motors now say they no longer do this. This is, of course, good news, but the boycott has now stopped and we must assume that GM are very pleased to be considered an ethical place to shop again. Presumably GM will not now be producing thousands of un-needed and unwanted cars to further pollute and destroy the planet, presumably at all of the factories owned by GM the workers are treated with dignity and respect? And how many thousands of people all over the world are going to be killed by cars made by GM?

All boycotting can do is, firstly, infer that companies not being boycotted are all right, and secondly, give those under scrutiny a chance to make tiny cosmetic changes and then be accepted as ethical companies.

Whilst this article might seem very negative, it is not meant to be that way, and I also want to say that I do not want to see lots of people rushing out to McDonalds to buy a large coke. I simply do not want to see people putting money and effort into campaigns which I believe can never work. At the same time, there are certain restaurants I would never eat in and certain shops I would never shop in. I don't like them, don't feel comfortable in them, and don't want to have anything to do with them. At the same time I don't believe this will bring about their downfall. I am not trying to get people to dilute their hatred of big companies. What I am trying to say is that big companies are indeed evil and disgusting - but boycotting is no way to fight them.

It would be nice to end this article with an easy solution to a difficult problem. I am unable to do that - which is perhaps another problem with boycotting. It looks like the perfect solution - if enough people do not buy this or that, then the financial effect will force change. The problem is, we all have to live, we all have to buy things to survive, and all we do by boycotting is give our support to a friendlier face of the same evil system. Easy solutions can only solve easy problems and that is why they do not solve the problems people face when striving for a better world. It is too big a problem to be solved in such a simplistic way. We should be looking for ways to actually cost big companies money and profit, rather than helping to displace profit from one company to another. But to get into that argument would be to advocate illegal acts...

A popular saying used to be that animals don't need bigger cages or longer chains - but no cages and no chains. All boycotting can do is lengthen the chains and widen the bars on the cages. We must want more than that?

Arkangel T-Shirts and Postcards

Arkangel sells a very limited range of merchandise. The money raised helps to support the magazine and our other activities.

T-Shirts

Three different designs are available - the pictures from the covers of Arkangels 5, 7 (as shown here), 8 and 9. Both plain and tie-dye versions are normally available. All are available in XL only, and cost £6 each.

Postcards

A set of three 'Surimpressions' postcards, produced from photographs donated by French photographer and animal protection campaigner Brigitte Jacques. Prices are: 35p each, 3 for £1, 50-99 cards 20p each, 100-499 cards 15p each, and 500 cards or more 12p each. Please add 25p p&p for orders of less than 50 cards.

Order from us at Arkangel, BCM 9240, London WC1N 3XX. Please make cheques payable to 'Arkangel'.

Be Careful!

by Annette Tibbles

Richard and I have just sat through our four week trial and hope to pass onto everyone some of the information we have come across. This is not intended to be a scare story, but to help us better understand the way that the police treat animal rights. If you asked a person on the street, "What do you think the police spend their budgets on?" most would say that the biggest expense was the IRA and murder cases. Few would guess that in some parts of the country the next area is animal rights! However, there is a special unit working out of Scotland Yard, called the Animal Rights National Index (ARNI). Their task is to gather large amounts of information on individuals. When, during our trial, it became clear that they were doing a much better job of it than we had ever imagined, I decided to try to establish their sources of information and how they use it.

So far, the police have indexes, vehicles and telephone numbers. It is quite shocking to find they have 21,000 names on the index. Each person's sheet runs like this. Name, address, date of birth, schooling, job, phone number, other numbers such as passport and bank accounts, aliases used, physical description with updates if it changes (ie. haircuts), contact with police, sightings on demos or hunts, people standing next to the subject or travelling together, vehicles registered to subject and other vehicles driven, associates and friends, membership of organisations and past record of convictions.

Obviously, the more contact the police have had with you the larger the file. But the more active you are, for instance sabbing, demos and friends involved in campaigning, the more likely is the chance of them having something on your file. They use this information to build up an idea of who knows who and how strong their involvement is. So the areas we should be particularly careful about are addresses and vehicles. Perhaps go through your address book and rewrite without using surnames and area (s.t.d.) codes. That will confuse them if they ever get their hands on it! If you can, use hired vehicles on demos and register your car at a different address, or better still all use the same address. Another area to be careful about is the type of literature you keep in your house - if the prosecution holds it up in court it takes on a completely different perspective.

During our court case they used household items - plastic bottles, sellotape, candles - to try and say they could be used to make incendiary devices. It shows you how single minded they can be, not to see the innocence of these things. Be wary of new people asking stupid questions, and be aware that whenever you join an organisation the police know about it, from BUAV to ALFSG. Another area is telephones, houses and cars - treat them as bugged. I sincerely hope that this helps people to build up a healthy paranoia. I am not intending to scare people into stopping going to demos or any other activities, but I hope this gives us a better understanding of how intensely the police are acting out their Big Brother role. And I pass the message on to everyone - be careful.

Apathy Kills

by Sam Remington

Have you ever thought of time in terms of animals lives? If you don't I'd guess it's about time you did because the party games are over. The clock ticks on as the silent suffering continues. Are you prepared to resist the persecution? Or will you simply witness it as if it were a tragic play and only shed tears to make up for your own inactivity?

Let's face it - apathy and self-importance deny animals the freedom they deserve time after time but when will it stop? Is Special Brew and rave your idea of taking responsibility for the crimes perpetrated by our own race? Are those who 'don't feel as strongly' merely adopting the easy route and lifting the burden on to someone else's shoulders? Is 'doing your bit' a hangover impaired effort at the occasional demonstration? I think not because animal liberation is about action and not having a laugh at the animals' expense.

There are also those who see fit to support one liberation cause and fail to incorporate the emancipation of animals alongside it. They know who they are and they are only kidding themselves. People often prefer to switch off from the horror, but as Cassius Clay once put it, "You can run but you can't hide." Many may regard my attitude as over-the-top but let's put it this way - if apathy was non-existent I wouldn't have had to bother with this article. The fact is however, organisations such as SARP are threatened with closure as a result of this stupidity and many more will undoubtedly follow unless we pull together and act.

To finish off, I ask you, is it acceptable that those who care are behind bars while those fortunate enough to possess their freedom waste it doing next to nothing? How much longer will this sad state of affairs continue? Their future is in our hands and we can change it. We don't need any more excuses, we know who the enemy is so let's act and fight.....NOW!

We've discovered a leak."

Animal Rights and the Easy Option

by Black Sheep

Campaigners for the rights of women and of the ethnic minorities in this country have got to be admired for the progress they have made in their respective causes. Of course, they'd be the first to point out - and I'd be the first to concede - that they've still got a long way to go; but what they have already managed to achieve, in the old, hard struggle to open/change minds of the 'great British Public', is nothing short of phenomenal, especially when you consider the relatively short time-span concerned.

When I was growing up, in the 60's and 70's, it seemed that little had advanced on those fronts since the time of the abolition of slavery and women getting the vote. Black people were still regarded as alien and inferior; women were thought of as being next-to-nothing (completely negligible outside of their 'traditional' roles as 'chattels'). These atrocious attitudes were not only perfectly 'respectable', they were the norm.

By the end of the '80's, however, things had changed a great deal for the better, thanks to the campaigners. By this time, it was the people who held those views who seemed to be in the minority - alien, primitive and 'negligible'. The change in attitudes had been so marked that further, far-reaching legislation came unavoidably.

As I've already pointed out, I'm very much aware that these causes haven't by any means reached the ends of their roads yet. Prejudice is still disproportionately strong where it does most harm - particularly in the workplace, government and the most deprived levels of society. But it's still not a bad distance to have covered in twenty or so years. What have we in the animal rights movement managed to achieve in that same span of time?

Exactly.

It can, of course, be argued - and with good reason - that the comparative success of the 'equal rights' movements has more than a little to do with the fact that they are campaigning for the rights of fellow human beings. Fighting for women's rights, it could be said, will automatically get half the population on your side - and no-one in this country is seriously going to argue back, any more, that there are 'grades' of human beings who merit different grades of treatment.

Convincing human beings (by which I mean junk-cultured, McDonalds- munching, scientist-worshipping Konsumers) that other species are worthy of equal respect is a much harder task - especially when (and this is another point of difference) to do so means them having to make a large number of personal, practical, fundamental changes to their lives; what they eat, what they wear, what they buy, who they trust to deal with their health, and so on, as well as what jobs and businesses they should allow to exist.

Nevertheless, I believe that looking at the campaigning strategies of these movements can teach us a thing or two about how to go about things, especially in that we have 'twice' the job to do.

The most important lesson we can learn, it seems to me, is a political one: work from within. No group (unless it has an army behind it) can change society from an isolated position 'outside' of it. It's no good occupying the moral high ground and trying to persuade people they should come up and join you. The equal rights movements made sure that the moral high ground was set up everywhere - in the media, the office, the factory and the home; they forced people to face the issues, talk about them, make their choice and made them feel like social lepers if they got it wrong.

The Animal Rights movement has 'tried' to do that, but in such a wishy-washy sort of way that its effects have been far weaker than should have been the case. We have also, in my opinion, made several mistakes which have made sure that the issues have never reached deeply enough into the British social 'psyche' to be 'un-ignorable' in the same way that sexism and racism are.

The equal rights movements managed to achieve this because they realised they had to be deliberately 'populist'. Now, before you reach for your guns, I want to stress immediately that by Populist I do NOT mean the "don't upset anyone" compliance and compromise adopted by so many of our 'Nationals'. I am talking about its dictionary definition: "claiming to represent the whole of the population".

The equal rights campaigners NEVER had the mental attitude of people who hold a "minority belief". They worked on the assumption / knowledge that their causes were self-evidently right to the vast majority of the population and deliberately set out to 'corner' everyone into admitting it. They did this by bombarding us with the issues, encapsulated in jargon, until everyone was forced to face them and decide where they stood. That way, the fact that it was their opposition who were in the minority was highlighted and emphasised, to the point where it was they who became isolated, and hardly dare open their mouths.

One of the main ways in which they managed to do this was to use the old trick of labelling and pigeonholing - for which we have always been suckers. Each of the movements managed, as outlined above, to encapsulate their issues into an easily swallowed form: the buzz words "racism" and "sexism". They repeated the words to us ad nauseam (even to those who sympathised), but in reality they were quite readily accepted by the ever-lazy British public as the easiest of tools with which to pass on the message to others. How many times did you hear an argument actually concluded with the magic words, "Oh, that's just sexist" or "You're just a racist."

The fact that these labels were weighted with pejorative associations of, respectively, women-hating / sexual insecurity and Fascism / genocide meant that everywhere (and I mean everywhere) such arguments took place, the conclusion of the argument was already decided before it took place. Out with the magic words and the opposition are left with nothing further to say, except to feebly try to deny the label.

These simple words managed to do the job because the use of them manipulated certain common characteristics of people within this society: laziness, the taboo factor, fear of non-acceptance, etc. Pretty soon, the herd were all following this lead; few daring to contemplate disagreement. The introduction of these words even managed to oust a few old ones from the thesaurus. It may not seem much on the face of it, but when a movement can actually alter the language, it is a sure sign that it is really getting somewhere.

This use of words is a strong weapon, but it is also indicative of the strong position of the groups who used them. What I've described above could never have been done by any movement whose supporters were seen to be apart from the society they were trying to influence. I believe that, although our cause does have the potential, fundamental sympathy of the majority, our arguments, issues, jargon (Richard Ryder's buzz-word "speciesism/specism") and associated taboos (death camps, holocausts, etc.) have not reached a similarly influential and all-pervading acceptance because we have got ourselves into the position of being perceived as isolated and apart - a fringe concern.

I think there is, specifically, a danger at present of our movement being 'swallowed' by - and being seen to be 'just another part of' - the 'alternative', pagan, New Age counter-culture, call it what you will.

I know that a lot of our support comes from this quarter - and I'm not by any means denigrating it as a movement in its own right - but I still think it's a big step in the wrong direction. There's nothing wrong with this alternative culture - who knows, it may be a blueprint for a much better world, one day, but one day is the operative phrase.

If we want radical change as quickly as possible, then we've got to influence as many people as possible. That way, the decision-makers are either influenced in their turn, or they are by-passed. It's as simple as that.

The alternative culture's principles may be spot on, but their power to influence is nil. This is probably because they don't want to influence, they just want to be left alone to live as they wish. They want to separate themselves from society; we cannot afford to, for the sake of the animals. We are in the business of conversion, not opting out.

Thus, in the here and now, I don't think we can afford the luxury of being identified with an amorphous, aimless body who, if they survive at all, will have no real sway for many, many years to come; and who, in the meantime, have proved to be a ready target for media scorn and general fear and/or contempt among the people we're trying to change or activate.

I'm afraid, boys and girls, it will mean dropping the uniform: the matted mohicans, the hair dye, the big boots, the torn and dirty battledress, the facial jewellery and all the other unimportant trappings that just make people laugh or curl their lips. The public are always on the lookout for the easy option and, if - in their eyes - you just look like some negligible, penniless freak, then they'll treat you like one; a very good excuse not to bother to listen to what you've got to say.

I'll give you some examples:

Our local A/R group recently tried the Boots till protest as described in Arkangel's recent LBAG article. We split into two sections. The first went in dressed fairly ordinarily - not unlike many of the customers there. The reaction to our protest was good - shocked, but very respectful and almost apologetic, as if to say, "Jesus, these are our customers turning against us!" The second group went dressed as they normally do, in the New Age uniform. The reaction was predictably different - "Bloody troublemakers", "Haven't seen those types in here before", "Who gives a shit where a few scruffy Travellers pretend to spend their dole money". First group go in again, and we're back to 'stunned and respectful'.

Similarly, someone who runs a regular city-centre information/fundraising stall recently told me that he had been 'helped out' by a similar bunch of uniforms. He was grateful for their help at first, and he didn't want to piss on the bonfire of their enthusiasm, but finally had to tell them to go because the number of people who came near the stall while they were there (and consequently the funds he was trying to raise for re-homing) dropped right through the floor.

Trivial? I don't think so. Nor is it trivial to bear in mind that wearing a uniform makes the police's job of controlling us at demos that much easier. Those of you who were at the Boots demo in Nottingham last November may remember the police trying to let the customers into the main branch of the store, while keeping the protestors out. Only one protestor managed to get in. No prizes for guessing what he was dressed like. Then there's the hunt saboteurs. Would their reputation as violent class-hating thugs (thus keeping down their support) stick for five more minutes if there were a few more tweed coats out there?

Expressions of 'individuality' (if only!) are one thing, but if your vanity means more to you than the animals, then perhaps the nose-rings are more appropriate than you think.

It has to be said that another way in which we have alienated ourselves is the way in which we have handled direct action.

To begin with, we have two main types of direct action; one is the liberation of the animals themselves, which has, by and large, the support of the public. The other is destruction, which definitely does not. It's the second kind I'm talking about here.

When I'm doing my bit among the public on stalls or whatever, I am still getting the monotonous responses, "Are you the ones who poison babyfood / blow up doctors / burn chickens alive?" True or not, mud sticks and the excuse for the easy option is pounced upon once again. The animals become forgotten because it's far easier to talk about terrorism - "we know what to think about that..." "Nothing you have to say can be of any value because you are a racist/sexist" or whatever, can easily be applied to "terrorist" too. Same "end of discussion".

It is true that many movements (including equal/women's rights) have had to use direct action in order to get their causes noticed in the first place. But once the cause was on the political agenda, they had the sense either to drop it or use it with very great care.

In my opinion it's largely a question of scale; the number of people/actions involved. Either everyone does it, or no-one should.

If you can guarantee that the action will be large-scale (riots, for example), then fine, because large-scale actions involving lots of people smack of civil disobedience and revolution, which naturally frightens the crap out of the Powers That Be. If, however, all you can manage is small-scale actions involving just a few night-stalking activists (no matter how many of those actions may be taking place separately) then forget it until such time (if the time comes) that you know there is no other way left open to you.

On a small scale, it just isolates and ends up as a self-made trap. It allows too many 'easy option' reactions from the public, the press and especially the government; "It's just a few extremist nutters", "We will never give in to terrorists", blah, blah. A good excuse to dismiss the entire A/R issue - just as the IRA provide the perfect excuse to not even consider the 'Irish Question'. Indeed, it seems that terrorism has become the 'Irish Question'.

To conclude. If the Powers That Be care about anything at all, it's about the behaviour of the mass of the ordinary, voting, consuming public. They treat them with contempt, of course, while they behave themselves and put up with it. But nothing frightens them more than when the worm threatens to turn (witness the poll tax riots). Perhaps what we need are a few more actions on the scale of the ALIU, but with the intentions of the ALF. I wonder what the reaction would be to, say, fifty people (looking like ordinary, respectable, voting consumers of all ages) storming a Boots lab, taking the animals and trashing the place, on account of Boots' policies of animal torture and danger to human health? In broad daylight and in front of the press? The next time, somewhere else, there might be 5,000.

I realise that some of the things I've said here aren't likely to go down well, but all I ask is that you give them some thought. Whatever we do, we must remember that it is absolutely essential that we get through to as many people as possible. And, if the message isn't getting through, then maybe it's the messenger.

DONATIONS.

We are extremely grateful to the following people who have made a donation of £4 or more to help us to produce and distribute this magazine:

McCartneys Join Campaign to End Whale Slaughter

PRESS RELEASE.

Paul and Linda McCartney, their band and crew, have pledged to support a campaign to end the barbaric slaughter of pilot whales in the Faroe Islands during their NEW WORLD TOUR, which begins in Europe on September 3rd 1993. They were so disgusted by the cruelty and torture inflicted on the whales that they asked to show Environmental Investigation Agency (EIA) footage of the whale slaughter in a 15 minute video at the beginning of each concert. The Pilot Whale Campaign is run by the EIA, the Whale and Dolphin Conservation Society (WDCS), and the World Society for the Protection of Animals (WSPA). For further information on the Pilot Whale Campaign please contact Gillian Stacey on 071 490 7040 or Hilary Cross on 071 793 0540. Photos and film available.

Don't Be So Superior!

by Zo!

I'm a new subscriber and Arkangel No 9 was the first mag I'd seen. I was depressed by most of the individual articles and encouraged by most of the news. So, for people like Alistair Mullan, this is how I got to Arkangel. The story starts twenty years ago; two things happened: First, I noticed that the climate was changing. Second, I started washing every bit of glass and foil and recycling it. For ten years nothing much else happened. When you get to the end of the week and the cupboard has nothing much in it except jam and flour until the next wage packet there is not a lot else you can do. It's an unfortunate fact but you need cash as well as interest to get involved in campaigns.

Around ten years ago, we finally got into a more secure financial position and I started joining groups. At first it was the high profile ones like WWF, FoE, RSPCA and the like. Reading the magazines etc. from one group led to the names, addresses and areas of interest of others. I also saw some groups work mentioned on TV. The turning point was about two years ago when I joined BUAV, and from them, CIWF. These two organisations changed my life. I simply stopped buying anything tested on animals and I started on the long road to cut down on (and perhaps eventually cut out) meat (the spirit is willing but...). Since joining those two, I've joined others like the Vegetarian Society (as an Associate Member) but I have to say that if I had joined the Vegetarian Society first I doubt if I'd be as committed as I am to trying to give up meat. The reason is that I found reflected there a view that I see also in some articles in Arkangel No 9, namely the assumption of a very unattractive moral 'superiority' by those either already vegetarian or vegan or involved in direct action, or both. The attitude is one of "us" and "them", "we" being the enlightened activists and "them" being the apathetic and ignorant public. So, I have to ask you, what do you want? If you only want to be involved with those already committed how are you ever going to succeed in what you say that you want, and if you show such contempt for those who still don't know the truth, how are you going to 'convert' them? I'm not altogether happy about all the activities of some of the groups I support. Where this is the case, I write and tell them but I also think their work of gathering and distributing information is vital.

If I were able, there are some things I would like to get more involved in. I'd happily fly-post Boots and McDonalds and consider taking more drastic action about a local battery chicken farm. I'm less happy with some of the things ALF activists do. Apart from anything else, I think they are often counter-productive. I can point to my own experience and say that BUAV and CIWF have been effective - can you say the same about smashing the windows of Boots shops? Apart from putting up insurance claims and causing annoyance to the management, can you say that this has actually convinced one single person not to shop at Boots, and after you took the mice out of the lab how long do you think it was before they had more mice and were back doing their filthy business?

There is a case to be made for direct action; for disrupting hunts, for example (if you are brave enough); where animals are suffering now. I can see the temptation to stop it by raiding labs - but it's not the answer in the long term, the only answer is to get public opinion on our side and to change the law where necessary - by using every means to get the truth out. I don't think of myself as being very special but when I found out what they don't want me to know, I stopped being 'apathetic' as your contributors put it and acted - and I believe others will do likewise. Meanwhile, even the most committed have to live in the real world with the rest of the 'sheep'; I see that Arkangel banks with the Co-Op, who sanction 'medical research', so even you have to 'compromise' if you wish to put it that way.

Animal Liberation Investigation Unit Report

Wednesday, 27th January, 1993

Fifteen activists of the ALIU conducted inspections of factory farms and an abattoir in East Sussex. All activists carried a 'statement of intent' and followed a strict code of legal and peaceful conduct. The aim was to gain photographic and video evidence of any breach of the little protection farm animals have by law in this country.

Battery Farm - Polgate

As soon as we arrived, the owner threatened us with a plank of wood and was accompanied by a worker carrying a hammer. Undeterred, activists attempted to gain entry to two units, assuring the now threatening and abusive owner that we would only be a few minutes. Two women were physically thrown out of the unit and down slippery steps. Meanwhile, other activists entered an adjacent unit and managed to get some footage of the filthy and inhumane conditions. The owner then tried to attack an activist who was videoing; attempting to hit him over the head with a plank of wood and had to be physically restrained by another activist. His daughter and friends then turned up, as well as some workers from the Sussex Bacon Company who have their depot at the same site, and we left. It is now apparent that they managed to take the number of our vehicle and called the police. We are taking steps for a private prosecution against the man for threatening behaviour. We observed a vast area including a small stream completely polluted by chicken slurry - way beyond what we believe to be legal - and we have informed the water authorities who have promised to take action. This farm was raided by the ALF in 1991 with the rescue of 64 hens and considerable damage was caused to vans and buildings.

Hailsham Meat Packers

This abattoir in the middle of Hailsham town is only small and advertises a 24 hour casualty collection service. Unfortunately, as soon as we arrived we were spotted by a worker who was in the process of skinning a dead sheep. Footage was taken of offal bins containing legs of animals, etc. Another worker came out and both threatened us and slammed back their gates. We rushed around the corner to try to enter the other entrance; again we were stopped. However, after a comparatively reasonable conversation with one of them, he said we may be allowed a visit but couldn't give permission himself as the owner was in hospital after cutting himself. This will be followed up.

Egypt Farm & Cowbeech

This is a large chicken and pig farm owned by Ross Foods Ltd. Access was gained to a pig unit and footage was taken of the pigs incarcerated there. No bedding was available to the pigs (surely a bit of straw isn't too much to ask for).

They had to contend with freezing conditions in a barren concrete environment, destined to a horrific death in a slaughterhouse. Photos of these poor creatures will be sent to Linda McCartney to show the misery animals endure from a company that profits from her name.

Battery Unit - Polgate

All the doors were padlocked, so access could not be made. It was now dark and a missile was thrown or air gun fired by the owner.

Broiler Unit - Polgate

Entry was gained to two deep litter broiler units, and photographs and video footage were taken of the thousands of chickens held inside. Many were showing signs of defects; for example, weak legs, with some barely able to move at all. However, such barbarity seems to be within the law. On the way home at around 7pm, we were stopped by a police 'prison' van and two squad cars. The police were very threatening and demanded answers to a constant barrage of questions of our recent whereabouts. When asked why we had been stopped they implied we may have been horse molesters! Then they arrested our driver for failing to show his driving licence. However, after explaining just what we had been doing and giving them a statement of intent they became friendly and reasonable. They de-arrested the driver and we went home without further interruptions.

Thursday, 25th February, 1993

Eighteen activists from the ALIU conducted an inspection of animal abuse centres in Sussex. At the Queen Victoria Hospital, East Grinstead, the group entered the Blonde McIndoe Institute buildings to gather evidence of research. One group entered through the front whilst another climbed onto the roof. Animals that were known to have been held in this animal house had been removed. However, photos were taken of documents relating to cancer research on rats.

Fur Grove Farm, Cross in Hand, East Sussex, is the main office site for Porcellus, who supply rabbits, rats and guinea pigs to labs across the country. One group entered the animal units, the other tried to enter the offices - but they were locked. The group managed to gain entry to a house holding guinea pigs despite the threatening behaviour of two workers. Video footage was taken of the battery-style cages and their occupants, many of whom suffered bald patches and foot sores. Sealed plastic bags were found to contain dead rabbits and guinea pigs. Harlan Porcellus - whose parent company is the international laboratory suppliers, Harlan Olacc - own several sites in East Sussex and the activists planned to inspect another at High Hurstwood, but drove straight past as they were observed by a Porcellus worker.

They then went on to Mayhew Chicken Processing Plant, an abattoir employing hundreds of workers, in Uckfield, East Sussex. Activists crossed a field to film chicken transporters being unloaded whilst others entered a building to photograph and video bins full of dead animals, and workers hosing down bloodstained machinery. A security guard allowed a token activist to inspect the building and useful information was gained. However, whilst the remainder waited outside the main entrance for this person, four police cars suddenly appeared and the group were arrested on suspicion of causing criminal damage at the Cross in Hand plant earlier in the day. No caution was given, and nine of the group were ordered into their own van which was commandeered by the police. One activist demanded to be arrested properly and was taken away in a police vehicle. All were driven at dangerous speeds, narrowly avoiding three accidents, with police vehicles front and back flashing their lights and sounding their horns. They eventually arrived at Eastbourne police station, a distance of over 40 miles, and were accompanied by a police helicopter for most of the way. Meanwhile, another police car and riot van appeared at Mayhew to search for the other ALIU van (long since gone from the area) and this resulted in two other vans - who had nothing to do with it - being pulled by the police. On arrival at Eastbourne, the activists were held for 45 minutes in their own van. Eventually they had their names and addresses taken, and were de-arrested when the police conceded that no damage had been caused at the Cross in Hand site. ALIU have reported details of the farcical police operation to their solicitor and action will be taken for wrongful arrest, and compensation sought for inconvenience and the misuse of the groups' petrol.

Friday, 26th March, 1993

A group of twelve ALIU investigators entered the premises of Froxfield Farms Ltd based near Alton, Hants. Froxfield is an animal breeding unit - breeding rabbits, ferrets, guinea pigs, mice, rats, etc. for laboratories. They will also perform surgical operations on animals for specific orders from laboratories. The site was larger than expected with several buildings remaining un-inspected. However, one large shed contained a large amount of ferrets. Investigators entered another shed containing several hundred rabbits of assorted colours and sizes. A door to the shed beyond this one was open, and revealed yet even more rabbits. Whilst there, an animal technician entered the shed holding a box. He was unperturbed by the small group of people and while going about his business of dropping rabbits into cages he answered questions about the ages of the rabbits entering and leaving the establishment. A film showing the handling of the rabbits has revealed that the methods were incorrect and this will be investigated further. Investigators were appalled by the barrenness of the cages, with no bedding or solid flooring on which the animals could be comfortable. Very loud music was being played - obviously to help the technicians ignore the suffering of these rabbits.

Next was a visit to the infamous Cottage Kennels in Misingford, Wickham, now called Garetmar. They applied to the local council, and were granted, a licence to keep 50 breeding bitches and 100 pups for sale at any one time. Building work is in progress. Lots of junk cars, bikes, etc. still remain at the back of the property, and larger older dogs were in small concrete runs with small 8 week or younger pups. The visit ended abruptly when the investigators were chased by three workers wielding sticks. Do they have something to hide?

CAMPAIGNS UPDATE

MCLIBEL UPDATE

by the McLibel Support Campaign

As McDonalds tries to silence its ever more numerous critics, two unwaged London Greenpeace supporters are defending themselves against the Transnational Corporation in a major libel case.

On the legal side: Helen and Dave have had half a dozen High Court hearings already this year alone, some involving a day and a half of legal argument between themselves and McDonalds barristers, and observed grimly by the company's UK Vice President. McDonalds, with court collusion, is trying to maintain a huge cover-up by refusing to hand over relevant documents and answer questions about its practices. Meanwhile, the defendants have served 65 witness statements, 30 of them from experts on the relevant issues - nutrition, health, environment, workplace conditions, animal welfare, etc. At the last hearing on the 29th July, the provisional October trial date (for a 5 week trial) was scrapped and left open-ended, the judge complaining that the case was 'getting out of hand'.

On the campaigning side: local anti-McDonalds protests continue to grow, and in a few towns there are now weekly protests outside their stores. We thank supporters for the dozens of letters sent each week, and for the messages of support and donations from a wide range of groups and individuals, including from abroad. We are sorry if replies are delayed - we get swamped with the amount of work to be done. The 'Free Speech Pledge' is now catching on. This is an essential part of the campaign in solidarity with Helen and Dave, but more importantly to show McDonalds and the legal establishment that attempts to suppress free speech will backfire by being met with co-ordinated opposition and mass defiance. If your group hasn't yet signed the pledge, please do so now! (The best way to defend free speech is to exercise it). For street leafletting against McDonalds, you can buy leaflets in bulk from Veggies (0602 585666) who have printed up to a million leaflets in the last 6 years! Together we can beat McDonalds, and the oppressive libel laws. See you at the demo!

Worldwide Anti-McDonalds Day (Weekend) Protests on Saturday 16th October. National Demonstration on the 16th - London, Euston 1pm (March through Central London). (Also: Friday Oct 15th 4.30pm-6.30pm picket McDonalds Euro-HQ, East Finchley Tube, London). National meeting of the campaign, Oct 30th, 4pm, at the London Greenpeace Fayre, Conway Hall WCI.

CAMPAIGN AGAINST BOOTS THE VIVISECTORS

by the London Boots Action Group

Since the last issue of Arkangel there have been some very important developments in the campaign against Boots. By now, most people will have heard that the company has had to withdraw its new heart drug Manoplax, which was intended to be its main money-earner for the next decade. Manoplax had been developed over 14 years at a cost of over £100 million. The world market for this kind of heart treatment is estimated at $2 billion per year and Boots were hoping the drug would earn them £100 million per year by the late 90's. But even in the early stages there were problems: in one experiment the drug had different effects on cats and dogs (such variations between species are all too familiar to anyone who examines vivisection). Yet instead of being cautious the company went ahead with human trials before the animal tests were completed - perhaps indicating that they knew the results from the latter were so unreliable that they had to use 'the real thing'?

It was reported in The Pharmaceutical Journal last year that 'one early trial found more deaths in the treated patients than in the placebo group'. Side effects that have been observed with the drug include: headache, dizziness, palpitations, tachycardia (abnormally fast heartbeat), symptomatic hypertension (low blood pressure), nausea, vomiting and diarrhoea. In April 1993, just seven months after the drug was released, Boots announced that 100mg doses of the drug had been withdrawn after preliminary results from a clinical trial suggested that patients with severe congestive heart failure taking this dose each day had a 'significantly increased risk of death compared with those not receiving the drug'. Initially the company put on a brave face and said they would go on producing the drug at lower doses, but eventually they bowed to the inevitable and in July Manoplax joined the long line of drug casualties. Immediately speculation started that Boots would pull out of the drug business altogether. Manoplax was their first major pharmaceutical product since Ibuprofen 30 years ago and although the company tried to assuage doubts by announcing that four new drugs are in the pipeline, drug development has become so risky and costly that it is difficult to see how such a relatively small business can survive (Boots Pharmaceuticals ranks only about 50th in the world's largest drug companies).

Other companies have been suffering recently too: Medeva, one of the success stories of the 80's saw its share price halved in July; Wellcome has suffered since it was revealed that AZT, its 'treatment' for AIDS, has not fulfilled its promise; Fisons has scrapped one of its two most promising drugs; and even the giants of the industry - Glaxo and Merck - have been in trouble as governments try to cut the cost of their spiralling drug bills. Boots' announcement on Manoplax came just a matter of days before their AGM in London. Last year a highly successful picket was held and a similar one had been planned for this year, with an important difference! About 15 animal liberationists had each acquired a share in the company which allowed them to gain entrance. The meeting took place in the plush surroundings of the Queen Elizabeth Conference Centre in Parliament Square and we entered in small groups so as not to arouse suspicion. After taking the lift to the third floor we entered a huge hall where about 500 of the shareholders were sitting. On the stage were seated all the directors, with Sir Christopher Benson, company chairman, chairing the meeting. Benson began by outlining the company's performance in the previous year. He mentioned the Manoplax disaster, which he said was 'disappointing', but skirted over the issue by saying the future of the pharmaceutical division was assured with four new drugs being developed - for obesity, schizophrenia, maturity-onset diabetes and arthritis. Then questions were taken from the floor, which is when things began to hot up! The animal liberationists were scattered in small groups throughout the hall and one of them was immediately chosen. He said that the failure of Manoplax proved how dangerous vivisection was and asked for details of the numbers of animals used. The chairman was clearly ill-prepared to answer the question and after denying animal testing was unreliable passed it to the chief executive Sir James Blyth. Amid howls of protest he declined to state the number of animals used on the grounds that it would be 'too emotive', but said that about £10 million of the £100 million spent on research was used in animal studies.

For the next hour and a half the questions continued. It soon became apparent that the chairman was avoiding anyone who looked young and instead picked elderly shareholders whose queries ranged from the trivial ("what was being done to stop shoplifting") to the irate (many were upset at the pay rises the directors were awarding themselves whilst share prices were falling). Each time a question on vivisection was asked it would be fobbed off with "We have already dealt with that" or "This meeting does not listen to animal rights people". Other stereotyped replies included the usual - all animals used are well treated and Boots would rather not do animal testing but are required to by law. As the meeting went on, the heckling, jeering and cries of "answer the question" increased. The chairman was losing control of the meeting and threatened to remove any 'animal rights people'. One protester stood up and shouted out that he was being deliberately ignored by the chairman and asked whether the latter would like to make a public apology to all the families of those killed by Manoplax. He was met with a bewildered silence. The majority of the shareholders were hostile to us, shouting out "Not again!" and "Chuck them out!" A few, however, were sympathetic and one who said he wasn't 'an animal rights supporter' even demanded to know how many animals were being used. The questioning did illicit one astonishing response from Sir James Blyth; he said that Manoplax was only tried on humans after it had shown a positive reaction in animals. To him this seemed to indicate that animal experiments were worthwhile! To us it shows just how misleading and dangerous they can be. Eventually the animal liberationists were dragged out shouting from the meeting to applause from the shareholders.

Outside there were over 100 protestors leafletting and carrying huge banners. Next day the newspapers were full of the story, several with eye-catching photos. The whole demo was amazingly successful and put further pressure on the company. Since the Manoplax disaster there has been increasing speculation that Boots will sell off their pharmaceutical division to the highest bidder. It's reckoned to be worth about £500 million.

What now for the anti-Boots campaign? What we must not do is to let up the pressure by thinking we have already won. It is by no means certain that Boots will stop producing drugs. The business employs 7,800 people, including 2,200 in the UK, and although profits were down last year they still made £108 million. Set against this is the huge cost of actually getting a drug on to the market (reckoned to be over £160 million). According to the Independent on Sunday: 'Boots has already paved the way for disposal of Boots Pharmaceuticals by separating it from the two other drug businesses, Boots Healthcare International and Boots Contract Manufacturing. BHI makes products which can be sold without prescription such as Strepsils. BCM manufactures on behalf of third parties. It is thought that these two businesses would be retained whatever the fate of Boots Pharmaceuticals'. Therefore, even if Boots sells its prescription drugs business, it may still retain other drug operations and so may continue animal testing. Or perhaps it will cease testing itself and pay a contract laboratory such as Hazleton or Huntingdon Research Centre to do so on its behalf. This will be of no reassurance to the animal liberation movement - we will not be satisfied unless Boots stop testing completely. Until then the boycott campaign and demonstrations will go on.

SEARC V SEALINK CAMPAIGN

by South East Animal Rights Coalition (SEARC)

Pressure is mounting on Sealink as more groups all over the country carry the campaign against them into their home town, using the SEARC action pack. Groups include those from Hastings, Deal, Plymouth, Northampton, Fleet in Surrey, Warley in the West Midlands, Dover, Ropely in Hampshire, Frinton-on-Sea in Essex, Ealing (and other London areas), Liverpool, Cambridge, Stourport-on-Severn, Chipping Norton in Oxfordshire, York, Maidstone, Horsham in Sussex, Bishops Cleeve, Bromley, Folkstone, Whitstable and Herne Bay. The prime purpose is to encourage people to sit down at a campaign stall, write a short letter of complaint to Sealink, and post it in a mock posting box on the stall. The monitoring of animal transporters is being extended by our information officer, Ronnie Lee, who is busy enlisting volunteers willing to note down vehicle licence numbers at ports. This information is used to establish names and addresses of hauliers with a view to boycotting the goods carried by them on return journeys from Europe.

Several SEARC groups have expressed an interest in becoming involved in a combination of one-day events, to be held over a nine day period in 1994. The demonstrations would take the form of a pilgrimage, over a route from Trafalgar Square to Dover docks, with a silent march, similar to the effective procession at Dover in July, to be carried out at major towns en route. A number of groups are currently being canvassed for their interest before a decision is made. Any SEARC group wanting to be involved by working with others to organise an event should contact the SEARC office. Meanwhile, local groups continue to demonstrate every month at Dover: A poster demonstration took place at the entrance to Eastern Docks, Dover, on bank holiday Monday, 30th August and again on September 25th. For more information phone 0424 730154.

Brighton FELESA Campaign Booklet:

Link Publications have produced a 24 page booklet, including 15 photographs, detailing all of the many SEARC, ALF and other organised actions against the Federation of European Laboratory Animal Science Association's fifth symposium on welfare and science (vivisection), held at the Brighton Conference Centre in June. £1.25 inc. p&p... 'it is riveting reading and shows what local groups can do' - quote from A.R.C. newsheet, Issue No 14, August 1993. (Also see report elsewhere in this issue.)

STOP PRESS!

Captain Ian Farquhar, Master of the Beaufort Hunt, was given a conditional discharge and ordered to pay £4,000 court costs after being found guilty of allowing the entrances to badgers' dens to be blocked with heavy clay. Farquhar was taken to court by the RSPCA who pointed out that he had breached the 1992 Protection of Badgers Act. As a result of the action the National Trust has banned the famous Beaufort Hunt from its land.

ANIMAL RIGHTS PRISONERS

Arkangel gives its full support to animal liberation prisoners, and up until now we have given details of names, locations and prison numbers. From now on we will only mention the names of those in prison and ask people who wish to make contact with prisoners to write to the ALF Supporters Group for up-to-date information. This is because Arkangel is produced less frequently than the ALFSG information and can be out of date by the time you read it, and so this change is for purely practical reasons.

Please write to the ALFSG, BCM 1160, LONDON WC1N 3XX.

Prisoners at the time of going to press are:

Terry Helsby : On remand.

Viv Smith : 6 Years.

Annette Tibbles : 4 Years.

Rik Scarce (in the USA) : On remand.

Free Magazines

It has been, up until now, the policy of Arkangel to send out free copies of the latest issues to all those groups and organisations featured in the magazine. However, this can no longer be the case due partly to the fact that we cannot afford it (Arkangel only ever has enough money to print and distribute the magazine) but also because of the lack of response from the groups/organisations receiving them. We had hoped it would encourage many of them to subscribe! This, sadly, has not been the case. We are, however, very grateful to those groups who do subscribe and to the national societies who exchange their magazines with ours. Having said that, we felt insulted, to say the least, by Jan Creamer of the NAVS who referred to Arkangel as 'money-grabbers' in her account of the World Day for Laboratory Animals in the Campaigner. Arkangel has virtually no money and relies on the sale of magazines and T-shirts at events such as World Day.

THE ROAD TO VICTORY

Animal lovers campaigning against cruelty at Spanish fiestas forced cancellation of the traditional hurling of a she-goat from a 60 foot church tower at Managese de la Polvorosa, North-West Spain (Daily Telegraph 21/1/93).

An EC Directive giving minimum conditions for caged animals has been resurrected after being scrapped at the Edinburgh summit (Daily Telegraph 19/1/93).

Animal rights campaigners, including men in rubber diving suits, wrecked a village fishing match yesterday (Daily Telegraph 18/1/93).

An eagle which became blind 8 weeks after birth is being taught to fly over the Hampshire countryside after a successful operation to restore its sight (Daily Telegraph 18/1/93).

Otters have been spotted on the River Severn near Shrewsbury, Shropshire, for the first time in more than 30 years. Naturalists say it is thanks to falling pollution (Daily Telegraph 25/1/93).

Compulsory dissection and vivisection is being dropped from undergraduate courses in response to pressure from students and animal rights campaigners. Lancaster University biological and science departments have dropped experimentation on live animals entirely from their courses, and have cut back drastically on practicals involving dead animals and animal tissue (Independent 17/12/92).

Dewhurst Butchers declared debts of £350 million (Outrage Feb/Mar 93).

Recent research has shown that a vegetarian diet can significantly help rheumatoid arthritis sufferers; that a vegetarian diet is effective in reducing blood cholesterol; and that vegetarians are less at risk of contamination from toxic chemicals than meat-eaters (Outrage).

In a verdict which angling experts believe will drastically alter fishing practices on Scotland's rivers, a sheriff yesterday convicted a ghillie of keeping salmon he should have thrown back (Daily Telegraph 3/2/93).

A link has been found between colo-rectal cancer and red meat consumption according to a study reported in the International Journal of Cancer. In an 800 subject dietary study in Northern Italy, red meat, sausage, salami, eggs, cheese and refined starchy foods were all found to increase cancer risk (The Vegetarian Feb 93).

The US Wild Bird Conservation Act will enact an immediate ban on trade in seven species of extremely over-traded parrot. There will also be a US trade moratorium on all species listed under the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species (The Vegetarian Feb 93).

Church leaders are to be found preaching against the fur trade in Cruelty & Conscience, a collection of quotes and writings just published by the anti-fur group Lynx. 41 Anglican bishops have pledged their support for the fight against fur (The Vegetarian Feb 93).

Toby the mongrel escaped a death sentence yesterday after a court accepted he was not a pit bull terrier. Toby would have been put down if the case had been proved (Western Daily Press 20/1/93).

Councils will be able to register hedges as being of special interest, to stop them being removed by farmers, under a Private Members Bill yesterday (Daily Telegraph 13/2/93).

A head gamekeeper, working for hotel tycoon Lord Forte, was fined £2000 yesterday after a protected badger, killed by a snare, was found in his freezer (Sun 28/1/93).

Otters have returned to the river Severn in Worcester after 30 years. The return is due to reduced pollution levels in the water (Daily Telegraph 1/3/93).

Callous farmer, Peter Nicholson, was behind bars today after his 'inept and casual' treatment of his animals led to many starving and dying in agony. Nicholson was jailed for 13 weeks and also banned from keeping all animals, except pets, for 10 years (Fauna 8).

Evidence is growing that bottle feeding babies with cows' milk-based formula could trigger juvenile diabetes (Fauna 8).

In a Norfolk court case, gamekeeper James Metcalfe was fined £200 for setting 6 illegal gin traps (Fauna 8).

Two baby chimps found undernourished and frightened in airport crates in Johannesburg, South Africa, are now safe in a wildlife reserve in Zambia. They had been shipped from Zaire and were on their way to a vivisection laboratory in another part of Africa (People 28/2/93).

Mark Millington and Husky Miskoe will hope to run 180 miles in the Scottish highlands to raise £10,000 for a wolf sanctuary in Portugal, as well as highlighting the plight of persecuted wolves world-wide (Dulwich Guardian 25/2/93).

Fifty jobs are to be axed at Pharmaco-LSR, a pharmaceutical and product testing lab in Suffolk. The reason being that client companies are not investing as much in research and development (Ipswich Evening Star 10/2/93).

Plans to bulldoze a motorway through the 8000 year old Oxleas Forest were dropped yesterday in a U-turn by the Government (Daily Mail 8/7/93).

One of Britain's most scarce summer visiting birds, the Nightjar, has made a significant recovery (Daily Mail 3/6/93).

Hot dog sales in health conscious America have plunged by up to a third in the past 5 years (Daily Mirror 9/7/93).

A leisure scheme planned to rival the Norfolk Broads in Somerset, has been ditched because it could endanger rare otters (Daily Express 27/5/93).

Two out of three people who have tried alternative medicine believe it works, according to a survey (Daily Mail 3/5/93).

The UK is finally a 'Dolphinarium free zone'. Flamingoland has closed its dolphinarium, the last of four to cease operation due to public pressure (Outrage June/July 93).

Figures for the Severn Trent area show a 30% drop in licence sales for fishing in 1992. Clubs like Birmingham Angling Association report a 15% fall in membership (Pisces June 93).

Mintells 1993 forecasts, based on British consumer patterns of income and expenditure, include a prediction of growth in the fruit and veg markets. Meat and fish is identified as being a market in long term decline (Guardian 23/2/93).

After decades of decline, the river Till otter population is recovering, thanks to solid work and hard cash. Northumberland otters were dying mainly from toxins in their food - eels, but due to the work of the National Rivers Authorities, Northumberland Wildlife Trust and farmers of North Northumberland, the otter population will continue to increase on the River Till (The Field April 93).

On March 15th, ALF activists in Norway smashed and spray-painted the entrance of the biggest animal testing lab in Trondheim (SARP Newsletter Spring 93).

Official figures show that each day around 200 shooters are giving up their shotgun licences and leaving the 'sport'. There are now fewer shotgun certificates than at any time since official records began over 20 years ago. Gun manufacturers are said to be very worried by the continuing decline of shooting (Howl Spring 93).

Robodeer are animaltronic deer being used by Maryland's National Resources Police to trap people who take pot-shots at the robot deer out of season (Turning Point April/June 93).

The ALF liberated three turkeys and a chicken from Brandenburg Farm Kosher Slaughterhouse on March 21st (Turning Point 4/6/93).

On December 26th 1992, Sea Shepherd sank the Norwegian registered whaling ship Nybroena (Turning Point 4/6/93).

The WSPA has been involved in sending emergency veterinary supplies to Bosnia to aid domestic and wild animals (Turning Point 4/6/93).

Canada has banned the capture of Beluga whales for export (Turning Point 4/6/93).

Measures to protect several coastal bird sites were announced; Great Yarmouth, North Denes in Norfolk, The Nene washes, the Ouse washes, Gibraltar Point in Lincolnshire, Flamborough Head, Bampton Cliffs and Hornsea Mere in Humberside, are to be special protection sites (Independent 6/3/93).

US psychologists for the Ethical Treatment of Animals recently reported 'Animal research in psychology is declining.' They report a decrease in the number of facilities using animals and animals used resulting in a reduction in academic staff conducting, graduate students engaged in and articles submitted involving, animal research. They argue that such declines, particularly in the UK and perhaps in the US as well, stem largely from changes in student attitudes (Turning Point April/June 93).

Respect for Animals, a group seeking a worldwide ban on the fur trade, displayed posters of electrocuted animals at the Fendi catwalk show in Milan, which featured fur coats (Independent 11/3/93).

Two tunnels have been built under a road to save toads from being flattened in the mating season. The passages to the Grand Western Canal in Tiverton, Devon were part of a £160,000 road improvement (Daily Star 13/3/93).

Triangular nesting boxes are being installed along Britain's rivers and waterways to try to stop the decline in the number of Barn Owls (Daily Telegraph 2/3/93).

Herds of buffalo may find new homes on the range if cuts in government subsidies force ranchers from the Great Plains (Daily Telegraph 5/3/93).

The £7.5 million Countryside Commission scheme allows farmers payments of up to £120 an acre to preserve traditional landscape features such as meadow, pasture, parkland and orchard; last year 80,000 acres were added to the 74,000 protected in 1991 (Daily Telegraph 10/3/93).

The Norfolk Beagles hare hunting pack has closed down due to lack of support (Turning Point Jan/March 93).

The following US medical schools have all stopped using animals to train medical students; Yale, Baylor in Houston, Jefferson University, Wayne State, Northwestern, University of Hawaii, West Virginia and the University of Oklahoma (Turning Point 1/3/93).

Councils that have recently banned circuses from their land include Reading, Mansfield, Elmbridge, Inverness, Chester and Lancing (Turning Point 1/3/93).

Three 'dancing bears' were rescued by the WSPA in a series of dawn raids on gypsy camps in Greece on January 22nd and the bears are now recovering in the world's first sanctuary for 'dancing' bears. They will be closely monitored in a rehabilitation centre before being released into a 20 acre mountain enclosure (Turning Point 1/3/93).

Bear wrestling at Characters night club in Ohio was cancelled after animal group Peaceable Kingdom complained that this fell under a law banning animal fighting and baiting (Turning Point 1/3/93).

There is evidence that the Japanese otter is not extinct as previously believed (Turning Point 1/3/93).

The Australian Capital Territory has passed the Animal Welfare Act 1992 which bans steel-jawed traps. Rodeos and game parks where animals are held to be killed for sport are also banned. Certain 'exotic' animals are banned from circuses - these are bears, cheetahs, elephants, giraffes, leopards, lions, pumas, and tigers, and others may be listed (Turning Point 1/3/93).

A fishing ban has been imposed on the River Severn at Worcester by the National Rivers Authority to safeguard swans from the danger of hooks, discarded lines and tackle. One angler who ignored the ban was fined £160 pounds by magistrates (Pisces Jan/March 93).

Children of fathers who work in the meat trade are at greater risk of developing leukaemia. Scientists at the US National Cancer Institute have established that slaughterhouse workers are three times more likely to die from Hodgkins' disease. A Nebraskan study has shown that men having frequent contact with cattle are twice as likely to die from leukaemia (Jewish Vegetarian).

Over 45% of the population in Britain are consciously reducing their meat consumption (Gallup Poll).

Hayle Estuary in Cornwall, home to 19,000 wintering birds and 243 different species, has been bought by the RSPB as a nature reserve for just £1 (Turning Point).

Skyllarks, wrens and other wild birds thrive on organic farms where they are not affected by pesticides, say the British Trust for Ornithology (Daily Telegraph 16/3/93).

Six sperm whales stranded in a 'goldfish bowl' of shallow water off the Orkney Islands appear to have been saved after they were slowly manoeuvred and coaxed into deeper water yesterday by a flotilla of boats (Daily Telegraph 26/3/93).

Eleven dogs, belonging to four men who admitted interfering with a badger sett, have been stolen from kennels while in police custody, by animal activists (Grimsby Evening Telegraph 14/1/93).

Two leading members of the College Boys dog fighting syndicate were convicted of causing unnecessary suffering and procuring a dogfight in November 1992 (Fauna 8).

Between 3am and 4am on Christmas morning, members of the ALF broke into the animal house at the University of Essex, Colchester and made off with 300 mice which are all now in good homes (Fauna 8).

Brightons' Shifting Sands restaurant which caused a nationwide storm of protest after dishing up squirrel has closed (SE Liberator Winter 92/93).

18 ducks were removed from the broiler shed belonging to Cherry Valley near Caistor, Lincs and have been taken to new homes by animal activists (Fauna 8).

Police from North Yorkshire & Cleveland joined volunteers to help build a badger sett designed to defeat baiters (Fauna 8).

Flipper, the last remaining captive dolphin in Brazil, was rescued from certain death in January by a mercy flight (Fauna 8).

A fox hunt supporter who attacked and wounded a Green Party official in a violent clash between supporters and saboteurs near Petersfield was sentenced to 140 hours community service (SE Liberator Winter 92/93).

A hunt servant who was jailed for 2 months after he drove a 'quad' bike at a hunt saboteur lost an appeal against the sentence yesterday and was told his 'aggressive and dangerous' act could have resulted in a longer prison term (Daily Telegraph 18/6/93).

Orphaned seals are being reared in recycled salt-water tanks to give them a better chance of surviving when they are returned to the wild (Daily Telegraph 22/3/93).

Thousands of acres of fertile land are to be flooded around Holland as part of the Government's latest environmental plans to turn agricultural land into wetlands and lakes (Daily Telegraph 7/4/93).

An official clampdown on the use of the whip in horse racing will be introduced from July (Animal Life Spring 93).

The Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons made the decision to stop vets from docking dogs tails for purely cosmetic reasons (Animal Life Spring 93).

The RSPCA returned 100 rare birds to Colombia. The endangered species was seized by customs in Belgium (Animal Life Spring 93).

The Sandwood crofting estate in Sutherland, whose 11,000 acres include one of Britain's finest beaches, has been bought by the John Mair Trust, a young conservation organisation (Daily Telegraph 16/4/93).

Anti-field sports saboteurs in Germany have joined forces with militant animal rights groups and vegetarian associations to mount operations to spoil wild game shooting (Daily Telegraph 16/4/93).

Colin Seymore, a retired teacher, discovered that it was possible to protect some hedges under 18th century Inclosure Acts. Now several councils have begun to include references to Inclosure hedges in their planning policies (Sunday Telegraph 7/2/93).

The Vegetarian Society says its research shows that at least 3.1 million adults are now vegetarian, - 7% of the population. With vegetarianism even more common in the younger generation it is yet more bad news for the meat industry. The results of the research received surprising backup from an article by the editors of 'Meat Focus' who say, "As meat becomes recognised more for its 'entertainment value' and not as a dietary requirement, the perceptions of consumers will need to be addressed" (Fauna 8).

A piece of the Sussex coast has been given permanent protection from developers by the National Trust which has purchased 288 acres on the western bank of the Cuckmere estuary near Seaford (Daily Telegraph 28/4/93).

A chemical company was fined £12,000 with £2,107 costs at Warrington, Cheshire after admitting polluting the Mersey (Daily Telegraph 16/4/93).

The Grand National was disrupted by the group 'Action to Abolish the Grand National' before an estimated worldwide TV audience of 500 million on April 3rd, 1993 (Turning Point).

Arkangel

Arkangel Magazine exists to try to bring the animal rights movement together under one banner - Animal Liberation - the liberation of all animals from abuse and exploitation. Various groups are involved in this struggle, from Animal Aid to the Animal Rights Militia. People within the movement are involved in various aspects of campaigning whether it be leafletting, taking part in direct action (legal and illegal), writing to MPs, occupying premises, hunt sabbing, or attending demonstrations.

A perfect example of how various types of campaigning, carried out by different groups who often share only a common aim, can achieve remarkable success was demonstrated by the fight against the fur trade. LYNX carried out a high profile campaign concentrating on the media and the 'person in the street'. Local groups picketed fur shops and leafletted customers and passers-by. And the ALF's incendiary device campaign succeeded in making it extremely unprofitable for the fur trade to continue. As a result of these various activities the fur trade was decimated and various groups are now in the process of finishing it off. (See Campaigns Update)

The movement continues to grow, veganism is on the increase, yet there are still some who attempt to create divisions between various groups and organisations - and often succeed. The struggle for animal liberation is difficult enough without the in-fighting which is rife. One obstacle facing the movement is the elitist attitude of people who have set themselves up as 'leaders and spokespersons' of various (usually national) societies. Too often these people act like dictators and feel they have the right to speak on behalf of the members of their organisations, whom they rarely, if ever, consult. Worse still, is the arrogance of those who pretend to know how the battle for animal liberation will be won. They'll happily bank the money you collected in the High Street, they'll welcome you on their marches ("keep moving along there please") and you can sign their petitions - they'll even publish your photographs! But if you do or say anything that doesn't fit in with their way of doing things - you'd better watch out! Exaggeration? Then why do they ignore the existence of animal rights prisoners? And why isn't anyone allowed to sell Arkangel at the Living Without Cruelty Exhibition?

Publications such as Arkangel and ARC News are important in that they provide an open forum for debate - something which does not exist in most of the national societies' magazines.

One of the most positive things to happen in recent times is the formation of the Animal Rights Coalition (ARC). Contrary to what some people believe, ARC is not a group but a collection of local animal rights groups. ARC does not and cannot have policies so there is no way it can dictate to those involved. A criticism of ARC has been that it doesn't achieve anything. What some people fail to realise though is that it is not the job of those involved in the running of ARC meetings to organise demos! The fact that these meetings take place at all means that ARC is doing its job. It is up to the groups and group representatives who attend the meetings to forge links with one another!

The opportunity is within the movement's grasp to form a solid, unified and far stronger base from which to work. Let's not be fooled by those who tell us that this movement that fights for the lives of animals has achieved very little. As we report in this issue - The Vegan Society was born just 50 years ago, and it's only 18 years since the ALF first appeared. The movement is in its infancy and it will continue to grow.

Local Group Reports

ANIMAL RESCUE

PO Box 233, Liverpool L69 7LF

On Saturday, November 6th 1993, Animal Rescue launched a Christmas Pet Campaign, which urged people not to make presents out of an animal's life. It received local media newspaper coverage. During the summer over 1000 leaflets promoting animal abuse centres such as Chester Zoo, Southport Zoo, Blackpool Sea Life etc. were removed from a variety of sources such as libraries and hotels around the Merseyside areas. On Monday, December 13th, a free-to-enter public meeting was held where stalls were selling cruelty free goods, and free leaflets were distributed.

ANTI-SHAMROCK CAMPAIGN

PO Box 307, Ship Street, Brighton, East Sussex.

On 18th October 1993, Shamrock workers were locked in by 13 activists who then staged a noisy protest at the monkey prison's entrance. Police had to cut through the high tensile chain. On October 23rd, about 300 protesters marched against Shamrock through Brighton. A rally was held which included guest speakers Robin Webb and Terry Hill. After the demonstration, a vigil was held until midnight.

ANIMAL RIGHTS COALITION (LONDON)

C/O BM 8889, LONDON WC1N 3XX.

ARC (London) held its first meeting on 13th February in Central London which was attended by 75 people. The purpose of the meeting was to bring together campaigning groups from the London area to discuss ways of increasing pressure on animal abuse establishments in the Capital. The next meeting will take place in May.

ANIMAL RIGHTS CAMBRIDGE

74, Sturton Street, Cambridge CB1 2QA.

Members of Animal Rights Cambridge demonstrated outside a careers fair at Cambridge University Centre, where a vivisection conference was being held. Around 30 protesters, some wearing 'blood-stained' lab coats, banged drums and chanted slogans as police looked on. The group have also been picketing cinema-goers at the MGM cinema in Regent Street in order to highlight the continuing suffering of Keiko, the orca (killer whale) star of 'Free Willy'. The action took place on Saturday 19th February and included petitioning and letter signing directed at Warner Brothers and at the marine park in Mexico where Keiko is still held.

B.H.S.A.

c/o PO Box 355, Basingstoke.

Shearings Holidays were promoting, in their brochures, excursions to the local Boxing Day hunt meets. Many brochures were removed from travel agents. People were urged to write letters of disgust to Shearings Holidays and to tell the local travel agents they would be booking alternative holidays.

BARNSELY ANIMAL RIGHTS

Tel. 0226 742 993.

Contact Margaret on the above number for further information regarding participation in activities organised in the Barnsley area. Local information stalls are set up, demos attended, pickets and public meetings arranged.

BELFAST ANIMAL RIGHTS

PO Box 148, Belfast BT1 2LZ. (0232 244640)

A mass demo is being held on Friday 22nd April from 12 noon against Queens University, Belfast to mark World Day for Laboratory Animals. The group are currently campaigning against Chipperfields Circus, Boots, McDonalds and cinemas showing the 'Free Willy' film. B.A.R. also produce an informative newsletter. Belfast Hunt Sabs can also be contacted at the above address.

C H SABS / LAKELAND ANIMAL AID

PO Box 83, Carlisle, Cumbria.

Sabs have been having regular stalls and have so far collected over 6000 signatures for the National Anti-Hunt Petition. Shires Week and the Northumberland Beagling Festival was attended. Lakeland Animal Aid have held demos against Boots in Carlisle and against the circus on its last visit there. Demos are continuing against McDonalds. Local groups stalls are also proving to be successful.

CAT CONCERN (AND OTHER ANIMALS)

PO Box 234, Hounslow TW3 2QG.

A bin was placed in a local non-animal selling petfood shop in order to feed their many rescued cats and dogs. It was almost full with tins and biscuits which the public had generously donated. This type of food collection is continuing weekly with shops (including Sainsbury's and Safeway's) agreeing to have the bins. In the last year over 200 animals have been rescued, homed, treated for illness and/or neutered and spayed. 17 homes act as foster homes for rescues. All animals will be rescued, although in the main it appears to be cats. Strict vetting procedures are carried out by volunteers before an animal is rehomed with a new owner.

DEVON VEGANS

c/o The Old Forge, Throwleigh, Devon EX20 2HS

A campaign was organised to write to supermarkets who use the plastic rings to link 4 cans together. These form lethal death traps for wildlife and at times, domestic pets. Tesco's ludicrous response was that the plastic rings are used so that customers can carry the products home safely. The group also campaigns against the leather trade and it promotes veganism on a local level. An informative newsletter is produced.

EAST KENT ANIMAL WELFARE

Tel. 0304 363071.

The group will be holding a rally/demo against live exports at Dover Eastern Docks on the 29 & 30th July. This will include an all night vigil starting at 8pm Friday 29th, then at 11am on Saturday 30th there is to be a mass march to Dover town centre for a rally. There will be stalls, veggie and vegan snacks, guest speakers, etc.

FRIENDS OF ANIMALS (FAUNA)

PO Box 156, Cardiff, South Wales CF5 5YD.

South Wales A/R group Fauna has successfully headed a campaign to stop an ostrich farm being set up in Penmark. Councillors voted against planning permission when Fauna sent out detailed letters explaining the cruelty of Ostrich farming. On December 16th 1993, Fauna held a demo for the 3rd year running outside Wales' largest turkey slaughterhouses, Sun Valley. Around 45 protesters turned up. It gained media coverage, and several radio stations covered the event. A demo was held against a fox hunt on Boxing Day. Over 70 demonstrators attended. It received good media coverage and radio reports. A campaign was launched to make Cardiff a fur-free zone. One shop has been forced to operate from upstairs on an appointment basis only. Finally, Fauna is campaigning to make Cardiff City Council ban all angling on the Roath Park lake, where many birds have become entangled in discarded and broken fishing line.

FRIENDS OF THE ANIMALS

c/o 70 High Street, Leicester LE1 5YP.

Stalls are held three times a week in Leicester City centre. It raises public awareness on veganism. Local demos against Boots, McDonalds and butchers are organised. A foster home has been set up for homeless dogs, cats, mice etc. It neuters and spays animals and organises home checks. It is run by vegans but anyone is welcome to assist them in their work.

HERTFORDSHIRE ANIMAL RIGHTS CAMPAIGN

PO Box 66, Broxbourne, Herts. EN10 6LU

HARC is run by the same people involved in the National Anti-Hunt Petition. The petition is now proud to boast that it has over a quarter of a million signatures. Hunt bans have been secured in Somerset, Hampshire and Leicestershire. October 23rd 1993 was a week of action against hunting. Events planned across the country included protests outside hunt kennels, street theatres, leafletting and even a public debate with a hunt master!

HUNTINGDON ANIMAL RIGHTS

PO Box 83, Huntingdon, Cambs. PE18 9HD.

This is a new animal rights group and if anyone is interested please contact the above address.

I.O.W. ANIMAL PRESERVATION & ACTION GROUP

Little Spinney, Solent Rd., Cranmore, Yarmouth, I.O.W. PO41 0XY.

This group produces 'Preserve', an informative bulletin and is organising a sponsored bicycle ride on Saturday 20th August. For further details contact the above address.

LONDON VEGANS

7, Deansbrook Rd., Edgeware, Middx. HA8 9BE.

London Vegans organise various socials, catering and information stalls throughout the London area. Regular meetings are held on the last Wednesday of every month (except December) at the Millman Street Community Rooms, WC1. London Vegans produce a brilliant mailout list on the activities taking place up and down the country.

LONDON ANIMAL PROTECTION LEAGUE (LAPL)

BM LAPL, London WC1N 3XX.

This is a new animal rights group and if anyone is interested in becoming involved please contact the above address.

LONDON BOOTS ACTION GROUP

c/o Alara, 58, Seven Sisters Rd., London N7 6AA.

LBAG continue to have their meetings at 6, Endsleigh Street, Euston where all people are welcome to share news and views. They have been successful in telling the public just how disgusting Boots' policies are, also many people are unaware that Boots do have animal laboratories, although Boots like to deny it. Sticklers, posters and leaflets are available from the LBAG address. Membership is only £3.00 a year, and regular newsletters are produced.

PRESTON ACTION FOR ANIMALS

PO Box 385, Ashton, Preston PR2.

If anyone in the Preston area is interested in this group's activities please contact them at the above address.

SOUTH WEST REGION VEGETARIAN COALITION

c/o Devon Vegans, The Old Forge, Throwleigh, Devon EX20 2HS.

This coalition is hoping to be able to unite vegetarian / vegan groups and contacts throughout the South West of England. They want to encourage help, support and motivate vegetarians to get together, to be able to exchange campaign information and offer each other advice. The coalition uses the term 'vegetarian' in the loosest form possible, as no groups will be excluded.

SOUTH EAST ANIMAL RIGHTS COALITION (SEARC)

19a Amherst Rd., Bexhill-on Sea, East Sussex TN40 1QH.

An informative newsletter 'The National Link' is available containing the latest news regarding the campaign against SEALINK and lots more besides. For more information write to SEARC.

STEVENAGE ANIMAL RIGHTS

Box 6, Bowes Lyon House, St. George's Way, Stevenage.

An informative newsletter is produced. The group has its own selection of badges and t-shirts which are available by mail order. On Saturday 14th May, a Cruelty-Free fair is being held at the Stevenage Leisure Centre from 10am-4pm. The event will be advertised widely through posters, leaflets, etc. Anyone wishing to participate should contact the group.

SOUTH LONDON ANIMAL AID PO Box 594, London SW9 8QG.

Alongside their newsletter, a sheet called 'Campaign Letters' is produced. It details what atrocities are going on and to whom to write to complain. The Green Marmoset catering company is also run by SLAA. More volunteers are needed to keep it running. A public meeting was held in Camberwell on October 18th in order to publicise the experiments carried out on monkeys at the nearby Institute of Psychiatry. The meeting went well with around 80 people attending. The Paradise Lost video was shown on a giant screen. Guest speakers included Terry Hill, who successfully infiltrated Shamrock Farms, E.I.A. and an M.E.P.

SHEFFIELD NEUTERING AND SPAYING SCHEME

193, Firth Park Rd., Sheffield S5 6WU (0742 420434).

This is a new group in the Sheffield area aiming to promote neutering and spaying through education and also to help people on low incomes or state benefits with the cost of getting their animals neutered/spayed. They also undertake some rescue work, and have recently re-homed a number of dogs taken from cruel and uncaring owners. They are raising funds by doing car boot sales and are always pleased to receive any saleable goods or donations.

SURREY ANIMAL RIGHTS

PO Box 787, South Croydon CR2 6TG

Surrey Animal Rights have received good newspaper coverage of their protests outside Boots and Cancer Research shops.

SUTTON ANIMAL ACTION

*33 Lower Rd., Sutton, Surrey SM1 4QJ
(081 241 8674)*

Run by active animal rights campaigners who seek to draw public awareness towards all aspects of cruelty in the area. They divide any profits from their stalls between local animal sanctuaries. Their main aim is to involve more people in sabbing and demonstrations.

TAUNTON ANIMAL RIGHTS

PO Box 243, Taunton.

T.A.R. also includes hunt sab groups. Regular meetings and town centre stalls are held. Recent demos include Boots, McDonalds and Bristol Zoo. T.A.R. also joined up with HARC against hunting on council land and much public support has been gained.

WINCHESTER ANIMAL CONCERN

6, South Street, Ropley, Alresford, Hants.

'Bagpiping' - squeezing faeces from live chickens was exposed. On October 19th over 60 demonstrators took part in a march through the Winnal Industrial Estate in Winchester to the Webbs poultry slaughter and processing plant. The event received good newspaper coverage, although no TV cameras were allowed in the plant - for obvious reasons as whilst the demo took place, the slaughter continued with lorry loads of chickens being unloaded into the plant.

WALSALL ANIMAL RIGHTS

(0922 414885).

A picket was held at the Home Office on Friday 19th November 93. It was a protest against the proposed trespass law against hunt sabs instigated by Michael Howard MP.

ARKANGEL aims to unify the animal liberation movement by providing a forum for debate and exchange of ideas, and information about pro-animal actions at local, national and international levels.

Sanctuaries

CHEAM WILDLIFE CARE

5, Frederick Close, Sutton,
Surrey SM1 2HY,
Tel. 081 644 2773

For many years, Paul Morin, the founder, has been rescuing and caring for British wildlife - from blue-tits to swans. But his prime concern is dealing with the urban fox and carrion crow, of which he has a number of residents unable to be released. Although it is a small sanctuary, the number of casualties he handles is overwhelming and he urgently appeals for funds to cover vets' bills.

He vigorously campaigns against the abuse of wild animals - fox hunting in particular - and each creature brought to him receives tireless dedication and personal attention. He is currently extending his activities to include providing informative literature for the general public, holding regular exhibitions in libraries, etc., promoting awareness and a responsible attitude towards wildlife, and he runs a sponsorship scheme for a particularly loveable disabled fox.

ANIMALS AT RISK SHELTER

341, Ashcroft Road, Luton, Bedfordshire.
Tel. 0582 28853

This shelter is run by Pete and Maggie Morrison, who are vegans. They have a small group of supporters who raise funds for the shelter. The aim of 'Animals at Risk' is to rescue unwanted and stray animals and to care for them until they can be re-homed with responsible new owners. Spaying/neutering is an important part of the shelter's work. Last year quite a lot of building work was begun, concrete bases were laid ready for new, large enclosed runs for cats and kittens. The building of wire enclosures and purpose-built accommodation will go ahead this year giving the cats and kittens much more freedom. Wide paths have been laid to accommodate disabled visitors to the shelter. Donations of money and tins of pet food are always needed. Visitors are welcome at the shelter, Saturday and Sunday, 11am to 4pm.

PROTECTION OF ANIMAL LIFE SOCIETY (PALS)

45, Emesbury Road, Newton Tony, Salisbury,
Wiltshire SP4 0HW. Tel. 0980 64634

Lorraine Drake founded PALS in 1984, and four years later moved to her present address where she takes in unwanted and abandoned dogs, cats, ponies, donkeys, chickens, pigs, rabbits, goats, and small wild creatures. No animal is ever refused. She finds good homes where possible, and very carefully monitors them. No healthy animal is ever put down, and she promotes neutering and spaying to reduce the death rate of unwanted pets. PALS has recently acquired forty acres of pasture for larger animals and a patch of woodland for releasing wild birds and animals back into a safe reserve.

Some dogs cannot be re-homed for psychological reasons and these are available for sponsorship. Also, PALS is appealing for funds and will accept gifts of postage stamps, computer paper, aluminium cans, postcards and phonecards. Dog walkers are always needed, as are home-checkers and street collectors.

Future projects include a boarding cattery to complement the existing boarding kennel which provides regular income, as well as a hospital wing, puppy block and aviary. The sanctuary is open to visitors all week from 9am to 6pm. Please write to the above address for full details of sponsorship of an animal or kennel, fund-raising events, etc.

HYDESTYLE WILDLIFE HOSPITAL

Nutwood Cottage, New Road, Hydestyle,
Nr Godalming, Surrey GU8 4DJ.
Tel. 0483 860313

Since it was founded by Lyn and Graham Cornick in 1978, thousands of orphans and wildlife casualties have passed through the facility. Their aim is to reintroduce animals to the wild if possible through controlled programmes. They provide educational lectures for schools, groups, etc. The hospital is widely regarded as the foremost authority on fox rehabilitation in the UK, and it recently rescued nine hybrid silver foxes from an abandoned fur farm in Scotland. Patients can also include small mammals, ducks, swans, stoats, snakes, bats, squirrels, badgers, birds of prey, herons, rabbits, kingfishers and deer.

Annual membership costs £6 for an adult, £3 for a child, and £7.50 for a family.

CELIA HAMMOND ANIMAL TRUST

High Street, Wadhurst, East Sussex TN5 6AG. Tel. 0892 783367 / 783820

The Celia Hammond Trust is the only charity whose main objective is the establishment of low-cost spay clinics for dogs and cats. CHAT has just completed the purchase of the country's first low-cost neuter clinic in Lewisham, South London, which it hopes to open within the next few months. Two and a half million stray cats and dogs struggle to survive in the streets. To combat this national scandal, CHAT will arrange for two full-time vets to neuter one hundred and fifty dogs and cats a week, with two more operating tables available when staffing increases. A bitch spay will cost £20-£25, a cat spay will be £10.

Eventually, CHAT plan a nationwide service of eight clinics and are heartened by the success of a Vancouver spay clinic who, after five years, achieved an 88% reduction in the destruction of unwanted animals, and a 61% reduction in cruelty cases. This can be achieved in the UK if funding can be found.

CHAT have recently moved their sanctuary with 340 cats, kittens, rescued dogs, six goats, and numerous ex-battery hens to Brede in Sussex. They also operate a rescue service and recently saved sixteen cats and kittens from a demolished building.

Literature is available from their Wadhurst address. Over one hundred permanent sanctuary residents can be adopted either individually or as a group.

HOPEFIELD ANIMAL SANCTUARY

Sawyers Hall Farm, Sawyers Hall Lane, Brentwood, Essex CM15 9BY. Tel. 081 590 6273

This sanctuary rescues horses, ponies and donkeys from neglect and slaughter. It also cares for other animals saved from local markets, and homes those who are restored to health. They organise various fund-raising schemes for both supporters and members. The sanctuary urgently needs volunteer helpers, saleable items, and funds to continue their excellent work. Merchandise is available.

PIGEON RECOVERY

8, Vermont Road, Sutton, Surrey SM1 3EQ. Tel. 081 644 7349

Choosing the pigeon because it is numerous in towns, vegetarian, and tolerant of being in groups, Lyn and Maggie Allen (vegans) started to take in injured, sick and orphaned pigeons on an ever-growing scale about three years ago. Since then, the garden sanctuary has grown to four aviaries, and the garage and bedroom house the frail or those receiving medication, which is mainly herbal or homeopathic, including ointment made from home-grown Calendula flowers.

They collect the birds when possible and offer a home to any disabled pigeon. They were denied charitable status because of the bigotry against what the authorities call "vermin", and they are not funded. They raise money by making and selling delightful hand-painted models - a very time-consuming task - but somehow they manage to care for an average of 800 pigeons a year.

Any donations towards petrol or food is acknowledged and most sincerely appreciated.

COUNTY HALL ANIMAL WELFARE AND RESCUE CLUB

The Rectory, Hathem, Loughborough, Leics. LE12 5LA. Tel. 0509 842259

Margaret Bond founded the County Hall Animal Welfare and Rescue Club and its South East London cat sanctuary in 1972. Homeless, sick, abandoned and feral cats are spayed or neutered, gradually integrated, and eventually placed in carefully vetted homes if possible. Accommodation at the cat sanctuary comprises large heated huts with access to covered runs or a large secure garden. The Club is concerned with the whole spectrum of cruelty towards animals and fully supports all action against vivisection, factory farming and the fur trade. Margaret suffers from a disability and therefore voluntary helpers are vital.

Long-term aims include urging legislation to end the selling of animals from pet shops, as pets can be acquired from rescue centres such as this one. The Club is not funded by County Hall but is run entirely by supporters. Sponsorship is available; for £5 a month you can contribute to the upkeep of one of Margaret's cats. You will receive a colour photo and a club newsletter.

BRIGHT EYES ANIMAL SANCTUARY

*Beagh, Ballinamallard, Co. Fermanagh,
Northern Ireland BT94 2AS. Tel. 0365 38 8885*

The only sanctuary in NW Ireland, Bright Eyes Animal Sanctuary is helping the increasing number of ill-treated and unwanted animals. Established in December 1989, the shelter is committed to animal rescue, promoting spaying and neutering, and creating public awareness of the plight of animals in general through educational programmes. It is the philosophy of the sanctuary that no animal that can be restored to health is ever destroyed. Animals capable of being rehomed are found good homes; those which are not remain as permanent residents. The sanctuary's work is limited only by the funding available.

Plans for the future include dog kennelling, catteries, kitten and puppy units, an isolation unit for sick and injured animals, a wildlife hospital, and the provision of a mobile rescue unit. A forthcoming major fund-raising campaign to raise money for all this is to be titled: "Jumping for the Animals" during which in August two volunteers will parachute from 10,000 feet! They hope to raise the same amount in cash - £10,000. Cash prizes will also be offered, but the campaign's success rests primarily on getting hundreds of people to sell sponsor-subscription forms which are available from the above address.

It is also possible to sponsor animals at the sanctuary; £7 a week for a cat, £13 for a dog, and £2 a week for a rabbit or other small animal. £500 will equip, heat and light a kennel - the gift will be recorded on a plaque on the building.

FRESHFIELDS ANIMAL RESCUE CENTRE

*East Lodge Farm, East Lane, Ince Blundell,
Liverpool L29 3EA. Tel. 051 931 1604*

The shelter would appreciate any 'pet supplies': greens for herbivores, bread for fowl, tools, overalls, roofing felt, and saleable goods for their charity shops. They would also be grateful for offers to home rescued animals - and run a strict vetting service. Offers of help at the centre would be appreciated.

The Last Word?

Arkangel is not broke. Well, not as we write this anyway! (Incidentally, the magazine is assembled in a somewhat haphazard way and this is the very last space to be filled.) You see, the money in the bank is pretty well exactly enough to pay for our usual printing and postage costs. But when the printing is done and the magazines have been sent out to the subscribers there will be virtually nothing left. We print more than twice as many magazines as we have subscribers, which means that we have to sell ALL of these 'extra' magazines to recoup the printing and postage costs. That's why you will see us on demos and outside exhibitions clutching armfuls of Arkangels! All this brings us to a couple of points which need mentioning. First, it helps to explain why Arkangel appears rather infrequently(!) - we can't print a new issue until we've sold all of the last. But we always do sell them - so another Arkangel will always appear. Second, our circulation can only increase if we receive donations - because we have absolutely no other form of income. Of course, lots of groups, sanctuaries, (and other magazines!) desperately need your money - but if you've got any spare cash after you've helped out everyone else - perhaps you could send us a few quid too, and help us to spread the word still further (I hope Paul McCartney is reading this...).

Subscription to their quarterly newsletter is £24.00 a year. It provides information about current arrests and imprisonment of alleged animal rights activists. The SG raises funds, chiefly to help pay fines and help towards the travelling expenses of visiting relatives. Funds also go towards paying for books, cruelty-free toiletries, etc. A range of merchandise is available with a discount to any SG member.

ANIMAL LIBERATION FRONT

(PRESS OFFICE)

BM 4400, London WC1N 3XX.

Telephone: 0954 230542 (H) or 0836 310763 (Mobile).

The Press Office plays a vital role in the animal rights movement. It remains paramount as a means of providing TV, radio and newspaper coverage about why ALF actions take place. Speakers are available for meetings, etc. Merchandise is also available. Donations are always welcome to help run the office of a much needed and valuable animal rights service.

ADVOCATES FOR ANIMALS

10, Queensferry St., Edinburgh EH2 4PG.

This group produces the Annual Pictorial Review, a colour booklet packed with information. AFA highlighted Glasgow University when they experimented on monkeys in head injury experiments. They finance and take part in special investigations and campaign against all forms of animal abuse.

ARKANGEL

ARKANGEL

BCM 9240, London WC1N 3XX.

Arkangel is a magazine which aims to provide information and support for the animal rights movement, to encourage unity, and to provide a forum for the exchange of news and views. Donations are always welcome. In order to keep Arkangel up-to-date, please can local and national groups continue to send in information about their current activities as these will be used in the next edition of the magazine.

ANIMAL LIBERATION INVESTIGATION

UNIT

PO Box 38, Manchester M60 1FT.

Animal abuse establishments are inspected. Video footage taken and documents removed to build up files.

ANIMAL RIGHTS COALITION (ARC)

PO Box 155, Manchester M60 1FT.

ARC encourages the coming together of all groups. A conference was held on 16th January which encouraged groups to work together on a wide range of campaigns. A newsletter is provided with a diary of events and current campaigns. ARC also sends out lists detailing addresses of animal abuse establishments supplied by Arkangel Information.

ACTION TO ABOLISH THE GRAND

NATIONAL

PO Box 3152, London E12 5JW.

A national demo against the Grand National was held on April 9th outside the Aintree Racecourse. AAGN was formed to let the public know how cruel horse racing is. Merchandise and leaflets are available.

ANIMAL BIRTH CONTROL

*Festings Buildings, Highland Rd., Southsea PO4 9BZ.
(0705 736691)*

ABC helps with the spaying and neutering of animals, and also with helping elderly people with the costs of keeping their companion animals. Due to an upsurge in animal cruelty, ABC now works with Animal Action which rescues and re-homes unwanted and abandoned animals.

ANIMAL AID & ADVICE

081 889 9714.

Their main objective is to encourage responsible pet ownership. They reinforce the fact that neutering and spaying is essential to prevent unwanted litters. AAA also re-homes abandoned and unwanted pets and runs a fostering service.

HELP ARKANGEL HELP THE MOVEMENT HELP THE ANIMALS

How Arkangel Helps

The aim of Arkangel is to help the animal liberation movement. In furtherance of this aim Arkangel produces an informative magazine and has set up various projects to help local groups and animal rights campaigners both in this country and abroad. These projects include the supplying of information about animal abuse and animal abusers, publishing material useful to animal rights campaigners and helping to set up networks of groups in foreign countries.

How You Can Help Arkangel

All Arkangel workers are unpaid, but all these projects need money in order to function effectively. Therefore, one way in which you can help is to donate money or, better still, by doing regular fundraising for Arkangel. You can also become a local Arkangel contact, so that as well as organizing fundraising, you could help distribute the magazine, report on local group activities, or assist the Arkangel Information Project.

If you are able to help in any way, please complete the relevant part(s) of this form and return it to Arkangel, BCM 9240, London WC1N 3XX. Thanks.

truth or dairy who, what, where, when, how and why vegan

Vegans

are weirdoes who don't eat or wear any bits of animals or any things that have come out of animals. They also don't wash their hair with them or spread them over their faces as moisturiser. Strange though it may seem, some of these people manage to be healthy enough to run marathons, win the Krypton Factor, live to be 100, compete in triathlons, win the 100m at the Olympics and record the longest-running number one hit single in British history.

Truth or Dairy explains just why it is that some people have decided to go against the grain of popular burger, shake & fries culture and attempts to answer that most difficult of questions:

"If you give up eating meat, fish, milk, eggs and cheese, is there anything left except a few poxy vegetables?"

In its own curious fashion, this video also tackles the most burning issues of today:

- Why are almost one million 2 day old chicks killed in Britain every week?
- Why are meat eaters 12 times more likely to die from a heart attack than vegans?
- If 20 million people will die as a result of malnutrition this year, why is 57% of Europe's grain fed to cattle?
- If there are 1.6 billion cows on the planet, and each of them farts up to 200 litres of methane a day, and methane is 25 times as potent as the chief global warming culprit carbon dioxide, how long will it be before half of Britain is under water?
- Why can't half a million people in Britain digest milk?
- Is it really logical to destroy 55 square feet of rain forest to make one beefburger?

Truth or Dairy is presented by poet Benjamin Zephaniah, and features a star-studded vegan cast including The B52s, Consolidated, Uri Geller, Casey Kasem, k.d. lang, Moby, River Phoenix, Martin Shaw, Heather Small (M-people), Spice Williams, Daisy the pantomime cow and a nice man who runs a fruit 'n' veg stall in Camden High Street.

Justice For Keith Mann

Justice For Keith Mann, c/o ICA, P.O. Box 1135, Hassocks, West Sussex BN6 8AA.

The demo at outside The Courts of Appeal at The Strand on the 13th November, 1995 was excellent. We would like to take the opportunity to thank everyone involved for turning out to support Keith. Our gratitude extends to Veggies Catering for providing such fine Vegan foods.

As everyone no doubt knows, Keith's outrageous 14 year sentence was reduced to an unacceptable 11 years. Okay, it took 3 years off but that is no way near what we wanted.

JFKM is looking into other avenues to see what more can be done.

Additionally, what is now required is a campaign to get Keith's status de-categorised (currently Cat 'A' - i.e. he is treated as a terrorist !). We need to start this process NOW!

Vegan Prisoners Supporters Group (working closely with JFKM) is starting this part of the campaign.

We need people to get involved. Please write letters to Michael Howard at the Home Office and send copies of your letters and the original replies to VPSG.

Michael Howard
The Home Secretary
Home Office
50 Queen Anne's Gate
LONDON
SW1H 9AT

If anyone can become actively involved in any other means, or if they want to be kept regularly informed of the De-Cat 'A' progress please write to

Vegan Prisoners Supporters Group
P.O. Box 194
ENFIELD
Middx
EN1 3HD

Please give name, address and, if possible, phone number.

We are also in desperate need of funds to keep the momentum of JFKM campaign going, so if you can spare anything, please send to the VPSG address (Cheques/P.O.s payable to Vegan Prisoners Supporters Group).

Any other queries/correspondence should be mailed directly to JFKM address above.

Keith's chance for a de-categorisation will be in April 1996. He will only get this ONE chance (one a year!).

He will stay in prison until 2004 WITHOUT parole unless he is de-categorised!

PLEASE START WRITING NOW!

Let's give the Home Office as much hassle as we possibly can. This campaign is by all means not over yet.

CARE FOR THE WILD

*1 Ashfolds, Horsham Rd., Rusper,
W. Sussex RH12 4QX.*

Care for the Wild is continuing its projects around the world. It has embarked on a project to move 500 elephants and their family groups to save them from being shot. This is the largest ever elephant conservation project to be undertaken. Also, in Britain, campaigning against the Ministry of Agriculture Food & Fisheries has been stepped up. The MAFF kills badgers in the belief that they spread TB. Care for the Wild assists with badger groups to help them look after badger sets. Essential items are needed such as walkie-talkies, cages in which to carry injured badgers and rehabilitation units. Donations needed.

CAMPAIGN FOR THE ABOLITION OF ANGLING

PO Box 90, Bristol BS99 1ND (0272 441175).

CAA actively takes part in fish sabs all over Britain. They have been successful in disrupting fishing matches and forcing anglers to abandon local fishing events. They organise a national anti-angling week annually, and will be urging local groups to take part. For further details contact CAA.

GREEK ANIMAL RESCUE

69, Great North Way, Hendon, London NW4 1PT.

Many animals suffer in Greece. Strays are thought of as vermin and are killed, many are thrown live over cliffs. A new shelter is being built to house 150 dogs, 40 cats, 2 mules, a few chickens and ducks. There is a 30 minute video available featuring some of Greece's atrocities towards its animals and it also shows the shelters and the sanctuary which is provided for abused and neglected animals.

HUNT SABOTEURS ASSOCIATION (HSA)

*PO Box 1, Carlton, Nottingham NG4 2JY.
(0602 590357).*

Contact the HSA for information and advice on how to form a fully operational hunt-sab group. The HSA provides speakers for talks and gives legal advice. Merchandise is available.

McLIBEL SUPPORT CAMPAIGN

c/o London Greenpeace, 5 Caledonian Rd., London N1.

The legal arguments continue. Helen Steel and Dave Morris' latest set back was that they were refused a right to a jury. The campaign continues to highlight the fact that Free Speech should be defended without wealthy multi-nationals, etc. using their money and power to silence the ones who tell the truth. Protests outside McDonalds continue and leaflets are available. (See Update).

NATIONAL ANTI-VIVISECTION SOCIETY

(NAVS)

261, Goldhawk Rd., London W12 9PE

NAVS are once again organising the World Day for Laboratory Animals march, this year on April 23rd, from Hyde Park to Parliament Square. Please buy your black armbands to wear during Lab Animal Week, and on the march itself. Last year over 20,000 people attended.

NOW AGAINST LIVE EXPORTS

St Josep's, Souldern, Bicester, Oxon.

NOW continues its campaign against live exports, with Sealink and P&O ferries being targeted. People are urged not to use these ferries - as a protest. Cattle markets have been visited and animal misery witnessed. NOW is at present making plans to organise a national march and rally some time this year, possibly at one of the ports. For further information contact NOW.

Sabbing News

HOWARD WIELDS THE BIG STICK

As the 1993/4 hunt season draws to a close people who oppose bloodsports are facing the depressing likelihood of wholesale criminalisation of the movement. The Criminal Justice Bill, announced by the Home Secretary in November 1993 is currently undergoing the committee stage in Parliament and it seems likely that the provisions relating to saboteurs and trespass on land will become law in July 1994. For those readers who have not seen the government proposals, a summary of the relevant sections is given below:

DISRUPTIVE TRESPASS:

A person commits the offence of aggravated trespass if he/she trespasses on land in the open air and, in relation to any lawful activity which persons are engaging in or are about to engage in on that or adjoining land in the open air, does there anything which is intended by him/her to have the effect

- a) of intimidating those persons or any of them so as to deter them or any of them from engaging in that activity
- b) of obstructing that activity, or
- c) of disrupting that activity.

If the senior police officer present believes that one or more persons have committed, are committing or intend to commit the act of aggravated trespass on land in the open air, or that two or more persons are trespassing on land with the intention of intimidating, obstructing or disrupting persons engaged in a lawful activity, he may direct that person or persons to leave the land. Refusal to comply with the officer's directions will result in arrest.

Penalties for refusal: A maximum of 3 months imprisonment or £2,500 fine.

TRESPASSORY ASSEMBLIES:

If a chief officer of police believes that an assembly is intended to be held on land to which the public has no right of access, or limited rights of access and that the assembly is likely to be held without the occupier's permission or to exceed the limits of any permission given by the occupier, he may apply to the council of the district for an order prohibiting the holding of a trespassory assembly. The order cannot exceed 4 days and is limited to a 5 mile radius. (Assembly means a gathering of 20 or more persons.)

If a constable believes that a person is on way to such an assembly he may stop that person and direct them not to proceed in the direction of the assembly. Failure to comply with the officer's orders is an offence.

Any person who organises such an assembly or who incites another to commit an offence of trespassory assembly is guilty of an offence.

Penalties: A maximum of 3 months imprisonment or £2,500 fine.

Clearly the above laws make sabbing illegal, on public and private land. While trespassory assemblies are primarily aimed at illegal raves and festivals, the law could be used to arrest sab organisers for arranging a sab where the hunt scum intend to chase wildlife on private land, for organising a fishing sab at a private lake or sabbing a shoot on private land. ALIU inspections on private land will be affected by this law if part of the trespass takes part in the open air. Even LACS members who watch hunts and take photos of their cruel actions without going as far as sabbing the hunt will face being stopped and harassed by police for taking part in wholly legal activities. Similarly, if the cops get prior notice of a sab they can create an exclusion zone around a hunt, shoot or fishing match and turn back any sabs before they get close to the hunt.

The HSA has produced a petition and leaflets to combat the bill and urges all members and groups to write to their local MP and make an appointment to see them to put your concerns to them over the significant changes in the law which will criminalise or even stop many active protesters. The government must be shown the strength of opposition to such laws and realise that banning hunting with hounds will meet with significant public approval while addressing the issue of disorder at hunts. LACS is compiling a list of occasions where the hunt has trespassed on private land, killed domestic animals and caused traffic accidents. If you have witnessed any such incidents, let LACS know and provide them with a statement. Similarly, if you have been assaulted by hunt scum while on a sab, pass on the details to the HSA. Let's make a real effort to ensure that the bill is not passed, not because we have no faith in the legal system or the principle of democracy and therefore make no attempt to defeat the law in its early stages. If the law is passed without our representations being heard, then we will have to face up to the real possibility of crippling fines or imprisonment. We owe it to the animals to give it our best - and remember that the Macnamara bill was only defeated by twelve votes, so a significant proportion of MPs have reservations about supporting animal cruelty committed by the rural hooligans of our society.

Violence Against Sabs

On 30th October the hunt season opened in earnest. The first day of foxhunting coincided with yet more violence committed by hunt supporters on peaceful sabs. In Brocklesby, Lincolnshire, a follower of the Brocklesby Hunt threatened a saboteur with a flick-knife. The week before, two sabs attending a cubbing meet of the same hunt were attacked by a supporter wielding a pick-axe handle. At the opening meet of the North Staffordshire Foxhunt in Knightley, a roving band of 50 or so hunt thugs who were thought to have been called in from Cheshire attacked a Liverpool based group of saboteurs and beat one of the sabs unconscious. Violence was also seen at the opening meet of The Bicester with Whaddon Chase Foxhunt at Priors Hardwick, near Banbury. A saboteur was struck on the head with a video camera by a hunt steward who was clearly trying to initiate a confrontation and later a hunt steward was arrested by Police after attacking a saboteur. In Wales two saboteurs required hospital treatment at Aberystwyth General Hospital after supporters of the Vale of Clettwr Foxhunt attacked them. A local resident in Pencader heard the rape alarms set off by the sabs and gave them sanctuary in his home while police were called. The hunt supporters came to the house, demanded that the sabs be turned over to them and even tried to attack the sabs as they were being taken to hospital in a police car. Llandysul police say they intend to arrest the perpetrators.

One week later the Home Secretary, Michael Howard, accused saboteurs of initiating violence at hunt meets in a speech in Didcot. While he made such observations, 3 saboteurs in Lancashire required treatment for head injuries following an attack on them by riders and followers of the Vale of Lune Harriers: four other saboteurs had to jump for their lives as a farmer drove at them in his tractor and later rammed their van with the tractor's fork attachment. The farmer was a supporter of the Vale of Aylesbury Foxhunt. On the same day an Oxford saboteur was struck on the head with a riding crop by a member of the Old Berks Foxhunt, fortunately escaping injury and in Hampshire several saboteurs rescued a fox from the Hampshire Foxhunt's hounds and were whipped by a member of the hunt. They succeeded in getting the fox away from the hunters but the poor fox died later from its wounds.

On Saturday 18th December four sabs from the Three Shires Hunt Saboteur Group were ambushed by followers of the Woodland Pytchley foxhunt during a meet near Great Addington in Northamptonshire. The sabs' car was blocked in by three follower's vehicles, their keys were stolen, one of the sabs was punched and kicked to the ground and had to be admitted to hospital for treatment to head injuries. Wellingborough Police are investigating.

On 21st December twelve saboteurs were attacked by followers of the Cambridgeshire Foxhunt - the hunt responsible for the death of Tom Worby. During the day the sabs were subjected to intermittent assaults which culminated in an attack on 18 year old Claire Lavagli from Peterborough. Claire was punched several times and kicked to the ground. The attack only stopped when police dragged the man away. Even with such a blatant attack the man was not arrested - the police reported him for summons!

Later in the day the sabs returned to their transport only to find their car's tyres had been slashed. The sab landrover had also been tampered with but the tampering was only discovered when police flagged down the landrover because the wheels were wobbling. On closer examination the police found that all the wheel nuts had been loosened and one police officer was overheard to say he was appalled by the possibility of having to deal with multiple road deaths.

The attacks continued into the new year. During a February meet of the Old Surrey and Burstow Foxhunt near Uckfield three sabs witnessed a hunt rider viciously whipping his horse in the face while forcing it into a horse box. The sabs got out to intervene but the hunter took out a hammer and hit them several times. Two suffered severe bruising to their arms and legs and the other received a nasty head wound. All three were taken by ambulance to hospital where they were treated for their injuries - the head wound required five stitches. Fortunately other sabs noted down the registration number of the hunter's vehicle and passed it on to the police. Later that day a man, believed to be from Croydon, was arrested by police in connection with the attack.

While the hunt supporters continue to attack saboteurs, the police continue to concentrate their effort on arresting saboteurs for the most trifling reasons and often step over the bounds of proper behaviour. The most blatant incidents took place at the meets of the Surrey Union hunt last season. Up to twenty-six sabs intend to sue the police for wrongful arrest and false imprisonment. On one occasion alone thirteen members from the Brixton Hunt Saboteurs Association were arrested in a pre-emptive strike by police. Their landrover was stopped half an hour before the hunt started and some distance from the meet. The sabs were all arrested and spent up to ten hours in Farnham police cells. They were all subsequently charged with violent disorder. In July the charges were reduced to lesser public order charges and on 5th November all charges were dropped. The sabs contend that the police actions were unlawful and the result of a campaign of lies and exaggeration by the Surrey Union Hunt and hunting publications. The police seemed to have been unwittingly misled by the hunting fraternity to believe that the sabs and not the hunt themselves originate most of the violent confrontations during hunt meets. The strategy was also extremely expensive - estimated policing costs for that one day alone was £26,000.

Even activists who attend lawful demonstrations against hunting have been treated in appalling ways by the police. The worst example of over-zealous and blatantly illegal police practices took place at the Horse & Hounds Ball at the Grosvenor House Hotel in London's Mayfair on 3rd March. Demonstrators were stopped and searched for no reason other than being at a demonstration. Some had documents taken and copied by the police, while others were threatened with arrest for standing quietly on the pavement.

While saboteurs face such aggressive policing, those hunt followers arrested by police for serious assaults on saboteurs face trifling sentences, even when found guilty. A shocking example of such leniency took place at Hull Crown Court on 8th February. Raymond Walker, a supporter of the Bramham Moor Foxhunt, was arrested on 9th January 1993 for attacking two saboteurs and a minibus with a scythe. The sabs received head wounds, the minibus windscreen was smashed and Walker and other hunt supporters caused further damage to the minibus as it drove away. Walker and two other perpetrators of the vicious attack, Mr. and Mrs. Winstanley, were arrested later that evening by police. Walker was charged with malicious wounding, causing an affray and causing criminal damage; the Winstanleys were charged with affray. When the case reached Crown Court one year later, Walker pleaded guilty to the affray and the criminal damage and the third charge of wounding was not put to him. The Winstanley's both pleaded guilty to affray. The judge then bound over the Winstanleys and remanded Walker pending social reports, making it clear that the sentence would not be custodial. The victims and their relatives were shocked at the judge's leniency-even the police were surprised.

While the police and criminal courts attack the sabotage movement, the civil courts have also been supportive of the hunting fraternity, who have been trying to stop the activities of saboteurs through injunctions. Lawyers acting for the Portman Hunt in Dorset won injunctions in November against three prominent saboteurs forbidding them to disrupt meetings by "blowing horns, hallooing or in any other manner". This action followed a similar action in October by the Fitzwilliam Hunt against another regular saboteur, when a judge ruled that sabbing is a "trespass to goods" for the sab to interfere with their hounds by trying to confuse them with noise. At first these legal findings seem to indicate that there are civil actions available to the hunts which will mean injunctions against all regular saboteurs. However, such actions are costly and time consuming and with the possibility of the criminalisation of sabbing for the next hunt season, it seems unlikely that further civil actions will be pursued.

Far more worrying was the legal challenge against Somerset County Council's ban on deerhunting in 140 acres of common land in the Quantocks. The High Court overturned the council's ban when they ruled in favour of the Quantock Staghounds on February 9th. The judge said that the council had no power under Local Government Act of 1972 to legislate against any legal pursuit on moral grounds alone. Flushed with that success, other hunts have mounted legal challenges against some of the 155 local authorities who have banned hunting on their land - Avon, Gloucestershire, Hampshire, Hertfordshire, Leicestershire and Wiltshire all face such legal moves by hunts in their areas. The councils are understandably furious at the attack on their rights to legislate against activities on their property which a majority of their electorate condemn as cruel and barbaric. It is hoped that Somerset County Council will mount an appeal against such a ruling because a large proportion of council decisions revolve around morality - banning animal acts in circuses or goldfish prizes at funfairs are based on moral issues. Even a decision to keep an uneconomic community service like a library, nursery or old people's home open on moral grounds alone could also be deemed unlawful.

The hunting fraternity's attacks on people who oppose their barbaric practices even go as far as the Labour Party. A rump of ignorant Labour Party members have formed the "Leave Country Sports Alone Campaign". These intellectual giants reason that Labour's rural vote could be increased by dropping their opposition to hunting. The group, which includes film producer David Puttman, the Opera House Director Jeremy Isaacs, Ex-Seaman's Union boss Sam McCluskie, Rumbled of the Bailey John Mortimer and his wife Penny (a member of three hunts), Baroness Mallalieu, Lord Donoughue, Lord Shackleton, ex-Granada TV boss Sir Dennis Foreman and that well known turncoat Richard Course, believe that the party has been misled by animal rights campaigners. Tony Banks MP is known to be furious at this new pressure group and has stated that Donoughue and Mallalieu, both front bench spokespersons in the Lords, should be sacked from their posts. No MPs support the campaign and a number will be writing to John Smith to demand the dismissal of the "noble lords".

Enough Bad News - Now Let's Have the Good News! (...or the Sabs' Road to Victory!)

The "Glorious Twelfth" didn't happen this year with less than one in fifty heather moorlands witnessing the killing of grouse. The grouse kill has been depleted by the triple whammy of disease, bad weather and good sabbing - one of the few shoots at Hurst Moor above Swaledale packed up early following the attentions of twelve sabs. A party of eighty sabs from as far afield as Manchester, Northampton and Brighton popped in to see the Duke of Westminster's shooting party on his estate in Lancashire. The party of 20 guns found themselves outnumbered and no shots were fired that day.

On August 13th, 13 beagles went missing from the kennels of the Cheshire Beagles near Cholmondeley. The hunt are quoted as being concerned that their precious possessions, including a renowned stud dog, will be subjected to cruelty by the "thieves" and have offered a reward of £5,000 for return of the animals. The ALF later claimed responsibility for the action.

The Northumberland Beagling Festival began on 27th September 1993. In the past this event has taken place over a two-week period and incorporated over 20 hunts. This season the festival lasted six days and involved only six hunts. The annual campaign by the HSA against the festival has clearly affected its popularity and what used to be described as the premier beagling event into a damp squib of a jamboree.

In November a Romanian hunter got more than he bargained for on his way home from a deer shoot. His dog trod on the trigger of his loaded rifle on the back seat and blew the hunter's brains out!

During the first week in December Irish farmers blocked off all roads leading from the meet of the County Downe Stag Hunt using their tractors and shotguns. This hunt uses a captured deer, which is carted to a suitable venue, released and hunted until it is caught. It is then recaptured and kept for the next week's hunt. Needless to say this despicable hunt stayed at home all day.

On Boxing day the Hursley and Hambledon Hunt were due to organise a split meet. However, police said that they could not police both meets, so the hunt cancelled one venue and held a single meet at Corhampton. Local sabs and a large contingent of LACS demonstrators attended the meet and blockaded the car park. Police eventually sneaked the hunt out the back way but they were successfully sabbed all day. A meeting in the New Year was similarly well sabbed by groups from throughout the South.

The East Kent Hunt meet at Elham got off to a bad start when the master lost his horn. It was eventually returned to him but unfortunately it had become twisted and mangled.

After a long campaign against the joint Master of the Chiddingfold, Leconfield and Cowdray Hunt, Jeremy Whaley, this delightful human being has been kicked out of the hunt and now must leave his home at the Petworth kennels. Whaley was featured in the Beam & Da'Silva investigations into hunting last year where he was seen to sell animal skins from "fallen stock" without proper receipts and failing to ensure proper hygiene in the room where the dead bodies were kept. Wally Whaley's departure will hopefully presage the end of the hunt's use of aggressive thugs as "security staff".

On February 19th, a women's mass sab was held against the Hursley & Hambledon Hunt. About fifty women activists totally humiliated the all-male hunt masters, while a heavy police presence prevented a large group of hunt heavies from assaulting the sabs. The hunt got so cross that one woman rider tried to smash a sab van's window with her riding crop. No kills were reported from this hunt.

The Waterloo Cup, the premier hare coursing event in the United Kingdom was due to receive the attentions of a large group of demonstrators and sabs. However, the event didn't take place this year thanks to heavy falls of snow.

Throughout the hunt season sabs continued to save lives from the staghounds, fox hunters and shooters. The anglers also faced a welcome increase in sabotage.

Members of Tyne & Wear's animal rights and sabbing groups have regularly sabbed anglers at a local, artificially stocked lake in Newcastle. They have also had notable successes at advertised matches: On 15th June five saboteurs disrupted a fishing match in Middlesbrough which had been advertised in "Angling Times". After 45 minutes of successful sabotage two sabs were attacked by an angler who beat them with a bank stick. Police arrived and promptly arrested the sabs and after keeping them in custody for 53 hours charged all five sabs with criminal damage (to the bank stick) and possessing offensive weapons (two kebab skewers which were used as drumsticks on a wok to create noise and vibration underwater.) Eventually the charges were dropped and the sabs were bound over to keep the peace.

Following the demonstration at Laundry Farm on the 20th June 1993, demonstrators spotted anglers nearby and staged an impromptu sab. Several anglers packed up but then police arrived and arrested a sab. The sab was released without charge later.

Activists who were demonstrating against Chipperfields Circus in Alnwick in July discovered a lone angler on their way. He packed up as soon as he was approached. The next day, however, he was back with a group of heavies and sabs decided to leave him alone.

The Cardiff FAUNA group organised a sab of a fishing match in Mote Park. Despite a large number of anglers and a small number of sabs the competition was disrupted by banging metal objects underwater and discussing the cruelty of angling with the blood junkies.

Activists in Cleveland found out about an angling competition on the River Tees in Yarm. On arriving they found two lonely anglers who left when the sabs arrived, leaving bits of fishing tackle by the river bank. Further up the river two boys were persuaded to give up their nefarious deeds and the group of sabs then visited Loch Park in Redcar. There were anglers aplenty and boats for hire so the sabs sculled up and down before the anglers, shouting and splashing their oars on the surface of the water - great fun for sabs but the anglers had a wasted day's fishing.

In October, anti Shamrock Farm marchers found anglers on Brighton beach. Needless to say the angling soon stopped.

Now the 1993/4 foxhunting season draws to a close and saboteurs face the most significant challenge to their legal, non violent tactics. The movement must realise that it has become a major force in protecting innocent animals from the depraved actions of selfish, arrogant scum. Even the BFSS has accepted that the hunt saboteur movement is the most significant threat to their supporters' sick enjoyment. We must not give up our efforts just because sabbing may become illegal. We must now decide how the fight against animal abuse in the name of sport can continue.

NATIONAL ANTI-ANGLING WEEK

Saturday, 11th to Saturday, 18th June

The Campaign for the Abolition of Angling is asking groups and individuals to support the week of action against Britains most popular bloodsport by taking part in protests outside fishing tackle shops, writing to their local paper, sabbing anglers, etc.

News from the ALF Press Office

by Robin Webb

Happy 18th Birthday!

So, here we are in 1994. The year when the Animal Liberation Front celebrates its coming-of-age... eighteen years since being renamed from the Band of Mercy whose actions against bloodsports in 1972 escalated to arson attacks against seal culling boats and pharmaceutical laboratories in 1973 and evolved into the ALF during 1976.

Since then, the 1980's saw the rise and fall of various Animal Liberation Leagues; the hesitant beginnings of what were to be sporadic actions from the Hunt Retribution Squad and Animal Rights Militia, and into the 1990's to finally witness the birth of the Justice Department.

During all those years the Animal Liberation Front has remained faithful to its stated policy of non-violent direct action. No human has ever been killed or seriously injured by the actions of Band of Mercy or ALF activists. It was the Observer Magazine on the 12th July 1992 that pointed out: "...it is a strange sort of terrorist campaign, to say the least, that is waged for 20 years without killing anybody". If only our illustrious national societies would accept that unbiased opinion...

Sorry to Arkangel!

In the last edition of Arkangel the editor omitted the final four lines from the ALF Press Office article for reasons of policy. In the subsequent issue of the ALF SG Newsletter I used the same paragraph to close with but noted that it was the "final unexpurgated (one) from Arkangel 10". At least one person has contacted Arkangel to ask whether the ALF Press Office was "having a go". Really! If people haven't got used to my tongue-in-cheek approach to writing then that's tough. There are quite enough divisions in this movement without trying to identify them where they don't exist. However, to make everyone happy... "Sorry, Arkangel" (but then, they hadn't been offended to start with!).

Coursers meet their Waterloo at Waterloo Cup Meet?

This year's Waterloo Cup hare coursing extravaganza was cancelled due to adverse weather conditions but... probably just to make absolutely sure... the press office received an early morning call on what would have been the first day.

Who was it? Yes, you've guessed, it was the Hunt Retribution Squad. According to them they had planted three stolen landmines at the bank on Withens Field where most of the coursers stand. Naturally, I passed the news on. Was it a hoax? I really don't know... and neither do the authorities until they check out such claims. With so many outrageous things going on you can never be too careful, can you?

Bomb Disposal Squad blow up litter bomb!

No, it's not a typing error. Last November, only a week or so after having her house decorated with red paint and glass etching fluid, a public relations executive with Glaxo of Stevenage received a parcel which was allegedly a bomb. The street was evacuated for 200 metres and the package made safe by the bomb disposal squad using a controlled explosion.

It turned out to be the first true litter bomb sent by the Animal Rights Militia... a parcel full of cat litter!! Under the circumstances the police haven't pussy-footed around; Neil Hansen and Tracey Stephenson have been charged with conspiring to threaten to kill, also with conspiracy to commit criminal damage. No charges have yet been brought against the bomb disposal squad for depositing litter.

A burning ambition to end animal abuse

On the 25th February, two telephoned claims were received, one saying that small incendiary devices had been put through the letter boxes of Boots the Chemist in Hastings, Bexhill-on-Sea, and St Leonards-on-Sea during that night. It is thought that they were experimental devices and at least two activated.

The other call was from activists in Northern Ireland saying that timed incendiaries had been mailed the previous Wednesday to bloodsports supporters throughout the UK and that further devices had been despatched within the preceding 24 hours.

Targets of the Northern Ireland devices included the Irish Coursing Club HQ, Horse and Hound in London, and Countryman's Weekly. The caller claimed that it was a major step-up in their offensive against bloodsports around the UK and that further devices could be expected through the post with no further warnings.

The first actions, against Boots, were claimed by the Animal Liberation Front but the timed incendiaries were claimed by "animal liberation activists in Northern Ireland".

Badgering the baiters

I am sure that all of you who saw the recent Channel 4 TV documentary on badger baiting will be delighted to learn that one of those featured, Michael Head of Crowborough, had his vehicles trashed on the night of 23rd February. Whilst that was indeed an ALF action rumour has it that another badger baiter featured on a BBC TV programme shortly before then was attacked and beaten by members of the public. It just helps to prove that, if the masses would only take off their blinkers, there would be anger on a vast scale.

Earlier, on 28th January in the Barnsley area, two badgers were rescued from scum who had been out lamping foxes and had brought the badgers back with them. The lucky two were handed over to a badger protection group. A polecat was rescued and rehomed at the same time.

Liberation and more liberation!

Apart from the two badgers and the polecat, crows and magpies were freed from a Larsen trap at Standean Farm, Brighton on February 3rd. Vehicles at the farm were severely damaged and the home of the gamekeeper responsible was also attacked.

On January 9th, a stallion was rescued from the Swale area of Kent from a house where a dog had choked to death on the end of its chain... a prosecution failed to gain a conviction (surprise!). The stallion has received veterinary treatment, plenty of good food, and is enjoying life at a good, new and secret location.

As I was writing this article the good news came through that yet another 58 hens had been liberated from Leyden Street slaughterhouse in London. This place has been hit time and time again with no sign of any let up until they close. Perhaps it's worth reminding people that there are regular pickets on the first and third Sunday, plus the second Tuesday, each month. Meet at the Bishopsgate exit of Liverpool Street tube/BR station at 10.45am.

Is there more?

Yes there is - much, much more. However, it has in the past proved to be somewhat of a threat to personal freedom to produce a 'Diary of Actions'. That's why they don't appear in the SG Newsletter or in Arkangel. Is it really worth risking them being closed down? Particularly the SG (thanks very much Robin! - Ed.) which exists first and foremost to support the prisoners. Neither the SG nor the Press Office are prepared to throw away an efficient prisoner support organisation just so you (and us!) could have a good read. I feel sure you all understand the position.

And we close on World Day activities...

Both the SG and Press Office have requested stands at the NAVS exhibition in Methodist Central Hall, Westminster. Neither have so far received any response. So, if we have to be at an alternative fair, it ain't our fault!

And I guess, as usual, there'll be no message read out in Trafalgar Square on behalf of the prisoners so, to all you taking a short (or not-so-short) break inside... we are all thinking of you and appreciate your sacrifice.

Plus, there are just a few people who couldn't come to the World Day march even though they are free. To those fugitives from injustice... Angie, Keith, John and Rod... we wish you well, and may the Old Bill always run slowly" Take care...

The Vegetarian Esperanto Group

The first year of VEG started well and has continued to make encouraging progress with an increasing number of members - with over a dozen people now having completed the Free Correspondence Course, and several others working through it.

In our first year, we have been able to send literature to animal rights workers in Bulgaria, Sri Lanka, Malaya, Poland, Romania, Spain, Germany, Japan, USA and the Netherlands. We have also sent information about veganism to human rights activists in Russia, Estonia, Poland, Ghana and the Czech Republic.

So far, we have only been able to send out photocopied leaflets which we have had to produce ourselves, but we are now preparing some better leaflets in Esperanto about angling, vegan nutrition, and the basic philosophies underlying veganism.

As membership grows, we will produce leaflets about other aspects of animal and human rights - the fur trade, vivisection, bloodsports, and the many other forms of cruelty which are so much more prevalent in other countries around the world.

As Arkangel goes to press we will be having our first meeting in North Wales, but we are planning to have further meetings in SW London (Easter), East Anglia, SW England, Ireland, Spain and Southern France during the Spring, Summer and Autumn, and we will be meeting up as a group with the Tutmonda Esperantista Vegetarana Asocio (founded in 1907 by Leo Tolstoy and others) at the International Vegetarian Congress in the Netherlands in August.

We welcome new members (only £5 p.a.) who will receive our Esperanto journal VEGO and English language newsletters - and anyone can enrol for the FREE Correspondence Course! Come and join us! Less than 5% of the World's population can read or write English, but animal cruelty is usually far worse in non-English speaking countries. Animal rights activists in those countries need our help, and every subscription we have allows us to produce and send out more information to people in countries where there is a shortage of both money and literature.

WHAT THE PAPERS SAY

A SELECTION OF CUTTINGS FROM THE PAST FEW MONTHS

Animal rights demo storms hunting HQ

FIFTEEN animal rights activists were arrested today after storming the headquarters of the British Field Sports Society in London.

The protesters tricked their way into the building shortly before 9am, barricading themselves — and a member of the society's staff — into an office on the first floor.

Police used sledgehammers to break down the barricade. The men and women, believed to be members of the National Anti-Hunt Group, were arrested and taken to a nearby police station.

Staff member John Roll-Pickering, was released unharmed after the 20-minute protest at the Kennington Road offices.

Mr Peter Voute, of the British Field Sports Society, said afterwards: "It was a totally irresponsible thing to do. They had obviously come here to try to occupy the building."

A spokesman for the Metropolitan Police said: "A member of staff was forced inside his office by the group of demonstrators and locked inside with them."

"Fifteen people have been arrested on suspicion of false imprisonment."

After the arrests, more demonstrators remained outside the building protesting against foxhunting and other blood sports.

Wally Hope, of the Hunt Saboteurs' Association, said: "Eighty per cent of the population are against foxhunting and these people were demonstrating their right to protest against barbaric practices."

by BARBARA McMAHON

Mr Voute said that the protesters had offered to let Mr Roll-Pickering leave after taking over the office, but he refused and stayed at his desk.
